LADIES' LADY

A talented film director, Pratibha Parmar, is the first prominent Asian in Britain to come out of the closet Amit Roy checks out her point of view

Pratibha Parmar is a charming woman She laughs easily, talks in an attractive manner, and is a successful and talented film director

But any man — or woman, for that matter — who is drawn to her should be aware that she is Britain's most famous Asian lesbian

And she has an invitation from the United States to be the Grand Marshal at the 1995 San Francisco Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Transgender Pride Parade today This is the world's biggest annual gathering with up to 40,000 people attending and she considers this 'a great honour'

In her role as Grand Marshal, she will be the celebrity figurehead who will lead the march in an open convertible She is thought to be the first person from Britain to be asked

The invitation has highlighted her membership of a rare breed — the Asian woman willing to defy the strictures of a deeply conservative society to proclaim her sexuality

"Within the Asian community the word, lesbian, is not even uttered," explains Parmar, who is the only prominent Asian to have come out as a lesbian

She shares a trendy, open-plan house in London with Shaheen Haq, her partner of 13 years She points out that theirs "has been an open relationship for the last five years and we had had other relationships"

The difference in their religion does not make winning acceptance any easier "Many of us are ostracised by our families and communities, but I am not ashamed of who I am, Parmar adds "I am a lesbian and have been out for 15 years'

The invitation from the US pays tribute to her work "We and specially women, would not be where we are today without your ground-breaking films" In Britain, Parmar's documentaries have been broadcast regularly on Channel 4 She is best known for Warrior Marks, a documentary about the traditional, but horrific, African practice of female genital mutilation She is an even bigger name in the US where her films have been shown in theatres in 30 cities

Her latest work, The Colour of Britain, which argues passionately for Asian artistes to be treated as part of mainstream British culture, was shown on Channel 4 at nearly midnight on May 23

The time slot makes her angry because she feels putting on the programme so late marginalises the work of the artistes she had featured, including the sculptor, Anish Kapoor, the Turner Prize winner who has represented Britain at the Venice Biennal

"If he is not mainstream," she asks, "who is?"

In the Asian community, however, Parmar appears to enjoy only a small following of lesbian women who meet her in secret to tell her they are glad she has had the courage to come out They themselves cannot because they fear social ex-communication

Her mother, sister, two brothers and other relatives, believe that her lesbian lark has gone on long enough, and that really, like any other decent Asian girl, Pratibha should settle down with an eligible husband

Her mother recently raised an old issue with her "You are 40 now God, are you ever going to get married?"

Her daughter laughed off the suggestion "You know I am not"

Unfortunately for her relatives, Parmar has been claimed by the international glitterati whose members — filmmakers, authors, activists — shuttle from seminar to seminar holding forth on the joys of being lesbian

In the 'arty' world in Britain, her lesbianism has long been accepted In fact, being a lesbian was probably a good career move But it was only five years ago that she publicly let slip the secret of her sexuality on a television programme The whispers very quickly spread through the Asian community, and Parmar's sister was tackled by her friends "They made my sister feel very embarrassed"

'We are not always wanting to talk about arranged marriages and abusive husbands. I want to challenge and change and make audiences think. I did not want to reproduce a lot of the Hollywood schlock'

Far from being cowed, Parmar made Khush -- she emphasises the word means ecstasy -- to 'celebrate' the sexuality of Asian gays and lesbians in Britain and in India It won awards at festivals in Paris, San Francisco and Madrid Another film, Double the Trouble Twice the Fun, presented by writer Firdaus Kanga, explored the experiences of disabled lesbian and gay men

From disgusted Asians, the reaction was outrage

"You are a disgrace to our community," was a typical response "How dare you? This does not exist in our community"

A still from Khush

Pratibha Parmar was born in Nairobi, Kenya, and came to Britain at 12 with her parents, who had typical East African backgrounds solid, respectable, religious Her father worked as a clerk while her mother found employment sewing in her sweet shop As a teenager, Pratibha had fancied boys The problem was that she fancied girls more "But it wasn't acceptable to voice that you felt that for women"

At 19, Pratibha broke free and went to Bradford University to specialise in sociology as part of a BA course in Human Purposes and Communications It was when she became involved in women's issues that she realised she was a lesbian Her father died nine years ago, without mentioning the L-word to his daughter "He knew, and I knew he knew," she says

"What feminism did was that it showed me that there were other sexualities Emotionlly the feelings had always been there, but I had never had the courage even to articulate them"

She gets angry when asked to consider even the possibility that sex with a man might be more enjoyable "A lot of lesbians have this kind of abuse that all you need is a good f from a man and then you will never want to be with a woman again That is incredibly homophobic and heterosexist I could say the same thing to a straight woman who has never had sex with another woman, until you have slept with a woman you really do not know what it is about But I will not because I think we should all have a choice"

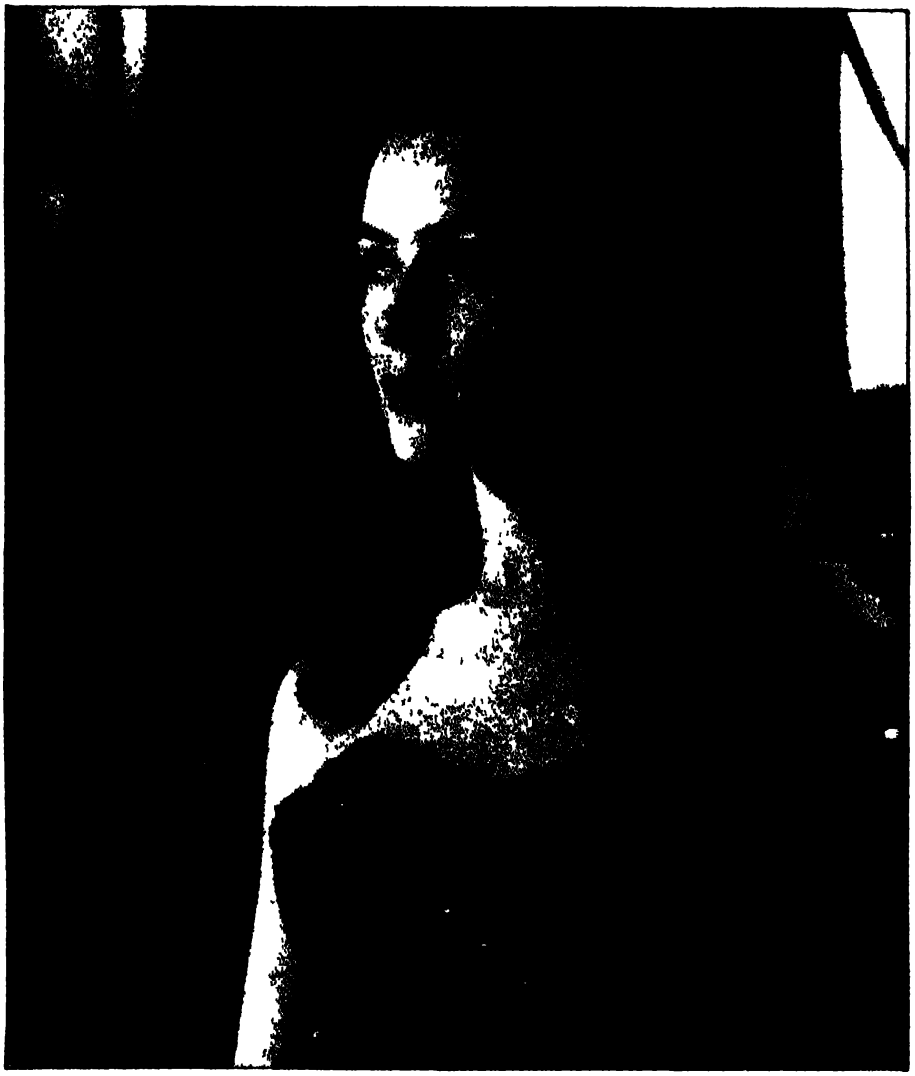
She argues that equating sexuality with sexual pleasures diminishes the whole history of gays and lesbians "Sexuality is not just about who you sleep with and who you get sexual pleasure from I am not a lesbian because I prefer to sleep with women I am lesbian because I love women

My emotions are more with women "

She claims to receive a lot of letters from Asian women who cannot come out but who say they are happy, that they are not alone

She holds up a newsletter which records the suicide in Kerala of two women — a student and her tuition teacher — who took poison together

They had written love letters to each other They might not call themselves lesbians, but these two women were in love with each other Traditional south Indian society did not allow these two women to live together "



Not all her films have involved women's or lesbian issues She wants to do more drama "We are not always wanting to talk about arranged marriages and abusive husbands I want to challenge and change and make audiences think I did not want to reproduce a lot of the Hollywood schlock that we see "

Last year she directed a short drama for BBC TV a 20-minute 'ghost' story called Memsahib Rita It included such themes as mixed race identity, bereavement and racist violence and borrowed imaginatively from the genres of magical realism and thrillers

A poster from the film A Place of Rage

A still from Memsahib Rita

An early film was Sari Red, made to mark the murder of a young Asian woman by three racist youths on the streets of London in 1985 In A Place of Rage, she talked to Angela Davis, June Jordan and Alice Walker about the role of Black American women in the civil rights movement Flesh and Paper was a portrait of the Indian writer and poet, Sunil Namjoshi

For Warrior Marks, she travelled to Gambia and Senegal with Alice Walker, Pulitzer Prize-winning author of Possessing the Secret of Joy Partly as a result of her film Amnesty International is under pressure to declare 'the removal of a young girl's clitoris', and sometimes the inner and outer labia as well, a form of torture

The practice came about, says Parmer, because men wanted to control women's sexual pleasure

Despite her success, she reveals there is a sadness in her life because she cannot explain her deepest emotions to her 65-year-old mother who knows only limited English "One of the biggest tragedies I find for myself is that I cannot speak Gujarati very well As soon as we came to this country English became the language of communication for me "

She says, "To have any kind of sophisticated discussion about sexuality — and my sexuality in particular — I do not have a common language with her I have actually thought I will write this very long letter in English of all the things I want to say to her and get somebody to translate it into Gujarati "

She says the hardest thing for a lesbian is to acknowledge her own sexuality "The biggest coming out is when you come out to yourself " ■

The Invisible Circus: It is a tale of traumatic secrets, heartbreaks and revelations. Phoebe O'Connor adores her older sister, Faith . The latter is a reckless woman of the Sixties. Faith flees to Europe with her lover, Wolf, after her father's death and dies in Italy.

In order to unravel the mystery shrouding the death of her sister, Phoebe runs away to Amsterdam. Eight years is a long time. Yet Phoebe discovers her sister's life in an account of her death. The shabby drug pedlar tells Phoebe that the Sixties was not all love, freedom and ecstasy. "You love to live, but you die and die and die...like your sister."

Jennifer Egan has the ability to transport a mushy tale of love and betrayal to a finer plane of self-analysis and a sharp view of the times.

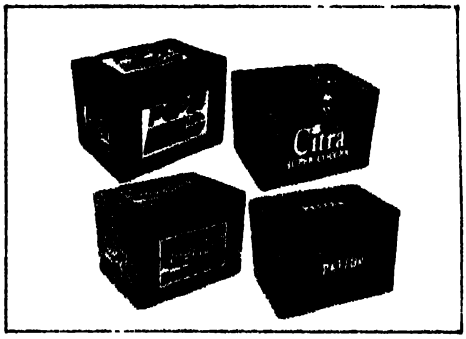
Cut out on Colas Are you a cola addict? Did you freak out on colas when you were a teenager? If your answer is, yes, you might as well step up your aerobics regimen and start on a balanced diet

A recent study suggests a corelation between heavy consumption of colas during adolescence and bone fractures in adult women



This is attributed to interference with calcium metabolism by the high phosphoric acid content of colas The connection is very strong among girls who consumed low levels of dairy products and other food rich in calcium

What is your idea of perfect happiness?
I have never experienced anything like perfect happiness because life is always alternating between the good and the bad.

What is your greatest fear?
Claustrophobia.
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
My mother.
What do you dislike most in others?
Dishonesty
What do you dislike most in yourself?
My absent-mindedness.
What is your most precious possession?
My family, friends and also my soft toys.
What objects do you always carry?
My skin and bones.
What makes you most depressed?
It could be something simple, like tears in someone's eyes, but my depression never lasts longer than two hours.
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
My feet.
What is your favourite word?
Nothing in particular.
What is your favourite journey?
Back home after 20 hours of work.
What is your favourite dream?
As a child I would dream of having a zoo with all sorts of animals roaming free in it.
What is your nightmare?
I am too optimistic to have a nightmare.
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
My work, at the moment.
What is your source of sustenance?
My love for my work.
On what occasions do you lie?
When I tell my parents I am coming home at such and such time to pacify them, though I know I will never make it.

What do you dislike most on your appearance?

My feet

What is your greatest regret?
None so far.
What has been your happiest moment?
Winning the Screen and Filmfare awards.
What brings tears to your eyes?
Could be just a book or a touching line said by someone. I also cry when I am happy.
How do you relax?
With my family, books and my nephew, Amogh.
What do you envy most in others?
Their presence of mind.
How would you like to be remembered?
Surely not as an absent-minded person.
How would you like to die?
As painlessly as possible, and I am definitely not in a hurry!

POST MORTEM

Get, Seth, Go!

■ The cover story highlighting Roshan Seth's big break in British theatre made interesting reading, but the accompanying pictures of Raquel Welch were somehow in bad taste ('Limelight', May 28)

Like Britain, India too has a theatre tradition And many in India prefer the stage to cinema; from the ugly movies running to packed houses, filled with violence and sex, theatre is a refreshing break

In fact, during the British rule India was a prominent theatre centre The tradition was kept alive in later years by such stalwarts as Girish Ghosh, Prithviraj Kapoor, Durga Khote, Uptal Dutt, Safdar Hashmi, to name a few

Hashmi, who popularised the genre of street plays as a medium of protest, and for creating social awareness, was unfortunately silenced forever But his plays could not be stopped Hashmi's widow carries on the unfinished work of her husband

In India the stage can be put to some very productive use — like spreading the good word around about family planning, sanitary and health care, agrarian problems and so on

Unlike Britain where theatre is just entertainment, in India it should also be educative.

COVER STORY

THE PLASTIC HOOD

It is all over the world, slowly smothering it. Seema Paul probes the perils of the Plastic Age

DECADES AGO, WE GRANDLY DISPLAYED PLASTIC MONEY PLANTS ON OUR WINDOW GRILLS and kept plastic flowers on top of the Murphy radio, and the radio was covered by a floral plastic sheet. But that sort of fashionable interior decoration became passe — even gauche, soon enough.

It was left for the old-fashioned LIGs to decorate their house thus, with the rest of the upwardly mobile world getting a lot more 'upmarket', or at least wannabe-upmarket. Even the rubber or plastic doormat with the legend, 'Welcome', painted on it was replaced by coir or thick cloth doormats

Apart from being aesthetically offensive, this trend served a very useful purpose plastic, for what it was worth, was quietly shown the door

Today, plastic art is making a comeback Hairpins and clips and combs, electrical boards and brackets, plugs and switches, water hoses and pipes, telephone and electrical wire encasings (specially since most of it is now 'concealed wiring') are very much in today bathing tubs, washbasins, mirror frames and tubelight shades are most often plastic. Soap boxes, shampoo sachets, waste bins, the new squeezy toothpaste tubes and toothbrushes, disposable shaving razors, refrigerators and washing machines and their parts, television and computer bodies are more or less the norm.

Plastic tubs for potted plants, plastic bucket seats in cinema halls, at airports and railway stations have now gained aesthetic acceptance. Not to speak of plastic cube-design stools sitting pretty in the drawing room or the teenager's room, not to speak of the irony of them being used now as garden furniture, replacing cane.

The vinyl discs may have been phased out, but what is one to do about the flood of audio cassettes--and with it, the cassette encasings and covers?

And about that great big painting hanging on your great big wall? With creative designs becoming more with-it, artist Laxman Shrestha notes that even some of the paints are derived from plastic and that there are artists who express themselves in plastic.

The famous sculptor, Amar Nath Sehgal, recommends that we try and educate the society about the perils of plastics. "It is so cheap to use plastics," he states, "The impermanence of this material makes it very unacceptable as a medium to me personally. It is ironic that even though the material is non-biodegradable, nothing made in plastic will last beyond a few generations in the form that one may give it. Iron and copper are any day preferable to an artist seeking permanence."

Sehgal's remarks should make all thinking individuals wonder if the pervasive use of plastics is not symptomatic of our society's wish to destroy itself and disintegrate without leaving a trace.

Architect Gautam Bhatia, who personally has great contempt for the material, states: "For some reason plastic has come to be associated with modernity, so much so that attempts at innovation in design also seem to be unfairly concentrating in this medium today."

Even the noted environmentalist, Maneka Gandhi, who is ever ready to condemn anything that causes the slightest of harm to human or planetary health, spares this material from her verbal lashings. "Some plastics, we have got to live with," she states, choosing to vent her wrath on certain usage of plastic!

So diverse are the uses of plastic that even the Encyclopedia Brittanica states

"It is difficult to imagine contemporary society without plastics." No aspect of life has been left untouched by the plastic revolution

The material was first developed in the United States in 1868, but it was only after the turn of the century that it was perfected in different varieties such as low and high density polyethylene

"Plastic is progress," states Dorai Raj, chief executive, All India Plastics Manufacturers Association (AIPMA), unabashedly

But, perhaps, Raj forgets that this 'progress" is cutting at the very roots of some healthy indigenous traditions Those of relying on natural products and recycling- traditions which the more aware sections of Western society, in fact, are now emulating

Gautam Bhatia's argument is credible Take a look at just the range of 'essential', easy-to use kitchen products that the market has been flooded with in the last decade The formidable range of unbreakables! Call it good advertising, hard-sell, or plain smart sense, each of these are now synonymous with a modern kitchen

Gone are the days when mothers recycled glass bottles and Dalda tins to store dals It is now the age of Pearl Pet and Sun Pet jars Also lost with the progress of time is the tradition of keeping roti wrapped in layers of saafi (as the cloth napkins were called), before being encased in a steel box We now have plastic casseroles Not only are the drums, buckets and mugs in the toilet plastic, the containers and jars on the kitchen shelf, are plastic, too And let us not forget the oils and other food products which now come in easy-to-carry, cost-saving plastic pouches

No longer visible is the 'glass' glass or steel glass at the public water cooler It has been replaced long since by disposable plastic glasses, which can be thrown into the dustbin after single use Not to speak of cold drink fountains where you can fill your plastic glass with a Pepsi and sashay up the stairs to the cinema hall or to your office desk or walk around with your guy/gal, plastic glass in hand

Check out your work desk Pen bodies, specially ballpoint pens, telephones, desk calendars, stationery clips, pen holders, spectacle frames as well as lenses, the mineral water bottles, maybe even the ashtray is plastic

Check out your child's room or study table His tricycle, the rulers and sharpeners and the pencil box, the table tennis balls and the football, even the youngster's cricket bat and ball now come in plastic

Look around you and see what has enveloped your life

In homes and in offices In kitchens and in bathrooms Look at any item and it has some plastic in it And most of these items, which were earlier made of different material like glass or metal, has been replaced by a more convenient, easy-to-carry, easy-to distribute, easy-to-dispose of, attractive looking, light and bright stuff Plastic

Ann Leonard of Greenpeace states, 'The production of plastic emits substantial amounts of toxic chemicals into air and water. Many of the toxic chemicals released in plastic production can cause cancer and congenital defects and damage the nervous system, blood, kidneys and immunity systems. These chemicals can also cause serious damage to ecosystems'

The running theme through these changes is the slow death of the tradition of recycling

The picture is not too unfamiliar considering the rate at which the globe is being choked by plastic, a man made petrochemical based substance which Mother Earth refuses to take back into her entrails

Plastic items can be produced rapidly, automatically and with a minimum of finishing operations Besides, they can be made into different objects of various shapes, colours and surface textures All this, and short-term convenience has made plastic a very popular material and one can safely predict that it will be the material of choice for even greater applications in the future

In India, the annual production of commodity plastics is 1 1 million tonnes (with 12 per cent of it being exported) Yet, experts state that the revolution in plastics has only just begun

And the industries lobby, comprising giants such as Nocil and Reliance, is gearing itself for even greater consumption levels "India has been witnessing a 14 per cent growth rate in plastics, compared to five to six per cent in the US and Germany," boasts Dorai Raj, "but unlike them India has not yet peaked We still have a long way to go"

But explaining the dangers of plastic, Ann Leonard of the internationally known environmental group, Greenpeace, states, "The major chemicals used to make plastic resins pose serious risks to public health and safety. Many of the chemicals used in large volumes to produce plastics are highly toxic. Some chemicals, like benzene and vinylchloride, are known to cause cancer in humans, many tend to be gases and liquid hydrocarbons which readily vaporise and pollute the air. Many are inflammable and explosive. Even the plastic resins themselves are inflammable and have contributed to numerous chemical accidents."

And that is not all.

"The production of plastic," Leonard continues, "emits substantial amounts of toxic chemicals (for example, ethylene oxide, benzene and xylenes) into air and water. Many of the toxic chemicals released in plastic production can cause cancer and congenital defects and damage the nervous system, blood, kidneys and immunity systems. These chemicals can also cause serious damage to ecosystems."

Plastics indeed pose a sticky disposal problem for the world at large. You cannot burn it, you cannot bury it. Throwing it away clogs the arteries of the system. So, you just cannot get rid of it, once you have produced it

One of the most common and reprehensible use of plastics in the world, including India, is as packaging material.

The polythene bags came into our markets only as late as 1982. But they have given such a beating to our recycled newspaper bags that one hardly sees the latter now. Few, however, seem aware of the dangers the plastic carrybags pose.

Polythene bags have often caused the death of infants the world over. Babies love to cover their heads with polythene bags as part of their play, but cannot remove them from their head, and often die gasping for breath, since air will not pass through polythene. It is mandatory for such plastic bags to carry warnings about them being used as playthings for children.

Most plastic toys are also required to be made of — and carry statements to that effect - - non-toxic material.

The same is the fate of fish and other marine life, when polythene finds its way into the waters, as it often does. "At least a dozen of my cows at the VHP-run gaushala in Harewali, Delhi, have died after consuming vegetable peel, which was packed in polythene bags," rues Maneka Gandhi herself.

But, more important. Unlike paper, plastic and polythene, is non-biodegradable, which means it will not return to nature. So if you do not have a good system of garbage collection and disposal — and we in India do not have one — polythene will litter every place. Again, the irony is that in more conscious mohallas and paras garbage collection has become a systematic chore and people are expected to dump their daily garbage at a particular time in, you guessed it, polythene carrybags. Some area big daddies even go to the extent of supplying sets of 'garbage (polythene) bags' for the purpose!

Laments Maneka Gandhi, "There is no account of the acres of cultivable land that India may have lost since the advent of polythene bags because wherever they sit, nothing will grow."

You will find plastic having reached most of the tourist spots, whether beaches or hill stations, whether well visited or 'quiet getaways'. Artist Laxman Shreshtha found the plastic bags even in the high reaches of the Himalayas in Nepal, where he had recently gone trekking in order to get one with nature!

Plastics indeed pose a sticky disposal problem for the world at large You cannot burn it, you cannot bury it Throwing it away clogs the arteries of the system So, you just cannot get rid of it, once you have produced it In fact, for the Western world it has already become a huge problem just as it threatens to become for India

The West does not know what to do with plastic waste, which their societies are churning out in huge quantities

What one is to do in a situation where disposable syringes have become an absolute, life-saving necessity, but are made of plastic, is the black question staring us in our face....

Since the option of burning plastics is ruled out due to the toxic gases they emit, and having exhausted their land fill sites, many of these countries are now resorting to international trickery

They are trying desperately to send huge amounts of plastic wastes into Third World countries, caring little for the harm they would do to their environments

Much of plastic waste, as other kind

PLASTIC AS ART

It was while working with tribals in Orissa recently that artist Manu Parekh was confronted with the reality of the plastic invasion "My medium at that point was clay When I asked my tribal friends for some water, they brought it in a plastic bucket! The total contrast of the two mediums — clay and plastic — struck me intensely in that moment I reacted very strongly "

Rationalising the villagers' fascination for plastic later, he felt that clay and clay pots were a reality for the poor villagers While plastic products, with their powerful advertisements on the idiot box, beckoned them to join the world of fantasy.

"In 10 years from now," visualises Parekh, "when plastics will have become the reality for the majority of Indians, maybe we will crave once again for the clay pots "

But must we as a nation have to go through the whole vicious cycle that the West already has, before we start to respect clay and shun plastic?

"No," says Parekh, "it need not be a fait accompli. I would much rather that we did not have to go through it "

Jehangir Sabavala also rues that the invasion of plastic is destroying our highly developed native traditions. "Plastic is such a hideous material," he says, "and it is such a shame that we are deluged with it now We are losing our own simple artefacts like the brass lota and clay matka under the plastic invasion."

Laxman Shreshtha's response to plastic is rooted in reality. "It is not very healthy for the environment and human beings," he confesses, "but on the other hand, it is a very useful and practical material."

Sculptor Amar Nath Sehgal finds plastic too cheap a medium. "Plastic radiates its own light and does not reflect it like bronze does, so it is not conducive to creating a full image. For any artist to use plastic is to fall into a cheap trap."

Sehgal carries his hatred for the medium into his daily life as well and refuses to have any plastic items in his house, whether it be chairs or plastic bottles. Except the tooth brush, for which there is no practical alternative.

BEING DUMPED WITH 'TECHNOJUNK'

While the consumption of plastic has skyrocketed in the developed countries, there is low demand for plastic scrap and residues within these countries. Coupled with the fact that there is a lack of feasible, safe means of recycling plastic, developed countries have started shipping tonnes of waste plastic to developing nations.

Once this waste arrives, some of it is melted down in makeshift reprocessing factories, some is dumped in landfill sites and the residue left is unusable and often hazardous waste.

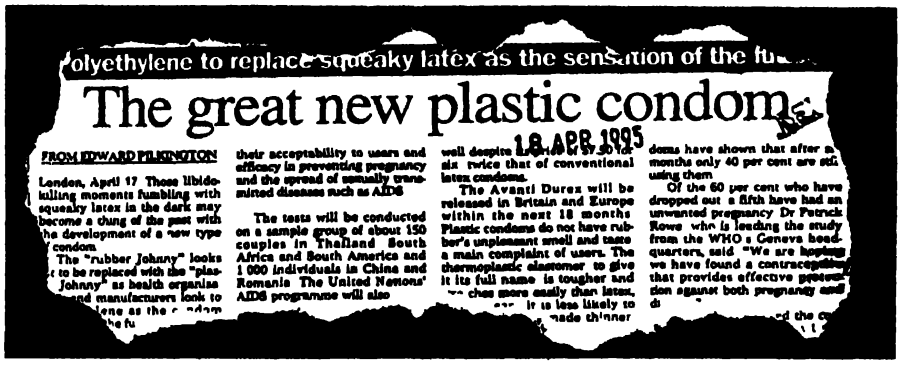
When plastic is melted down, its chemical structure changes. Scientific indications are that this process may release cancer-causing gases such as benezene (source: Earth Resources Centre, Greenpeace Laboratory, University of Exeter, UK).

Workers in many Asian plastic reprocessing factories are exposed to toxic fumes from plastic melting operations and are given very little safety clothing or breathing apparatus to protect themselves.

India is among the countries that imports plastic officially, though a committee to monitor illegal dumping has been set up. The other plastic waste importing countries are-Malaysia, Thailand, the Philippines and China Indonesia banned plastic imports in 1992

The latest waste crisis in the world has been created by the booming computer industry, which uses substantial quantities of plastic Relying on information from the Chinese National Environment Protection Agency and the US Center for Investigative Reporting, Greenpeace states that the US is already sending thousands of tonnes of computer waste or 'technojunk' to Asia every year.

In 1993, more than 1,800 tonnes of this junk was sent to China, Hong Kong and the Philippines.



When this waste lands in China, workers strip the cables for copperwires and the remaining wastes are either burnt or stockpiled Burning of computer keyboards could produce brominated dioxins which have been linked by the US EPA to causing cancer, immunosuppression, developmental effects in children and sex changes in offspring.

Electronic scrap likethese computer wastes has been classified as hazardous by the German government, informs Greenpeace.

of waste, had been coming into India for a long time till some noises were made by the green lobby in the past year

The Ministry of Envii onment has since set up a working group which seeks to monitor this activity and prevent India from being used as a dumping ground for plastics!

But even if we shun the waste of Western society, our own growing middle class is 'consuming' plastics at such a rate that we have a huge and ominous problem at hand

Where do we begin to solve it?

Maneka Gandhi recommends that the Government of India should issue a notification banning the use of polythene shopping bags

But the government is unlikely to do this unless an effective lobby demands it Besides polythene bags, the single most visible symptom, there are other symptoms of the ailment

We will have to gradually convince ourselves to reduce the level of plastic usage Perhaps, wherever cheaper and environment-friendly alternatives are available, it must be made o happen

What one is to do in a situation where disposable syringes have become an absolute, life-saving necessity, but are made of plastic, is the black question staring us in our face

Diapers already come cleverly with plastic covers, so convenient now to carry baby around without messing up someone else's sofa or your own sari

A recent Guardian report says that 'the great new plastic condom', replacing latex, will be 'the sensation of the future' Very soon, we are sure, even coffins (easy to carry) and 'death beds' in electric crematoria (light on the shoulders of the mourners) will be made of plastic

Meanwhile, can we have those paper bags back, please? As Maneka Gandhi would say, Achha hai ■

THE SONG OF THE TREES

Champak Chatterji on his proximity to nature and love of life in all its greenery*

This was Shimla in the Fifties and I was all of 10 years old It was Puja time and all Bengalis from Summer Hill to Chhota Shimla had gathered at the Kalibari and on Vijayadashami came a mellifluous singer all the way from Calcutta who sang of mists and blue mountains

In this atmosphere, my cousin who was visiting, fell headlong in love She was a flighty young thing and since we could not discover her name, we christened her 'dragonfly' as she was elfin, gauzy and forever moving away

That was all that there was to it but I guess some of my cousin's passionate yearning must have rubbed off on me I became moody and pensive and most days would be down in the forests that flanked our house, near Annandale, walking by myself

It was then that I discovered the young pine, growing quietly in one corner It was six inches or so shorter than me and its leaves were soft and silky I christened it Louella This was also the time that I discovered Pat Boone — and for the rest of the time I was at Shimla, there would be rarely a day when we were not together, sharing a conversation or a song or two

Then when it was time to move away from the hill-station, I made a long and sentimental farewell

Today if she is still there, she would be 60 feet tall with forest-children of her own, murmuring together as only pines can when the wind blows through But if I do see her, I have a problem, how do I recognise my Louella?

Many years were to pass, growing to manhood and settling down Then my wife and I got posted to Midnapur and found ourselves somewhat enigmatically, occupants of a Swiss chalet-like bungalow with a ceiling so low that you could touch the roof by stretching

During the long parched summer, it was oven-hot inside the house and we decided that trees would have to be planted for shade and survival Off we went to Calcutta and the Agri-Horticultural Society and from there returned lighter in purse but with lovely saplings of drooping deodar We diligently planted and watered them

I remember many an occasion when my wife and I would emerge, torch in hand, from the house in the depths of the night, to see how things were going in the 'nursery' Every new leaf, every centimetre of growth became a cause for celebration

We moved out of Midnapur when the saplings were a foot off the ground In distant pastures there was little news to be had about our trees but when our son was born, I told him about our "deodar children" and my wish that someday the siblings should meet

Many years passed before that came to be but one day, a chance visit took my family and I back to Midnapur and the chalet of old The bungalow looked run-down, the plaster was peeling and the flower beds were gone and then I saw the deodars! Eighteen of them, they were standing straight and strong under the blue sky of spring, proud Chatterjis – every one of them! My son had met his siblings after all and we all stood proudly that day in spring not perhaps a small but a very happy family nevertheless!

As Deputy Commissioner in Darjeeling, I lived in Rivers Hill which stood just beneath the Shrubbery and the approach to it was through a little forest of dhupi, chilauni and katus

Come April and with the first breath of spring the hillsides would erupt in flowers The wisteria that climbed the wall of the house would be a cataract in blue-pink but my own favourite was the arucha or plum tree with its soft white blossoms It stood at the end of the drive like a fairy in white spreading benediction

For sometime I found myself as the Director of the Himalayan Zoo in Darjeeling there as well I was suddenly pater familias to a large family of leopards, Ussuri tigers, yaks, bears, not to mention tragopans, pheasants and the Himalayan owl! Not that I did not enjoy it Every morning I was up early and would walk down to the zoo, exchanging a few words with Shiva the leopard, 'disco-dancer' the red panda or giving the yak-calf a fond look

Just at the entrance to the Director's office was a glorious blue pine I would spend a quiet minute here Inhaling the mountain air with that indefinite fragrance of wood resin and hearing again the murmur I heard as a boy among the hills of Shimla

Darjeeling is crowded during the summer months and again in autumn Vast throngs then move up and down and well into the night in my house, I could hear their multitudinous roar Winter is a different story The crowds disappear and only those in love with the town carry on, braving the biting wind and the bitter cold It is the time for long walks, as much to thaw the blood as to pass the time and introspect

There was the way up Jalapahar, the old road to Calcutta or Lebong But my favourite beat was to go past Chowrasta to the point where I could look down and see the shops at the bazaar come to life in the morning and the first train huff and puff its way to Ghoom A lone tree stood at this spot, gaunt and resolute, framing the distant hills I had named it Ghaffar Khan because of its imposing height and because I saw a certain resemblance, physical and spiritual, to the great man of theNorth West frontier The tree gave me strength and fortitude just as the arucha gave me a sense of beauty and the blue pine freshness and the wrench of sudden remembrance

It would be a full decade before I could go back to Darjeeling again This time it was not to stay but a quick two or three days snatched from the hurly-burly of life Things had changed and the faces around me were new I took a walk down to my old house searching for familiar landmarks, seeking my trees The house was there and the new inmates bade me welcome but the plum tree was gone! Blown down in a mountain storm, I was told In its place stood a dish-antenna gazing at the sky The zoo was next I walked up, all trepidation to where the blue pine had stood near the garden gate

Gone again! The resinous fragrance, the whispers of the forest out of childhood Where would I seek them now?

Disconsolate with the disappearance of old landmarks, I wandered about Subconsciously my feet brought me to where I would look down at the bazaar shacks and the mountain train going its way, all those years ago Then, turning a corner, I saw Ghaffar Khan against the sky patriarchal, benevolent, Frontier Gandhi as ever! The tree had stood the test of time The ten year interregnum vanished at a stroke and I was home again and not alone this time!

I was curator of the Victoria Memorial when that institution was celebrating its diamond jubilee I had been brought in to give a bit of administrative spine to the museum but got caught up in a vortex of seminars and exhibitions which the occasion demanded Celebrities came in from home and abroad, there were precious pictures to be carried to distant places, publications to be organised and special cancellations to be arranged with the postal authorities

All this was new to me and as a result the hours got longer and longer and the adrenalin flow became a mighty flood To cool off, I would go and walk in the garden Acres of it and full of glorious trees, flowers and birds Long-tailed parrots screeching out of the simul, the bee-eater resting awhile in the branches of the pakur, the slash of oriole-gold amidst the green of the mango

These gave me a sense of calm and soothed my frazzled nerves When I needed more sustained therapy, I would head at the hour of dawn to watch the sun rise and fill the great crown of the mimosacaea, standing by the western lake, with the pearl light of dawn I called this tree, The Tree of Life With its enormous trunk and spread of branches it seemed to hold up the sky itself

Springing from the earth it was also a symbol of all that was fruitful and good Under that tree quiet would enter my soul and it seemed I was back in some hermitage where there could be no pain or anger There was a bench near the tree where lovers sat I thought the tree affected them also While elsewhere they talked endlessly They fell silent here in the shadow of the mighty tree

In summer, the heat is stifling where I live in a small flat in the middle of Calcutta But I am four floors up and from the window of my room I am on a level with the tops of trees A sea of green stretches in front splashed here and there with colour The gulmohur is in bloom and the yellow flowers contrast with the green of the leaves

The neem, the jamun and the mango crowd together knitting conjoint shadows I can see the gravestones in the Bhowanipore cemetery Alongside a lilac tree is in bridal bloom and an amaltas is shaking its golden anklets I dream-walk in the swathe of green and soon the sun is gentle A song comes to my lips I am singing Louella ■

CRIME AND PUBLICATION

Dick Francis is as keen a horseman today as he was 30 years ago when a nasty fall terminated his career as jockey Seema Sirohi profiles the 74-year-old popular British writer of crime

A long morning walk along the beach, a swim in the sparkling blue waters of the Caymen Islands, a quick cup of coffee and then, well, it is time to sit down and write

Dick Francis, who still churns out a thriller every year at the ripe old age of 74, follows this strict regimen and says that mental work is more exhausting than his first career as a jockey for the British royal family

Dick Francis Plotting crime

Even though horses are an integral part of his life and novels, now he is "too old to ride" or judge events or train But he is still close to the royals and sympathises with their troubles, saying they never had a chance at happiness given the hounding they get from the press

It would not be an exaggeration to say that horses are to Dick Francis what diamonds are to Elizabeth Taylor or what style is to Diana or eccentricity to Prince Charles

They are simply synonymous For four generations, the Francis family has been attached to the royal family, training, breeding and racing its horses So it is hardly surprising that when Dick Francis gave up his career as a jockey and took up writing, the novels were centred round the world of horses

The pain of defeat or the rigour of nonstop training for a Grand National until the beautiful animal is found mysteriously drugged or incapacitated in some other way are essentials of his mastered technique

The drama of a Dick Francis novel grips the reader, taking him on a journey of intrigue and deceit, heavily aided by the science of pharmacology since drugging of the horse is a recurrent theme in his thrillers True, either you are addicted to his novels or you are not but he remains one of the most popular writers of crime thrillers today Any book signing ceremony is evidence of his fan following

He meticulously signs hundreds of books without complaining, sharing a joke with the readers as he goes through piles after piles At a recent book signing in the American city of Denver, there were at least 300 people crammed inside a room on the third floor above the book store waiting for Dick Francis to show up

He came with his manager-son Felix but went to have a drink because he thought there were no fans He was overwhelmed when he went upstairs to the right room This correspondent met him in Bratislava, where nearly a 100 people lined up in cold weather to get his autograph It was a coup of sorts for the Slovak publisher of his novels since Slovak is the first foreign language his latest novel has been translated into — even before Japanese He sells most in the US, followed by Japan and Czech and Slovak republics

Dick Francis even today is as keen a horseman as he was more than 30 years ago when a nasty fall cut short his reign as a jockey He broke his wrist and burst his spleen The accident followed another 'numbing experience when a horse belonging to the Queen Mother mysteriously collapsed under him a few metres before the finishing line The incident came to be known as the 'Devin Loch' episode in the annals of racing history

"I have got used to it now but at that time I was numbed I was 10 lanes in front and winning the race easily," he says, speaking slowly He went and checked on the horse after the race and found nothing wrong with it except that it seemed tired Perhaps this real-life drama has been the biggest inspiration behind the novels

It would not be an exaggeration to say that horses are to Dick Francis what diamonds are to Elizabeth Taylor or what style is to Diana or eccentricity to Prince Charles

Jockey career ended, the sprightly Britisher began writing his autobiography which attracted the attention of the sports editor of the Sunday Express who pursued the famous, royally connected man of horses to write a column Dick Francis was coy at first but as the offer increased, he accepted He began in November 1957 and wrote for the next 16 years

"The job taught me how to write stories, how not to use superfluous words and what words to leave out," he said of his journalistic stint

His wife, Mary, reminded him of his desire to write a novel and he published his first in 1962 There has been one every year since, he says proudly Often, his wife helps him with the research and travels They went to Moscow for the Trial Run and went to the sunny beaches of Australia and New Zealand for In the Frame

There are invitations from jockey clubs and horse show organisers all over the world and Dick Francis never refuses if he sees an opportunity for a book He denies that he is a creation of his publishers and insists that he writes at a pace comfortable for him

Yet he is keenly obliging every May when it is time to deliver the manuscript to the publisher so he can have the book for the Christmas market

"They have a fit when I say I will give them a novel every other year" He keeps abreast of the latest in the racing scene and says the races have not really got faster, only more lucrative and more numerous even though many people think they are run faster A good jockey may run as many as 200 races today, often flying, to a different spot in the evening while in his days the numbers were well under 100

Dick Francis himself won 76 races on some of the famous horses in history He holds that the best horses still come from Ireland followed by Florida and Kentucky "The breed of horses in eastern countries such as India or Japan does not last' even though the people love to breed them there, says the expert The bones get lighter after a few generations and the breeders have to keep going back to Kentucky to replenish the stock

The main reason is the lack of calcium in the soil and the grass The rich soil in parts of North and South America and the British Isles comes from the Mexican gulf stream Dick Francis is unselfconsciously honest when not being 'managed' by his son who seems to watch his every word But the author still manages to drop a few bomb shells He said he liked living in Florida for 15 years because "well, the natives spoke English"

But he was irritated by the American habit of telephoning "you for this or that" "Now that we live in the Caymen Islands, they think we have gone abroad or something even though we are on the same area code on the telephone system," he says

He hates the Arab world because of "the natives" and the sand He lived in Egypt for two years during World War II

The pride and prejudices of his social class come across easily but it does not seem to bother him He only worries about plotting his next novel ■

CROW PHILOSOPHY

One summer evening, as storm clouds gathered over the purple mountains, a glossy black jungle-crow settled on the window-sill, looked at me with his head cocked to one side, and said, "You look worried today, chum. Anything I can do for you?"

I had been lolling in an easy chair near the window, looking pretty gloomy I suppose, for all was not well with life in general, when this Runyonesque character arrived and startled me out of my solitude.

"I beg your pardon?" I said politely. One must always be polite with strangers, nowadays some of them carry guns or knives.

"Just asked if anything was wrong," said the crow. "You're not your your usual cheerful self."

"No, I'm not. But there's nothing I can do about it. And it's got nothing to do with you."

"You never can tell," said my visitor.

"All right. And if it wasn't that I'm feverish and probably in delirium, I'd swear that you were talking to me."

"Don't swear. Just listen. I've been around. I've even been human. Chang-tzu had me for a disciple. Epictetus had me for a friend. Saul of Tarsus and I made tents together. I've knocked about with Kashyapa, father of demons."

"And now you're a crow. I suppose it's progress of a kind."

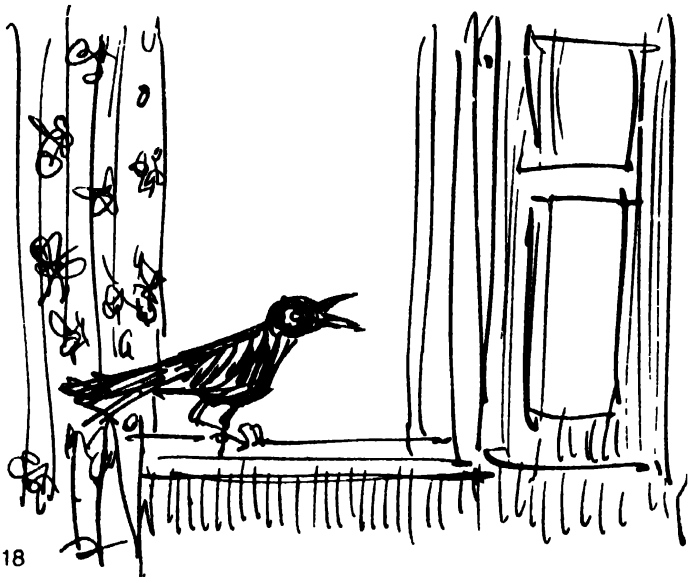
"It's all because I went into politics the last time around. The result was this feathered reincarnation. But seriously, there's nothing wrong with being a crow. We are a much-maligned tribe. Do you realise that no other bird has our intelligence, our resilience. We can make a living almost anywhere — and that's more than what you've been able to do of late."

He had me there. I'd been struggling for some time, trying to make ends meet but I wasn't getting anywhere.

"I'm doing my best," I said.

"That's your trouble," said Crow moving nearer along the window-sill and looking me between the eyes. "You do your best. You try too hard. That's fatal, friend. The secret of success lies in maximum achievement with minimum effort."

"But that's ridiculous," I protested. "How am I to be a successful author if I don't write?"



"You misunderstand me. I am not recommending the idle life. Have you ever seen an idle crow? I bet you haven't. A hard-working crow? Most unlikely. And yet, we've always got one eye open, and that eye's on the main chance." And sidling up to me, he filched the remains of my sandwich from my hand.

'It's all because I went into politics the last time around. The result was this feathered reincarnation. But seriously, there's nothing wrong with being a crow. We are a much-maligned tribe. Do you realise that no other bird has our intelligence, our resilience....'

"See that? Got what I wanted, didn't I? And with a minimum of effort. It's simply a question of being in the right place at the right time."

I was not amused.

"That's all very well if your ambition is to pinch someone else's lunch," I said. "But how does it apply to succes-

'What I'm really advocating is pragmatism. The trouble with most people, and that includes writers, is that they want too much in the first place. A feast instead of a bite from a sandwich. And feasts are harder to come by and cost much more. So that's your first mistake to be wanting too much, too soon'

sful authorship? Do I p nch other people's ideas?"

"Most people do but that's not the point What I'm really advocatn g is pragmatism The trouble with most people, and that includes writers is that they want too much in the first place A feast instead of a bite from a sandwich And feasts are harder to come by and cost much more So that's your first mistake to be wanting too much, too soon "

"And the second mistake is to be pursuing things What I'm saying old chap, applies not only to authorship but to almost everything under the sun Success is what you are pursuing, isn't it? Success is what most of us are pursuing

"Now, I'm a successful crow, you must admit that But I don't pursue I wait, I watch, I collect My motto is the same as that of any Boy Scout 'Be prepared!'"

"I'm not a bird of prey You are not a beast of prey So it is not by pursuit that we succeed If we became hunters, we would automatically bring into being victims And a victim's chief object is to get away! And so it is with success Pursue it too avidly and it will elude you "

"So what am I supposed to do? Write books and forget about them?"

"Exactly I don t mean you have to tuck them away Send them where you will - send them to the four corners of the earth -- but don't fret over them, don't expect too much That's the third mistake -- fretting Because when you keep fretting about something you've done you can't give your mind to anything else "

"You're right," I had to admit "I do worry a lot I'm the worrying kind I call it authoritis "

"All wrong What have you to worry about?"

"Lots of little things "

"Anything big?"

"Not at the moment "

"But you expect something terrible to happen? You expect the worst?"

"Isn't it prudent to expect the worst?"

"No In crow philosophy we expect the best!"

And hopping onto the side-table, he dipped his beak in my beer mug and took a long, tasteful sip

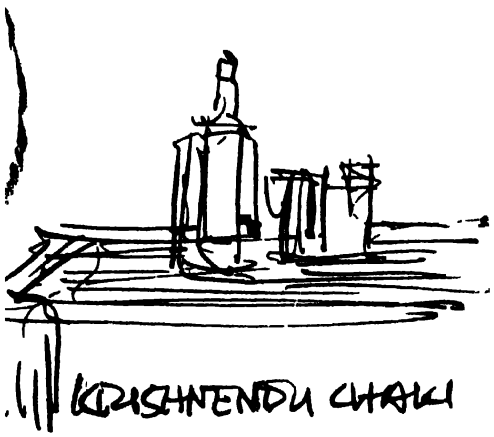
"Always expecting the best! And I usually get it By the way, if you can afford beer everyday, you can't be badly off "

"I don't have it everyday "

"Why this sudden interest in my welfare? Why not someone more deserving?"

"Because I've taken a fancy to you," he said cocking his head to one side "You don't trouble crows "

"I've never noticed them much "



"A pity If you'd taken the trouble to study crows, you'd have learnt something from them Survival, independence, freedom from stress "

He took another sip of beer

"No writer worth his salt can afford to ignore us We're nature's greatest survivors!"

With a disdainful flap of his wings he took off and headed straight for the Woodstock School kitchen I looked at the label of my bottle of beer It seemed quite genuine But you never know, these days

A pale hand flaps imperiously from the front window of a white Maruti, in a vain effort to force a way through traffic This is a woman with a mission A mission to show her paintings to a gallery owner

Finally finding a gap, she proceeds cautiously, as if the Maruti is an alien form of transport of which she is deeply suspicious, and parks before Delhi's Little Theatre Gallery Opening the back door of her car she struggles to remove a huge leather portfolio, almost bigger than she is, and heads towards the gallery stairs

This petite woman, with ash-blonde hair, wearing a white kurta-pajama printed in Rajasthani style in simple blue, and draped with the most stylish jewellery, is Ameena Ahuja Ahmad

In Old Delhi where she was brought up, she is still best known as the daughter of Barrister Nooruddin Ahmad, remembered as a giant of a personality, a man of immense humour and learning, who used to sit chatting with friends in Urdu Bazaar His children, say the old men of Old Delhi, have become modern

But Barrister Nooruddin was not altogether unmodern himself He studied in Britain, fell in love there and married a British girl with Russian connections Ameena is their child

Inside the gallery, she is greeted warmly by old friends, unzips the portfolio and spreads out her work against the walls and across the floors These are animal forms — pacing leopards, falcons, horses running, peacocks, doves, deer and one of the Virgin Mary and child They capture the essence of the creatures they seem to represent

But these are creations of calligraphy, these are poems in Persian and Urdu by Rumi, Hafiz, Ghalib and Faiz, shaped by the artist 's hand into animal form

Calligraphy means literally beautiful handwriting, as does the Urdu khus khat Just because you have good handwriting, you can't claim to be an artist Most calligraphers are simply craftsmen but over the centuries there have always been some who have produced new scripts and ways of using them Formerly they were given titles — rather like an Urdu poet's takhallus — meaning Amber, Sweet, Golden or Mercurial Pen

It's to this tradition, perhaps, that Ameena belongs, creating a new blend of European and Indian tradition She is by training an artist from Camberwell and the Slade School of Art, where her special subjects of study were Persian miniatures and Russian icons Her search in her own art is for the perfect line This she finds in alphabetical scripts, specially in the half a dozen or so Urdu/Persian scripts perfected in India

"Every artist needs a perfect line, a tool to draw with," she explains, sipping tea and looking down over her work "I use the reed pen, and traditional ink, sometimes mixed with honey for lustre, and myrrh to keep insects away Pen and ink have always been greatly respected Reed pens have been called the cypress trees lining the Valley of Knowledge, and ink has been compared to the Water of Life

"But it was my mother first who showed me the forms which lie within the Urdu alphabet, the elegance of the script She saw Henry Moore's reclining sculptures in the letters be, pe, and te"

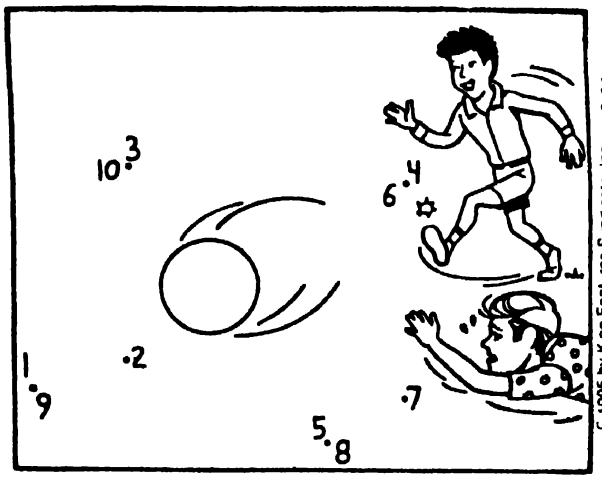
Ameena is obviously deeply influenced by her mother, who came to India and became fluent in the languages of Delhi She designed jewellery, sitting and working with traditional craftsmen, using semi-precious stones — lapis, amber, agate, jade and coral

Around Ameena's neck hangs a smooth tulip outline in grey agate bound in brass Around her wrist is a silver bangle, leaves twining towards an oval of amber containing petrified bubbles of light Both were designed by her mother Her own contribution is of amber too — a necklace of cigarette holders Ameena was once a heavy smoker

"I was always encouraged to paint — it was the only thing I was good at And Urdu was my mother tongue, as was English Both India and England were my homes, and this seemed entirely natural to me But the poetry I heard here made a specially deep impact on me I think it is very important to learn by heart, and I learned the poetry I heard Much of this I use in my paintings I also learned calligraphy as a child

"See, that is shikasta," she goes on, pointing to one painting, "the letters are cut off before completion It's difficult to read That was the script used for love letters, so they were not easy to decipher if they fell into the wrong hands

"Then that is khat-e-ghubar — the script of dust — that you would use for writing to an enemy Hakim Ajmal Khan used to write prescriptions in it so that dust would fall on the patient's illness and it would be destroyed The horse is in khat-e-rehani, a script resembling intertwining basil leaves"



The galloping horse lying before us was created from a verse of Ghalib — Saaya mera mujh se misl-e-dud bhage hai — My shadow runs from me as fast as smoke The falcon was formed of Rumi's verse, Man mast o tu diwane — I was intoxicated and you are mad, I have told you a hundred times, Drink less than you do, not more than two or three measures A lion, its head turned as if in seeking, was formed of another of Rumi's verses which tells of a holy man roaming the streets with a lamp in his hand, sick of the company of surrounding evil spirits, in search of one good human being

For Ameena "Sound must be seen, colours must be heard " Now this winter it seems from the conversation in the gallery, that the sounds Ameena draws will be seen again this winter after a gap of over five years

BLOCK TALLY CHALLENGE

MOST blocks in the diverse sets above are in plain sight, but some are hidden from view. Assuming that all sets are complete, how many blocks would you say there are in arrangements A, B, C, D and E? Indicate your tallies in blanks below.

A ____

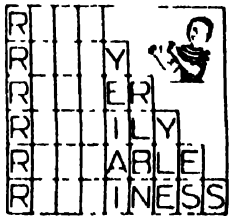
Remember, all block formations are complete.

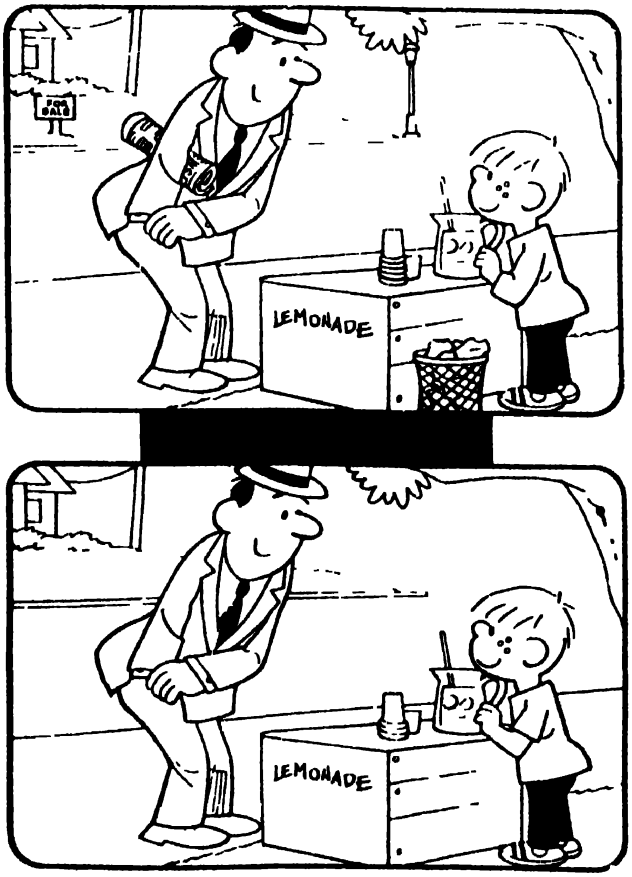
When you have made your individual counts, check with answers given below.

A - eight. B - fifteen. C - eighteen. D - twenty. E - twenty-two.



KEYING IN! Three letters are missing from a certain key word in the top step of the exercise below. Indeed, these same three letters may be inserted to complete the five progressively longer words in these steps below.

How quickly can you find the three letters that complete the key word?



Limit: 30 seconds.

Clue: It is a word that denotes a learning skill which is an important asset throughout a person's life.

Answer: READABILITY. Add R, A and D to READ for READ. Add A, B and I to RD for RAIL. Add A, I and T to RAIL for RAILS. Add A, B and I to RAILS for RAILBIRD. Add A, B and I to RAILBIRD for RAILBIRDS.

FLYING FREE: TO DEATH

Reintroducing a dying species to its native habitat, is never easy. In fact, most attempts with the rare Arizonian parrots, have failed

A seven-year effort to return thick-billed parrots to the pine forests of Arizona where they once thrived has failed because birds raised in captivity floundered in the wild, quickly becoming prey for hawks

Some of the birds starved, others succumbed to disease, but most were eaten by predators, often within 48 hours of their release

Researchers have suspended the project, saying they are uncertain whether any of the 88 parrots released in the Chiricahua Mountains of southeastern Arizona from 1986 to 1993 survived Reintroducing a dying species to the wild, even in its native habitat, is never easy, conservationists say In fact, most attempts fail, specially when they involve animals born in captivity

Yet wildlife researchers say that such efforts tend to be more popular than other conservation techniques, like those that rely on legislation and public education To be sure, the appeal of returning the brightly plumaged thick-billed parrot to Arizona is largely aesthetic, said Dr Noel Snyder, an ornithologist who directed the parrot project and led the attempt to revive the California condor in the late Eighties

The thick-billed parrot, which is rather tame and not a prolific talker, is one of only two parrot species native to the United States The other, the Carolina parakeet, went extinct early in this century The thick-billed parrot is emerald green with scarlet shoulder patches and a red nose It disappeared from the south-western United States in the early Nineties, a victim of hunters but large flocks of the parrot still nest in the western Sierra Madre of Mexico

The attempt to resurrect the species in Arizona began with 29 wild adult parrots that the US Fish and Wildlife Service had confiscated from smugglers Later, another 36 wild parrots were added But the flocks dwindled considerably after a drought in 1989 Illnesses such as an incurable, fatal wasting disease, took a toll as well The project encountered its most formidable challenge when it supplemented the wild parrot population with birds that had been raised in captivity

In their native habitat, thick billed parrots are loud and gregarious creatures Among the largest parrot species they streak through the sky wing tip to wingtip holding a tight, V shaped formation A robust thick billed parrot can easily outfly goshawks and red-tailed hawks, its main predators, and sometimes even a peregrine falcon On the ground, the parrots seek safety in numbers, nesting close together in Ponderosa pine trees or Douglas firs at altitudes of 7,000 feet or more

Often one bird will act as a sentinel for the others perched on a treetop and calling vociferously when danger approaches The 23 parrots raised in cages lacked those flocking instincts and more importantly, proved unable to develop such survival skills in the wild Liberated, they took solo journeys to other mountain regions, foraged for pine cones in forests that had no pine trees and showed a lack of interest in socialising with their fellow avians

"They get out there and the whole thing seems to be such an overwhelmingly new situation that they sit there dazed," said Snyder "They don't flock properly, so they are very vulnerable to predation " To improve the birds' chances, the biologists created what amounted to training sessions in how to behave like a thick-billed parrot

Housed in 30-foot-long cages with wild parrots, the ones raised in captivity learned through a combination of imitation and trial and error how to feed themselves "That's a tricky thing," Snyder said They must

The thick-billed parrot, which is rather tame and not a prolific talker, is one of only two parrot species native to the United States. The other, the Carolina parakeet, went extinct early in this century. The thick-billed parrot is emerald green with scarlet shoulder patches and a red nose. It disappeared from the south-western United States in the early Nineties, a victim of hunters, but large flocks of the parrot still nest in the western Sierra Madre of Mexico

snip a pine cone off a branch and then maintain a firm grip while using their thick bills to extract the seed The training helped hone the parrots' foraging skills, but it did not improve their flocking strategy

In one typical release, a female thick-billed parrot quickly located a wild flock and took up a perch about 33 yards away When the flock returned to its feeding area, the female flew to another canyon She was killed by a raptor later that afternoon "We reached a point where we were putting out the best candidates of captive-bred birds and just watching them die," said Susan L Koenig, a volunteer in the programme who wrote her master's thesis on thick-billed parrot behaviour for the University of Arizona in Tucson "Ethically, we couldn't justify putting out more captive bred birds just to feed the hawks"

Wildlife Preservation Trust International invested $276,000 in the reintroduction programme, some of which was a contribution from the Arizona Game and Fish Department From the beginning, the project faced dismal odds Only about 1 of 10 reintroduction schemes that use animals raised in captivity leads to self-sufficient populations of 500 or more individuals, said Dr Benjamin B Beck, associate director for biological programmes at the National Zoological Park in Washington, who has reviewed 145 such projects

The most successful reintroduction programmes involved large numbers of animals over several years, Beck said They also relied on public education programmes to foster local support and enthusiasm "They capture the imagination," said Dr Mary C Pearl, executive director of Wildlife Preservation Trust International, a non-profit organization based in Philadelphia But she said most reintroductions occur when the species is in its last gasp

' That's almost certainly a prescription for failure," she said While the thick-billed parrot is not in such dire straits, conservationists say that a renewed North American population could become a critical safety net for the endangered Mexican birds, whose habitat is under siege by loggers In the next several years, Snyder, working with conservation groups in Mexico, will study that population If they discover a healthy and sizable group of parrots, they might again try to rekindle a group in Arizona, but strictly with birds caught in the wild

Hollywood comedian Eddie Murphy gets turned on by good perfume. And he will not perform till his dressing room is filled with peach-scented pot-pourri.

Diana Ross is choosy about the room she lives in. When the diva didn't find the dressing room of a performance centre in Iowa's Cedar Rapids up to her starry liking, she flared up and ordered the waiting room and the three adjoining dressing rooms be redone

The walls and floors were repainted and recarpeted in the earth-toned hues she fancied brown, mauve and beige

Being rich and famous and hounded by an all-too-adoring bevy of fans celebrities make unimaginable demands to assert their 'star' status And why not, feels Randy Taraborelli, Michael Jackson's biographer, "You can't imagine how chaotic and turbulent their lives are " They'll demand anything that can be done to make life easier for them.

Even stars who would love to forget the limo culture give in after some time And the bigger the name the greater the tantrums. Hollywood's fifth richest entertainer, Bill Cosby, is very fussy about the limousine he rides. It must be a white Jaguar.

Diana Ross: Proud diva

Once a producer sent him a black limo to take him to a party Cosby declined to step into the limo

The pay-offs for the 'suffering' celebrities undergo are simply fabulous Even hotels and restaurants love to pamper stars; some of the ritzier ones in Los Angeles and New York take the business of perks very seriously going to the extent of maintaining files cataloguing celebrity preferences in food and drinks and even getting in touch with studios to garner information about their likes and dislikes. House rules can also be broken if it is a high-wattage star

A room service manager of a Los Angeles hotel had found out that Clint Eastwood had a weakness for Evian drinks. When the actor checked in, he found a dozen or so premium corked glass bottles of the mineral water awaiting him in his posh suite. But down with arthritis the actor found it impossible to use the corkscrew The manager immediately sent a waiter to an adjacent store and had him buy up all the plastic bottles of Evian.

There's no end to the caprices of Hollywood stars Warren Beatty often gets the urge to "reach out and touch someone" at restaurants

Beatty also loves to make his presence felt Recently, at one of his favourite NY eateries, Beatty disappeared to make a call on the house phone leaving his wife and two of her friends at the dining table. He went on talking for the rest of the meal forgetting his company and also the fact that he was inconveniencing other residents of the hotel who may have urgent calls to put through No one in the hotel protested

A large entourage of domestic help is considered a symbol of high status in Hollywood And it boosts a star's media hype Demi Moore, Hollywood's highest paid actress now, hires a rotating security staff, a nanny, a personal assistant who has her own assistant, a trainer, a masseur, a housekeeper, a cook and several workmen on call every day

With her earnings shooting up to $12.5 million she sure can afford this luxury!

Eddie Murphy loves to surround himself with at least a dozen staffers. And there's nothing Eddie loves more than to eat in peace and solitude. His 'boys' are known to clear out an entire McDonald's joint so they can eat in privacy.

Well, stardom may be a big bore, but when the perks are so enticing it must be nice to be a star.

Tonight

There is a poem within me that seeks release tonight, an anger which must burst into flames

A madness that lingers to manifest on my face a secret which gnaws

Somewhere in the body a grief lurks out at the vast darkness, an unknown fear
creeps through my bones

Tonight I think I'll let all these go
Tonight I'll let the body decide its ultimate destiny

Now that I've got that long lost gypsy girl in my arms whose glistening thighs quivers for a touch of my restless fingers like a serpent's licking tongue stirring the quiet darkness

Eternity

Eternity is that moment
when the black deserted road stretches out till nowhere, the sun beats down,
the wind raises the dust that lies on the cosmos to be free, elemental,

unbound by this body
that moment
when I crave for love, want to shatter the restrictions of gender,

Stigma

A poet, successful or not must bear a stigma
This blighted creature must see life differently,
from the rest of the mankind,
in a manner divergent,
with a view that is his own,

how ever prosaic it may be An object of suspicion, a tinge of distrust,
a stigma, that is his cross

Let There Be Peace

■ The fact that many Westerners, including Hollywood stars like Richard Gere, have embraced Buddhism, shows that the Dalai Lama's unrelenting efforts to spread the teachings of Lord Buddha in the world have succeeded ('Don't Worry, Be Buddhist', June 4)

He has travelled to every corner of the globe for the liberation of Tibet. But for a people that believes and practises non-violence, freedom from Chinese rule has proved elusive

In a world, torn asunder by violence and war, the only religion that could usher in peace is Buddhism and going by the large number of recent converts to this religion, it is obvious the people are weary and seeking calm of mind

B.N. Bose,
Calcutta

■ Most religions preach non-violence and universal love It is a different matter that followers do not adhere to the tenets of religions

Think what Christian Germany did to the Jews. Sri Lanka, a predominantly Buddhist state, has recorded the most gruesome instances of violence and bloodshed

The perennial feuding between the Jews and Muslims has brought untold suffering to West Asia.

Pakistan is still reeling under violence from intra-religious clashes. The Protestants and Catholics of Northern Ireland are also known to clash from time to time

Religion has actually failed to tame and discipline humans And therein lies its failure.

Manoranjan Das,
Jamshedpur

■ Wherever one turns there is tension and bloodshed What has the world come to? Look at India, the place where Buddhism was born

It is the most unhappy land today Kashmir, once a tranquil paradise, reverberates with the sound of firearms.

Punjab, India's most prosperous state, has witnessed dark days of a kind it could have never imagined. And it was all fanned by religion

The Northeast is a terrorists' den Kidnappings and killings are a way of life there

Bombay, which was considered a model city for secular amity witnessed the worst ever communal strife in India

Whatever has become of the land of Buddha and Mahatma Gandhi?

Somnath Mukherjee,
Calcutta

Bodhi tree at Gaya: The roots of Buddhism were in India

Not Politicians, Please

■ We wait eagerly to read 'First Person' every week But most of the time we are confronted with personalities like politicians whose rejoinders do not interest us or mean anything

Why can't we have young people like Sachin Tendulkar and Arvind Swami expressing their views? Even T N Seshan would not be a bad choice

Ambar Paul,
Shyamnagar (W B)

We have already carried Sachin Tendulkar and T N Seshan long back — Editor

Raquel, Raquel!

■ Raquel Welch believes "Sex is power" ('Limelight', May 28) I cannot agree with her

Feminism is essentially an effort to build up a society where men and women can both live on equal terms and with mutual love and respect.

If modern women begin to flaunt their sexuality, it would only kindle man's dormant bestial desires and upset societal peace.

Ismail Merchant

Jefferson in Paris, probing the private life of Thomas Jefferson, was expected to ignite controversies and the box-office. But Ismail Merchant's first ever film for Walt Disney company is a washout. Will this affect the team which has been eminently successful so far? Arthur J. Pais finds out

IT WAS A DEAL OF THE DECADE, IF NOT THE CENTURY THE mighty Walt Disney Studio initiates a deal with producer Ismail Merchant, promises him complete freedom in choosing the material, cast and crew for his films — a rather unusual step for the studio — and greenlights Jefferson in Paris, a controversial project about one of America's most revered statesmen.

Though Merchant has remained outside the pale of Hollywood for more than three decades, Disney — impressed by the success of his recent ventures, Howard's End and The Remains of the Day — convinced him that he did not have to worry about any interference from the studio bosses.

Hell, Disney did not even mind Merchant producing a film that could hurt millions of Americans. For, in the movie, Thomas Jefferson is seen not just as the Father of Declaration of Independence and a moral force behind the new nation, but also as a human being with a lot of flaws — a slave-owner and one who carried on an affair with a married woman, who apart from giving America the Declaration of Independence, also gave her more slave children, thus continuing a tradition that he himself had prophesied would "produce convulsions" through all the future generations.

"It is a story about an individual who was truly a renaissance man, who is a great part of American and European history," says Merchant. "I think everyone ought to know about this particular man and what he has done for civilisation. The character is so obsessive and wonderful Jefferson's life was a very rich tapestry. We are concentrating on only five years of his life in France because the canvas is very vast."

ferson, 41, and a recent widower, spent as the American ambassador to France These were significant years for him in his public and personal life, and a fateful period for France for the revolution was about to break out

Historians are split over some of the personal issues of the legendary statesman's life, as raised in Jefferson in Paris According to director James Ivory, though his films are populated with historical characters, in documented and speculative situations, it is impossible to be exact "It is my version of the lives of these well-known people," he says "I think people will see to some extent what Jefferson was up to while he was in Paris, what kind of man he was and what kind of figure he was to the French who revered him as being the great champion of liberty They will also see him in the guise — which is completely atypical of a slave owner — which will come as a surprise to some people even though it is widely known that Jefferson had slaves as did George Washington

"His mind and his feelings are revealed in ways which one does not get out of history books," says Ivory

Adds Merchant "The film is a reminder about certain things that have happened in history, particularly idealism, and how it is connected to our lives today

"Schools do not pay much attention any more, and most people don't know much about Jefferson Many people don't even realise that he is on the five cent piece (coin) "

With Nick Nolte as Jefferson and a $15 million budget — 30 per cent more than an average Ismail Merchant film, and the potential for controversies, this was an ideal project on paper

But last month when Jefferson in Paris opened to tepid reviews and was yanked out of movie houses, with just about $3 million collected, it became the biggest flop in the careers of producer Ismail Merchant, director James Ivory and writer Ruth Prawer Jhabvala — the team that had worked

'James Ivory cannot bring himself to do justice to passionate scenes,' said another critic. 'As for the controversial aspects of the film, they never ignited. James Ivory is no Oliver Stone'

RAY RETURNS

The past one year has been an unusually busy year for producer-director Ismail Merchant In Custody, the movie in which he made his debut as a feature film director, opened in about 16 American cities to mostly raves

But the movie was not even an art-house success It grossed a pale $100,000, Merchant had expected it to do at least $1 million in the United States

But Merchant — and his partner James Ivory — got a lot of praise for restoring the Satyajit Ray classics and getting them released through Sony Classics, a division of Columbia Pictures.

The restored prints with a digital soundtrack received great reviews and a bountiful box-office in New York and a handful of cities From The New York Times to the more popular Daily News, critics in New York raved about Pather Panchali and several other movies

In its two-week long, limited run in New York city, Pather Panchali grossed $50,000 — a very healthy figure for a 40-year-old movie "It had the potential of grossing half a million dollars across America," says box-office expert Art Murphy "This is a rare feat. Most European movies released in art houses do not do that much of business "

Restoring the Ray movies and having them released was a labour of love for Merchant and Ivory For Ray had not only composed the music for The Householder, the very first collaboration between Merchant, Ivory and Jhabvala, he had also guided Ivory in editing the film.

"He is one filmmaker who was so influential in my career," says Ivory "I learned much more from him than the art of editing ..I learned to pay deep attention to details, to check the authenticity of details, and to get commanding performances from the artistes "

on such acclaimed and successful films as Heat and Dust, A Room With a View, Howard's End and The Remains of the Day

A Hollywood movie has to gross two-and-half times its budget to break even Jefferson needs to make at least $37 million to be just that

In his 35-year-old movie-making career Merchant has seen several of his movies flopping Deceivers, Slaves of New York and Ballad of the Sad Cafe, all did dismal business, but for a man like Merchant, known for his resilience, a flop here or there does not really matter

"He knows how to get to his feet in no time, and start working on a new project," says Andrew Sarris, a distinguished film critic and author, who has watched the Merchant-Ivory team at work for three decades

Sarris could not be more on the nail-head, Merchant is forging ahead with three other projects and he is giving breaks to several directors, including Madhur Jaffrey, who has acted in some of his most memorable movies like Shakespearewallah, The Diary of a Princess and Heat and Dust Jaffrey is tight-lipped about the project, but insiders believe that it will be based on her own soon-to-be-published novel

As Jefferson in Paris was taking a lot of heat from critics, an ntazed Merch ant began directing his second feature film, The Proprietor in Paris

But there is no question that Jefferson in Paris has caused the team deep embarrassment For this was the first project the trio did for Walt Disney Unless the film does extraordinary business abroad Disney might lose as much as $12 million on the movie

Ivory (left), Merchant and Jhabvala. Three decades of successful partnership

From time to time American movies that have flopped in America end up doing fabulous business abroad A Perfect World, starring Clint Eastwood and Kevin Costner, grossed a paltry $30 million in the States, but grabbed a hefty $110 million abroad netting a handsome profit of $25 million

Similarly, Sliver, the Sharon Stone sizzler, made just about $25 million in America, but took in $100 million abroad, earning a $20 million profit But will Jefferson in Paris fly abroad? Many industry sources believe that the movie has no future abroad

"The movie is at once boring and slow moving," says critic Jack Mathews Other critics said that the controversial elements of the story were not played out well, and for a film set in the revolutionary age, it was surprisingly bloodless The scenes of love affairs were totally tame and gutless

"James Ivory cannot bring himself to do justice to passionate scenes," said another critic "As for the controversial aspects of the film, they never ignited James Ivory is no Oliver Stone " Even though most main-

Last month when Jefferson in Paris opened to tepid reviews and was yanked out of movie houses, with just about $3 million collected, it became the biggest flop in the careers of producer Ismail Merchant, director James Ivory and writer Ruth Prawer Jhabvala stream historians would dispute the accounts of Jefferson's illicit affairs with slave women and the children he sired, hardly anyone rose to run down the film "It was like the movie came and went out without anyone ever noticing it," says Paul Noglows, film writer and short filmmaker

Many reviewers faulted the screenplay by two-time Oscar winner Ruth Prawer Jhabvala They said that Jhabvala excels when her scripts are based on celebrated novels by such masters as E M Forster (Howard's End and The Remains of the Day) and Henry James (The Europeans and The Bostonians)

Unwittingly Merchant himself prophesied the problem Discussing the project in its initial stages, he said, "When you are adopting a novel, the story is already there But when you are writing an original screenplay, you have to create a great deal, imagine what it could have been — or should have been "

The film which looks lavish and gives the impression that it cost as much as a big budget movie, also suffered because of its casting When Merchant had signed Nick Nolte, he was at the height of his popularity He had starred in Cape Fear, a Martin Scorsese movie that was a worldwide hit In Barbra Streisands' Prince of the Tides, he scored yet another impressive hit as a deeply troubled man who fights spiritual and emotional scars It brought him his first Oscar

Merchant was delighted when Nolte agreed to work for Jefferson even though he was getting just about $2 million, half his standard fee "This has been our tradition," Merchant had said two years ago "We have always got top stars such as Paul Newman to act in our films for a fraction of their normal fees because they are convinced that the low budget movies we make get wonderful acclaim "

But Nick Nolte's luck began to run out soon after winning the Oscars Three of his movies, Blue Chips, I'll Do Anything and I love Trouble flopped at the box-office The last named, a romantic adventure with a budget of $45 million, co-starred the redoubtable Julia Roberts, but ended up losing more than $15 million

His performance in Jefferson was also criticised. Most reviewers felt that he seemed out of place in a historic drama He seemed to be anxious to throw out his wig and the elaborate costumes, said one observer

There was a couple of good performances, though Luminous Greta Scacchi played Maria Coswy, the enchanting Anglo-Italian painter and musician who has an affair with Jefferson Thandie Newton gave a brilliant performance as Sally Hemmings, a descendant of an illicit affair between Whites and slaves (mulatto) who also happened to be the half-sister of Jefferson's deceased wife

But a handful of arresting performances, lavish production values, and enchanting musical score were not enough to salvage Jefferson in Paris ■

MIRA MISSES THE BOAT, TOO

Just as Jefferson in Paris was saying adieu, another film by an Indian filmmaker took a big fall at the box-office. Mira Nair's The Perez Family, a $12 million bitter-sweet romantic drama set in Miami's little Havana, nosedived in the opening week.

By the time the movie completed its American run, it had grossed less than $4 million.

Nair's third feature film starred Angelica Huston amd Marisa Tomei along with Alfred Molina. Originally Al Pacino was to play the role that went to Molina.

"Pacino and I danced together for more than two years," says Mira Nair, "and then he decided not to do the movie." Unlike her previous movies, Salaam Bombay! and Mississippi Masala, the film got mostly negative reviews.

The Perez Family* tells the story of a man who takes the refugee boat to Miami after languishing in a Cuban prison for over 20 years. His wife (Huston) who has been waiting for him all these years misses him at the boat's landing — and after a futile search, starts a romance with a younger man.

The husband is mystified at not meeting his wife. Feeling abandoned, he too begins a romance with a fellow boat passenger, a younger woman, played by Marisa Tomei.

With two Oscar winners — Huston and Tomei — and a colourful locale, a gorgeous musical score, the movie looked like a winner. But after a few minutes of viewing, it was apparent that Nair had missed the boat.

Scene by scene, the film looked wonderful, but it lacked depth and coherence.

And worse, it opened two weeks after My Family, a film about a Spanish family and produced by Francis Ford Coppola, premiered and was received with warm welcome by audiences and critics. My Family which cost less than half of The Perez Family made about $15 million, a profitable run; it could do better business abroad, industry sources say.

Marisa Tomei in The Perez Family

Suresh Shah, whose ambitious Double Dragon lost more than $18 million late last year, is working on three medium budgeted ($8 million-$10 million) movies. He is also planning the sequel to his hit film, Lion Heart, starring Jean Claude Van Damme.

"In this business there are just two things that are uncertain," he says wryly. "Death — and the fate of a movie."

'CAN SUNJU BE A DESH-DROHI?'

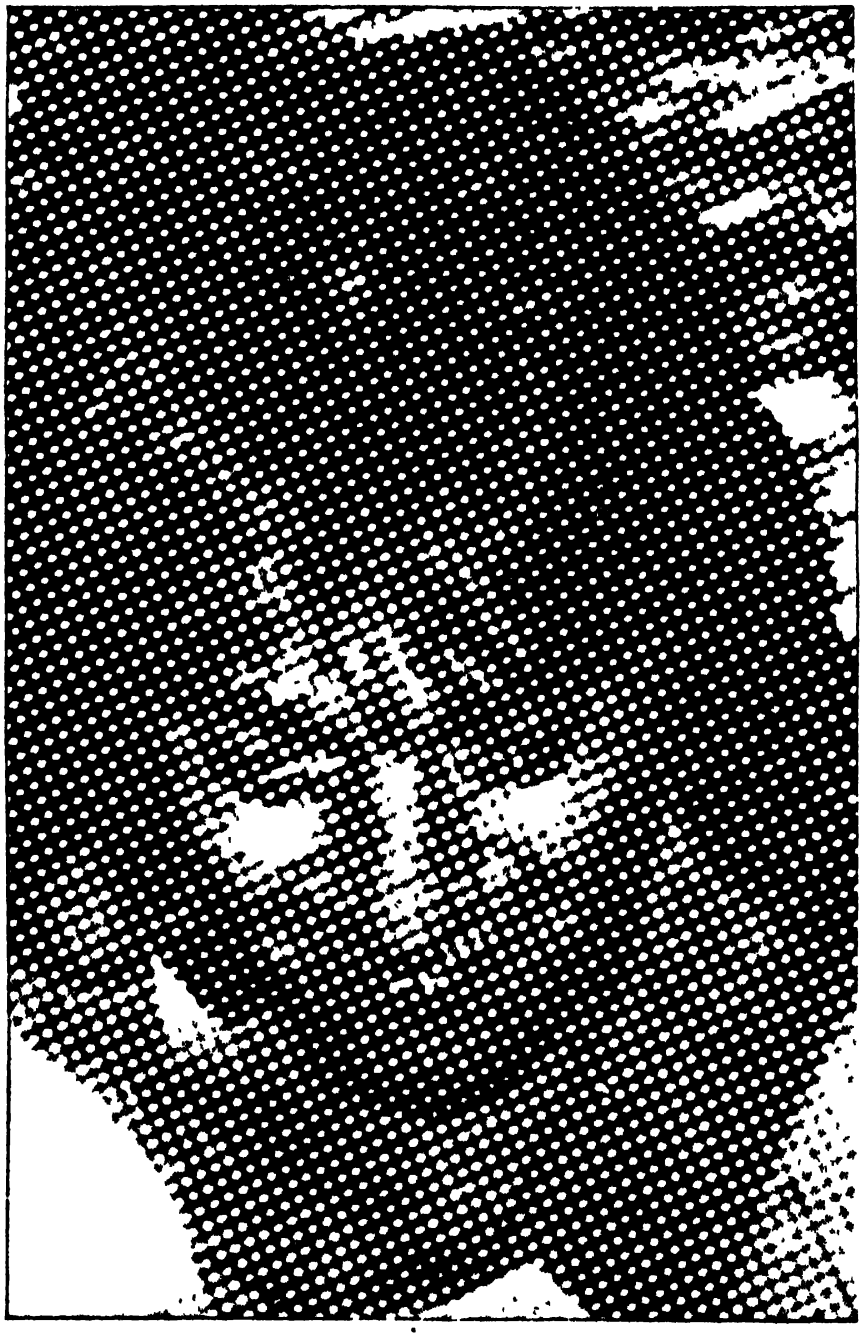
BY SUNIL DUTT



After Sunju was arrested in that awkward fashion I could not step out of the house without getting stares from people The first few weeks were terrible My daughters could not leave the house, they were so scared of the vicious campaign against our family Those days, when I used to visit my advocates to discuss the case, even the watchmen at their offices used to nudge each other and whisper, "Dekh, woh desh drohi ka baap." I could not show my face anywhere

But can I blame the people for this? And people forge. such things soon, too Only we cannot Today there is so much support for Sunju

But I cannot still recover from the manner in which he was arrested The poor boy was shooting in Mauritius when the whole thing started I rang up the chief minister and told him that I have asked my son to return immediately Can you imagine, when he landed up in Bombay there were 50 policemen armed with guns to arrest him? What did they fear when he had tamely listened to me and arrived like a good boy? Would a criminal come home like that, openly?

I come from a conservative family and I brought up my children to behave like middleclass children You can see for yourself how shy my daughter Priya is They have all been shattered by this experience Priya says the novena We pray at both temples and the dargah My children have not learnt to distinguish between religions and have faith in all That is why today we get letters of support from people from different religious groups And we answer each letter personally, because we are glad to see the support that Sunju has

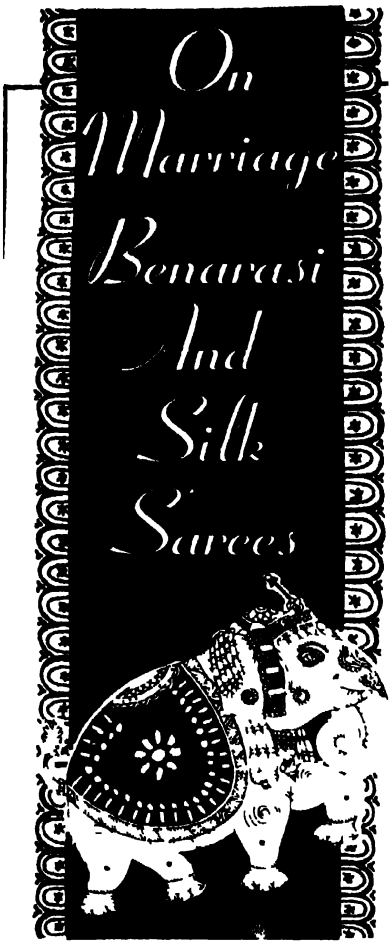
Can you imagine, when he [Sunjay] landed up in Bombay there were 50 policemen armed with guns to arrest him? What did they fear when he had tamely listened to me and arrived like a good boy? Would a criminal come home like that, openly?

This label hurts me very much You know, when we (Priya and I) walked 500 miles in Japan to show our stand against nuclear disarmament, so much warmth was showered on us. The Japanese were so appreciative of our effort. Students used to stand by the lanes and sing songs for us as we passed them.

I took up the cause because I was agonised by the inhuman manner in which people were killed by the dropping of the atom bomb Lives were snuffed out in seconds and there were not even ashes left of them Even in areas around, far away, the heat made the people jump into water holes, which were steaming What a way to die — over two lakh people killed in that fashion I could not bear the thought, which is why I decided to undertake that walk And the Japanese, who were complete strangers to me, treated my daughter and me with so much love and respect for that effort

They would cook food for us Allow us to use their homes for rest We interacted as human beings And that is the most important thing that I have taught my children — to interact as human beings and treat everybody as equals When strangers could appreciate my efforts, my own country for which I have worked so much has hurt me deeply by calling my son a desh drohi Anti-national, desh drohi — these words are something I cannot recover from

And you know Sunjay is really a very affectionate, simple boy You may think I am saying this because I am his father and it is a father's affection which is prompting me But ask Sunju's driver, Prasad After my wife's death Sunjay had taken him on Ask the driver And see how fiercely loyal he is about Sunju Talk to his secretary Pankaj After Sunju was arrested people expected him to leave us But Pankaj had stayed on because of his love for Sunju He does all the legal work now, which eases some burden off me



You can imagine how sweet Sunjay is really For, even in that handcuffing incident, Sunju has changed his mind The other day, when we were talking he told me, "Papa, I was hurt initially at being handcuffed and paraded in the hospital But let us not file a case against the constable, since he may be punished for it And he is an old man " He was so sweet about it despite having suffered humiliation at being paraded like that and having people stare at him in the hospital

I sometimes worry about his health because he has this pneumothorax problem Air bubbles form in his lungs and each time he has had to have surgery done on him Fortunately, the two times this happened he was in New York and we could ensure immediate treatment If something like that recurs, here I don't know

He has also become thin He reads

some books — law and fiction, mainly But otherwise cooped up in one room the whole day, without basic amenities no fan. But my girls have been brave They used to stand for hours outside the jail when he was kept at Thane

I tell my children that we have to be brave It is easy to be a sadhu and run away from life But to live and feel life's pain, that is what living is all about There is a beautiful Urdu couplet which expresses this best. Farishtey se beheter insaan banne mein, Magar isme lagti hai mehnat zyada "

In effect, this is what contemplation and meditation is all about I remember the time when I had made the film Reshma Aur Shera — I had invested all my money in it, mortgaged my house, borrowed Rs 60 lakh If the amount is big today, in the Seventies, it meant even more When creditors started running after me, I went to Swami Muktanandji, to find some peace He told me to sit still in one place and forget everything I tried but failed After sometime, he returned and asked me if I had succeeded I told him, "Swamiji, everytime I shut my eyes I see a row of creditors I cannot unwind " He told me to think of something I enjoyed doing instead So, I thought of the camera, the whole effort of acting And I got deep into a trance-like state

Similarly, I am involved today in the process of trying to reach out to people Be simple And be just a human being This is what is seeing us through But the effort is too much, since it is difficult to shut out my son's suffering I tell everybody concerned, please punish him for his individual lapses

But please do not club him with others who wanted to hurt the country Please do not call him a desh drohi

People tell me that those who have done this to our family will suffer But what difference would that make for Sunjay? It is a question of now This moment Life passes away so fast and I am old How much longer do we have to wait?

He was at the top of his career when this thing happened When he returns, he will go back to that slot There is a grace about him A screen presence And he had worked hard to get there But his best screen quality is his ability to be a comedian, a talent which was exploited by director Daddu (Raj) Sippy well in Thanedaar

We have a funny relationship For instance, I used to know about the girls he was seeing But he never discussed this ever with me and I never asked him about it We were friends and at the same time he treated me with respect But in my family, we have always been very close In other families, fathers expect to be treated with fear The minute the father enters the house everything becomes quiet and hushed But in my house, I play with my grandchildren, behave like a child with them

My children have never been brought up as VIP children I come from a middleclass family My father died when I was just five and my mother became a widow when she was just 25 Imagine having to support a family of three children at that age Partition had driven us to Punjab, from Khurt in Jhelum district Though we got a few tracts of land in exchange for the land we lost during Partition, it was not the same

I used to travel 78 kms to attend school on horseback In my village there were only classes up to second standard That life had toughened me up When I decided to come to Bombay to study in college I took up a job as a shop-recorder for Rs 100 with Bombay Electric Supply and Transport I used to work part-time and attend Jai Hind College I used to make a big fuss over my clothes, wash them in the night The ironwallah was my friend, so he used to press my clothes for free The dhobi, too, so I got a free shave I used to wear only khadi kurta and pyjama then, but the girls in the college used to look admiringly at me because they thought that I was some big neta's son

One day a terrible thing happened I used to sleep on the footpath and one morning I overslept My college girls walked past me I was sure that they had seen me I was feeling very embarrassed when I went to college that day, but fortunately for me the girls had not noticed me on the footpath!

I used to take my wife and children around Bombay to show them the places — the footpaths where I slept, the offices where I worked, and the simple hotels where I used to eat — so that they never forget our origins

In 1962 I decided I decided to sing for our troops at the warfront because I wanted to give back something to my country which had given me so much happiness It is for this reason that I undertook those walks in Amritsar, after the Bhagalpur riots and from Faridabad to Ayodhya I had collected Rs 25 lakh for riot victims

I feel strongly for slum-dwellers Just evicting them from their huts by calling it encroachment does not solve the problem We have a duty towards them. That is also the reason why I decided to enter politics, because I thought this would give me greater opportunity to help them and give greater access to people

I continue with my cancer projects and drug awareness drive That keeps my mind off my personal problems

I got into films accidentally I used to be active in my college's cultural programmes One day I was invited by Radio Ceylon, when they launched it, to do some star interviews My first interview was with Nimmi and was I terrified! Slowly I gained confidence and then the programme became an extended one, an extremely popular one, with me giving short clips on the studio activities - innocent details like the colour of Nutan's car and what time Dilip Kumar entered the sets!

Then one day Ramesh Sehgal suggested that I get into films I told him firmly that I did not want a chhotu-motu role It had to be that of a hero I was called for an audition and given Dilip Kumar's kurta, which was very short for me But I wore it and went through the whole thing as it in a trance Everything seemed to have blacked out in front of my eyes I was so ashamed of my performance that I did not visit the studios for two weeks

Then somebody from there bumped into me and said that everybody was raving about my audition and I signed my first film contract for Rs 150 But I told them that I would not join films till I finished my graduation in history because I had promised my mother

In my village people used to weep in front of my mother, saying that I had ruined my chances of becoming a government servant by joining films

Later when I visited my mother she suggested that I build a small pucca road connecting our village to the farm lands because the oxen used to slip on the fields when the rains came That was the first road to be ever built in my village Later, they said there was no school No hospital

Once I build these, too, the villagers used to visit my mother and tell her, "See, we told you that your son will be a great man one day"

Today I miss not being able to meet my people And that I cannot visit my constituency Since the problem surfaced it has become difficult for me to go out as before

For us, my family and I, time has stood still in that moment when Sunjay was arrested

(As told to Shameem Akthar)

March 21—April 20

Ganesha says, home and property hold centrestage once again. Parents and in-laws, a home away from home, efforts to draw the family closer, will figure prominently On and after July 5, journey and partnerships are clearly emphasised Trips and ties are indicated

April 21—May 20

Like Taurean Sachin Tendulkar, you too will be in a mood to get engaged, get married, have a better-half, thanks to the favourable Venus factor News, views, messages, contacts, collaborations, loans and funds, all these somehow come together in a unified whole for you

May 21—June 20

Mercury in your sign this whole last week, according to Western astrology, helps you converse and communiacte at break-neck speed, and the results will be pleasing as well as profitable There is a sharp focus on family and finance, the two important wheels of your life

Jul 21—July 20

Open up full throttle, as folks will be in a mood to oblige and grant you favours July 1, 2, 8 and 9 are particularly indicated to warm the cockles of your sentimental heart You will be relaxed and happy on and after Wednesday, because Venus, the charmer, enters your sign

July 21—August 21

Once again, expenses, travel and visitors mark the highlights of the week It is absolutely certain that your contacts will pay Understand this fully and work accordingly That is the astro way to make it Family affairs, renovation and new assignments quicken the tempo

August 22—September 22

A surge forward emotionally and physically, thanks to Mars the energiser and Uranus the awakener being in a fine placing Money flies to you and I am sure you will not object to that Rest assured that the opposition will not get the upper hand Trips on the anvil

September 23—October 22

The screws will be really turned on and it will require a tremendous effort to cope with it, but you will succeed for sure, as Venus, your planetary ruler, helps you all the way Be an achiever and plunge into activities with force and renewed vigour Position, or responsibility is in store

October 23—November 22

Be a wheeler-dealer, negotiate with skill and courage, take a panoramic view of situations and people, because that is the way to crash through this week On and after July 5, work will be done and a career, a business take shape splendidly There is plenty of hope now

November 23—December 20

The spotlight shifts to loans and funds, investments, capital formation, shares, debentures and mortgage. Buying, selling and trading are also highlighted Romance and flirtations are foretold and you will enjoy them thoroughly Be very health conscious

December 21—January 19

Partnerships, legal issues, separations are the knitted strands of the week Contradictions come together now giving spice and ice to life itself Trips and collaborations, work, commitments further beef up the picture for you Health needs attending to Learn to relax

Aquarius

January 20—February 18

Ganesha says you will break the bonds that bind you and be free Therefore be prepared for a forward thrust Those in job and profession should aim for the skies For those in business, radical changes are round the corner On and after Tuesday, you will be fully charged

February 19—March 20

Load, fire, reload should be the principle you should follow now for maximum impact Obviously, the week is favourable for influencing others, very specially on and after July 5 Give way to your creative impulses, however wild and crazy these may appear to others In short, go all out

BIRTHDAYS

July 2: Ganesha says those in import-export, media and communications, art and research get more mileage. Your creativity will be the key to your success.

July 3: Moon-sextile sun leads to general progress, but more so for new appointments and ventures. Therefore be bold and confident.

July 4: Moon-Mars conjunction gives you the necessary impetus for changes and final triumph and that is what really counts. A complete change of scenery is foretold.

July 5: Moon's first quarter pushes you literally into the limelight. Renovation, decoration, shifts and major moves are definitely on the cards.

July 6: Moon square Uranus leads to complications. But the moon also trines Mercury and that means an ability to get out of tight situations and be a winner.

July 7: Moon-Venus fine formation denotes love, romance, comforts, promotion and perks, too. So be ready to give your best shot and move ahead.

July 8: Moon trine sun means victory after a sharp struggle. My suggestion is to go all out for victory. New positions of authority and responsibility are on the cards.

HOUSES FOR TREES

In all the hullabaloo over our diminishing forest wealth, we do not hear anything about orchards We take them very much for granted But our fruit gardens are disappearing, too, as the towns and cities grow larger and denser

In small towns all over the country, private orchards often provided the open green spaces and parklands that were otherwise only found in New Delhi or state capitals There are some lovely parks in New Delhi (though not evenly distributed) and some good ones in Lucknow, but where are they to be found in cities as diverse as Shahjehanpur, Bareilly, Saharanpur, Rourkee or, for that matter, Ambala and Amritsar?

Dehra Dun is a case in point Dehra was once famous for its lichi trees Apart from one or two other places in Bihar, it is the only town in northern India where lichis can be grown And yet, the lichi gardens have been diminishing rapidly over the last 10 years, making way for housing colonies and large hotels

You can't blame people for selling their land They get a lot of money for building sites, and only a modest sum for a lichi crop So the lichis must go And the same with guavas and papayas and jackfruit and pomelos

A young man visiting Dehra Dun for the first time some 20 years ago alighted at the railway station and found that he had lost the address of the friends with whom he was to stay He had been told that their house was surrounded by lichi trees

These mango trees or groves are little worlds in themselves and perfect sanctuaries for all kinds of birds. Parrots, mynahs, bluejays, coppersmiths, seven sisters (often eight sisters) all seek the shelter of the tope. Once, under a large tree, I saw a very round face with a solemn expression look out of a hole, and then a little spotted owl flitted silently to the lowest branch of another tree

So he described the place to a tongawala and set off in a tonga. The tongawala took him all over Dehra, past hundreds of houses with lichi trees, before finally depositing the weary traveller (now poorer by a day's tonga fare) at the right house

Today he wouldn't have so much difficulty Tongas are things of the past, and the number of houses still having lichi gardens must be down by about two-thirds

Largely expensive (and usually half empty) hotels, built with government subsidies now occupy the sites of former orchards And even outside the town, the tea gardens have all but vanished (making way for housing colonies) While Dehra's famous basmati rice will have to be grown elsewhere

It is not for me to pass judgment and I am not sure where the solution lies, for human cupidity can only increase with the population

Recently, on the long drive to Delhi through the prosperous heart of Western UP I was heartened to find that the mango orchards were still thriving This is one cash crop that can compete with the demand for sugarcane and wheat And these same mango groves form windbreakers against the swirling dust and hot winds from the south, providing oases of greenery where humans can feel human again

When I walked down the Old Survey Road a few months ago, I noticed that most of the orchard had gone, making way for a new house. But two or three old pomelo trees still grew near the garden wall, and these were in fruit

Between Roorkee, Purkazi, Muzaffarnagar, Khatauli and Meerut, there are old mango grooves and even new plantations The mango will survive, even if we have to start importing our lichis from China

The mango will grow almost everywhere except in the mountains Nor have any other trees been so celebrated in Indian literature and folklore Its blossom has been mentioned by Kalidasa and other poets as one of the darts of Manmatha, the God of love

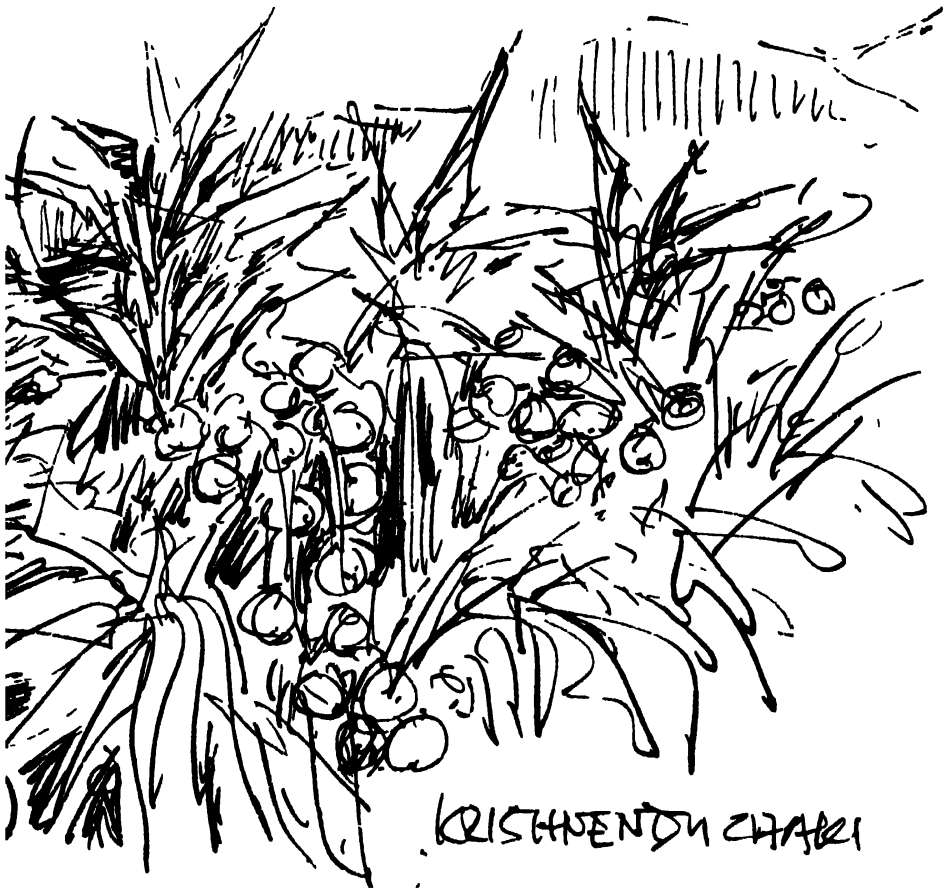
In popular folklore it was known as the "wish-granting-tree" It is widely represented in art and architecture There are so many varieties of the fruit that I would have to write a separate article to describe them in detail

These mango trees or groves are little worlds in themselves and perfect sanctuaries for all kinds of birds Parrots, mynahs, bluejays, coppersmiths, seven sisters (often eight sisters) all seek the shelter of the tope

Once, under a large tree, I saw a very round face with a solemn expression look out of a hole, and then a little spotted owl flitted silently to the lowest branch of another tree

Sometimes the grove resounds to the screams of the green parrots, as they wheel around, all settling at once on the topmost branches, a spectacle of unequalled grace The minivet, the flycatcher and the screaming pied cuckoo are all visitors to the mango grove The grove provides welcome shade and shelter to bird, man and beast, but the best time to visit it is just before sunrise

Then the birds and small animals are at their busiest, and you can watch the sun come up and strike through the branches of the trees as the parrots, green and gold, wheel above you in the sunshine



Fifty years ago, in my grandfather's orchard in Dehra, there were a number of pomelo trees which he had planted The pomelo is a large slightly acidic citrus fruit which I rather liked The trees, too, were good for climbing

When I walked down the Old Survey Road a few months ago, I noticed that most of the orchard had gone, making way for a new house But two or three old pomelo trees still grew near the garden wall, and these were in fruit

I was standing there looking at them when the present owner of the house came to the gate and invited us in, so in we went for a cup of tea She had recognised me, and knew that I had spent part of my childhood in this house We chatted about old times, and then, as I was leaving, she presented me with a large pomelo from the tree

So something of my grandfather had come down to me, after all! I kept the pomelo on my desk for a few days, and then the children and I consumed it Thank you, Mrs Kakkar, for preserving those pomelo trees

MONEY FROM MUCK

They say, "Where there's muck, there's money," and it's true in more ways than one Cities have wealth but on their outskirts also stand huge landfills overflowing with garbage and circled by ornithologically fascinating scavengers

In Delhi, rubbish often falls by the wayside, and never quite reaches the municipal bins it is intended for In such wayside refuse are occasional envelopes revealing the litterbug I have, once or twice, recovered a smelly envelope, rushed to the address thereon and confronted the offender with the evidence — a futile gesture

More positive action is being taken by the NGOs One of them, Shrishti, now sends a cleaning operative in a smart red uniform to take the garbage away from each house in my neighbourhood every morning for a nominal fee

Shrishti's usefulness is proved by its growing network of garbage collectors But removing rubbish and keeping it off the streets is only the beginning of the problem

It needs to be processed There is, of course, always the smallscale option of a home worm composting system A worm bin is something every home can afford, as it takes up very little space and costs next to nothing This clever, though to many, unappealing, idea for converting waste to compost (called vermiculture) is being promoted in India by the organisation, Trees for Life

All you need is a small, ventilated bin, 800 grams of red worms and a daily supply of 400 grams of rottable household waste to keep them happy However, it is all rather labour-intensive and I am doubtful about my ability to harvest — to separate the worms from the compost they produce

Red worms breed fast, and each bin-owner is encouraged to regularly share out his worms among others But even if they take off so to speak, they will never have the total answer for a country which produces 700 million tonnes of rottable waste every year

The company which still seems to have the best answer is Excel Having started production in Bombay three years ago, it is now spreading out over India — to Bhopal, Calcutta, Bangalore and Hyderabad There's even a smallscale plant inside the Tihar jail

The raw material is rubbish from the municipal tip and Excel works at the dump sites themselves to convert it into 100 per cent organic fertiliser, thereby, constantly emptying the dump and freeing space for more refuse Their technology is 100 per cent Indian, and their staff have total commitment to their cause

S Senthil Kumar is one of them By training an electronics engineer, he now has developed a missionary zeal to give power to the people in the countryside, and stop the drift into the cities Recycled rubbish, he told me, should do just this

"Farmers," he said, "are sitting on a goldmine, and we want to give them the means to dig up that gold Chemical fertilisers only give a few nutrients, but our compost gives yield with taste and enriches the soil These vegetables here," he continued, pointing to a basket of onions and carrots of exceptionally large proportions, "are grown solely using our compost as fertiliser "

This organic compost, Celrich, is not advertised because Excel has been in the agricultural business for years, though not organically, and has a network to supply directly to farmers

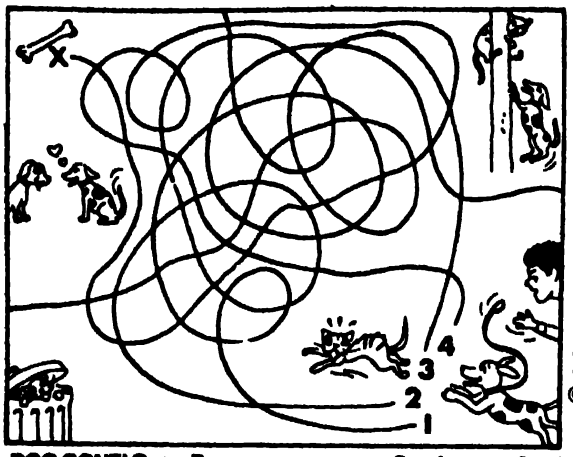
The company's problem is demand vastly outstrips supply For sometime they have realised that organic farming is the 'in-thing' and have tried to get in first so as to have a headstart in the future They aim eventually to provide a complete rural supermarket service, supplying drip irrigation, seeds and what's now called "plant protection"

They also want to buy back the farmer's produce from him, ensuring him a better price that is provided by the many layers of middlemen that stand between the grower and the cities If it succeeds, then Excel will have constructed a perfect circle — from urban rubbish, to organic manure, to crops grown in the countryside and sold in the cities

It's in the cities that their operations are so impressive In the main plant at Chincholi, by far the biggest of Bombay's dumps, they process 700 tonnes of garbage a day, producing 100 tonnes of compost The process is disarmingly simple and all rubbish is grist to their mill

Newly arrived garbage is piled up and masked workers in caps, gumboots and gloves spray microberich slurry over it In just an hour the evil smell natural to garbage is gone, and the ragpickers can move in

Needless to say, ragpickers don't have access to protective clothing, but at least the rubbish is less dangerous and malodorous than that they would usually deal with



The heaps of rubbish are regularly turned by bulldozers as they rot quickly under the effect of the slurry Then the unsorted compost rides up the conveyor belts winding into the belly of the great, grey factory and is thoroughly agitated in huge metal cylinders The agitator shakes out pebbles, plastic and glass, and the pure organic Celrich spurts out of a shoot into the back of a truck and is taken away to be packed

The joke in the company is that Excel were the first to export Bombay's garbage to the Gulf and get paid for it Celrich isn't exported there so much now and the company helped Oman set up its own plant. They are prepared to help any other likely entreprenuer in the towns and cities of the world

In other words, Excel will franchise garbage treatment like MacDonald's franchises hamburgers So here is the opportunity for right-minded citizens to make money from muck And perhaps the rest of us can rest at ease, knowing that to consume is not quite as unredeemably sinful as some might have us believe (Sanctuary Features)

SEEING is believing, it is said, but there are occasions when what our eyes perceive may be illusory A good example is in viewing the inverted pyramid design depicted above

Hold this drawing at a customary reading distance and fix your gaze somewhere in the middle

Alakazam, the pyramid appears to divide into a stack of individual rectangles of graduated size

To dispel this illusion, simply start at the bottom and trace your way (if you can) to the top You will discover that the design consists of a single continuous line

It's an amusing design and flat-out eye teaser

CHIMP TALK

According to recent experiments, the Bonobo or pygmy chimps, which some scientists believe are more humanlike and intelligent than the common chimpanzees studied earlier, can understand complex sentences and communicate with the outside world George Johnson on the ruckus raised

Panbanisha, a Bonobo chimpanzee which has become something of a star among animal language researchers, was strolling through the Georgia woods with a group of her fellow primates — scientists at the Language Research Center at Georgia State University in Atlanta

Suddenly, the chimp pulled one of them aside Grabbing a special keyboard of the kind used to teach severely retarded children to communicate, she repeatedly pressed three symbols —Fight, Mad, Austin — in various combinations

Austin is the name of another chimpanzee at the centre Dr Sue Savage-Rumbaugh, one of Panbanisha's trainers, asked, "Was there a fight at Austin's house?"

"Waa, waa, waa," said the chimpanzee, in what Dr Savage-Rumbaugh took as a sign of affirmation' She rushed to the building where Austin lives and learned that earlier in the day two of the chimps there, a mother and her son, had fought over which got to play with a computer and joystick used as part of the training programme

The son had bitten his mother, causing a ruckus that, Dr Savage-Rumbaugh surmised, had been overheard by Panbanisha, who lived in another building about 200 away

As Dr Savage-Rumbaugh saw it, Panbanisha had a secret she urgently wanted to tell A decade-and-a-half after the claims of animal language researchers were discredited as exaggerated self-delusions, Dr Savage-Rumbaugh is reporting that her chimpanzees can demonstrate the rudimentary comprehension skills of two-year-old children

According to a series of recent papers, the Bonobo, or pygmy chimps, which some scientists believe are more humanlike and intelligent than the common chimpanzees studied in the earlier, flawed experiments, have learned to understand complex sentences and use symbolic language to communicate spontaneously with the outside world

"She had never put those three lexigrams together," Dr Savage-Rumbaugh said, referring to the keyboard symbols with which the animals are trained She found the incident particularly gratifying because the chimp seemed to be using the symbols not to demand food, which is usually the case in these experiments, but to gossip

Dr Stuart Shanker and his colleagues insist that Savage-Rumbaugh's experiments suggest there is not an unbridgeable divide between humans and the rest of the animal kingdom'

In a book to be published later this year, Apes, Language and the Human Mind Philosophical Primatology (Routledge), Dr Savage-Rumbaugh and her co-authors, Dr Stuart Shanker, a philosopher at York University in Toronto, and Dr Talbot Taylor, a linguist at the College of William and Mary in Virginia, argue that the feats of the chimps at the Language Research Center are so impressive that scientists must now re-evaluate some of their most basic ideas about the nature of language

Most language experts dismiss experiments like the ones with Panbanisha as exercises in wishful thinking "In my mind this kind of research is more analogous to the bears in the Moscow circus who are trained to ride unicycles," said Dr Steven Pinker, a cognitive scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who studies language acquisition in children ' You can train animals to do all kinds of amazing things "

He is not convinced that the chimps have learned anything more sophisticated than how to press the right buttons in order to get the hairless apes on the other side of the console to cough up M & M s, bananas and other tidbits of food

Dr Noam Chomsky, the MIT linguist whose theory that language is innate and unique to people forms the infrastructure of the field, says that attempting to teach linguistic skills to animals is irrational — like trying to teach people to flap their arms and fly "Humans can fly about 30' — that is what they do in the Olympics," he said in an interview "Is that flying?" The question is totally meaningless

"In fact, the analogy to flying is misleading because when humans fly 30', the organs they are using are kind of homologous to the ones that chickens and eagles use "

Arms and wings, in other words, arise from the same branch of the evolutionary tree "Whatever the chimps are doing is not even homologous as far as we know," he said There is no evidence that the chimpanzee's utterances emerge from anything like the "language organ"

Chomsky believes it resides only in human brains This neural wiring is said to be the source of the universal

grammar that unites all languages But some philosophers, like Shanker, complain that the linguists are applying a double standard: they dismiss skills — like putting together a noun and a verb to form a two-word sentence — that they consider nascent

He [Dr Steven Pinker], a cognitive scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is not convinced that the chimps have learned anything more sophisticated than how to press the right buttons in order to get the hairless apes on the other side of the console to cough up M & Ms, bananas and other tidbits of food linguistic abilities in a very young child "The linguists kept upping their demands and Sue kept meeting the demands," said Shanker "But the linguists keep moving the goal post"

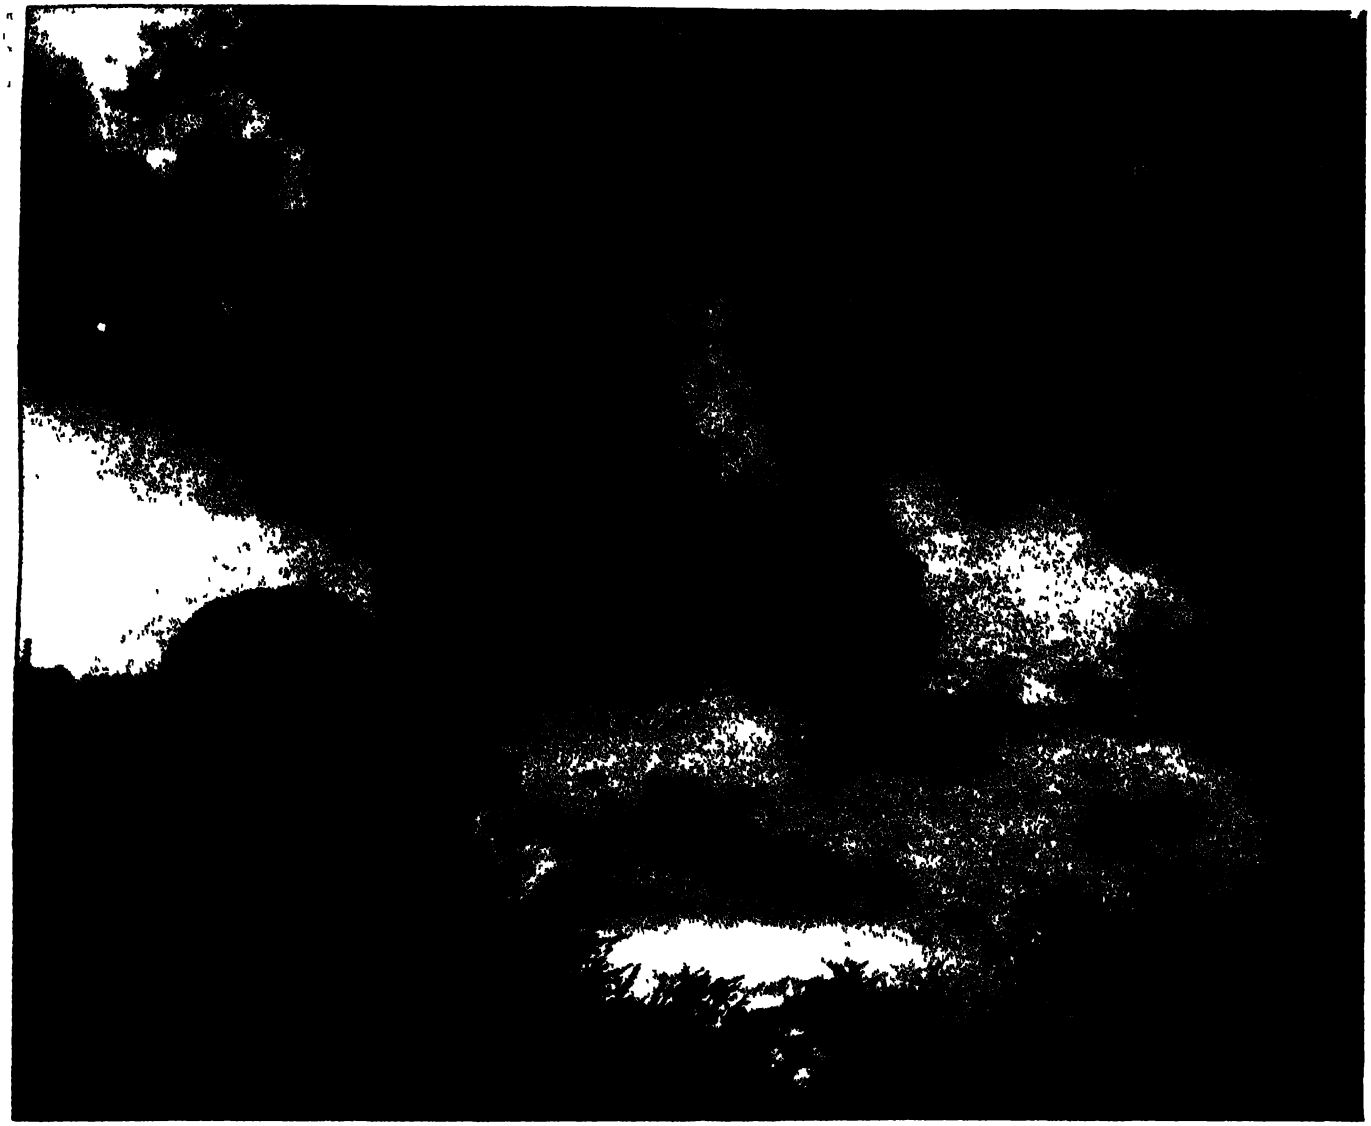
Following Chomsky, most linguists argue that special neural circuitry needed for language evolved after man's ancestors split from those of the chimps millions of years ago

As evidence they note how quickly children, unlike chimpanzees, go from cobbling together two-word utterances to effortlessly spinning out complex sentences with phrases embedded within phrases like Russian dolls



But Shanker and his colleagues insist that Savage-Rumbaugh's experiments suggest that there is not an unbridgeable divide between humans and the rest of the animal kingdom, as orthodox linguists believe, but rather a gradation of linguistic skills In a forthcoming book, The Engine of Reason, the Seat of the Soul A Philosophical Journey into the Brain (MIT Press), Dr Paul Churchland, a philosopher and cognitive scientist at the University of California at San Diego, says linguists should take Dr Savage-Rumbaugh's experiments as a challenge

He argues that the jury is still out the rules for constructing sentences might turn out to be not so much hardwired as a result of learning — by people and potentially by their chimpanzee relatives

The Night

The night, left out by barred windows of content houses
weeps on my shoulders
I count its age
by annular rings of lights on highway — far-off candles at my lonely, open air birthday dinner, breaking the night into gold rimmed, concentric shells of friendly darkness

Between the Basement and the Bunker

My father, unworthy of the warmth of the sun was driven to dwell in a dingy hole underground,
- in the basement - the overwhelming ordour of which did not let his torpid mind go adrift

for a moment
from the care of penury, and, the despair caused by the utter want of power

My son,
most worthy of all the goods under the sun has been driven underground
into a palatial hole,
- into the bunker - the overwhelming grandeur of which does not let his tortured mind go adrift
for a moment
from the dread of the loss of fortune, glory and power

Muriel's Wedding This Australian movie is about an isolated, and ABBA-crazy, Muriel (Tony Collette), who wants to get married and be popular In fact, marital bliss, she is convinced, will be a sure path to Waterloo

But she comes to realise in the end that it is better to be just oneself

Beneath the campus veneer, lurks the sadistic peer-pressure that girls about to get married hurl at one another

The film whips up laughter by getting Muriel to wear some tight clothes so she will look fat and ugly and prizes her when she looks pretty in a traditional way

Supporting characters are either afflicted with cancer or commit suicide so that the message for Muriel rings loud and clear about what is truly relevant in life

r, Samhit Sengupta.

He seeks to give "spirituality" to product packaging and feels that in India, where food is considered sacred,

that to e

me more than a pleasure. It should become a way of life.

It is this philosophy which the book upholds as it guides one in the quest for unique design solutions.

The author's ideas are crystallised into what he terms a Consumer Pyramid, and Ten Commandments of Strategic Design.

He also probes the creative possibilities in establishing a brand image and the individual demands it makes on companies to get the maximum out of the products' potential.

Bearing testimony to the success of his company, Skin-

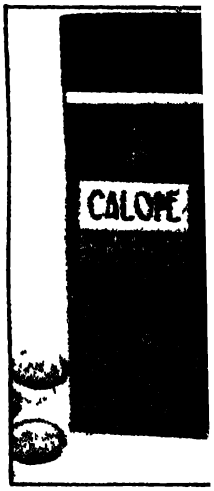
Soft 'n' gold Imagine yourself taking a break from this sweltering heat, sprawling under a giant umbrella next to a pool, sipping a glass of chilled Canada Dry

Cadbury Schweppes Beverages India Private Limited has launched its international soft drink flavour, Canada Dry, in association with their franchisee Pure Drinks Private Limited

This 'Champagne of soft drinks' is a blend of citrus, vanilla and ginger flavours Light, crisp, and golden, it is meant for those 'mature' men and women who can 'appreciate a truly independent soft drink' Packaged in a 300 ml green bottle, the drink costs Rs 5 50

Clean air If you think you can avoid inhaling dust, smoke or pollen particles by staying indoors, well, you are wrong But now Pollenex has brought in a breath of fresh air with their electronic ioniser!



It is a compact, sophisticated electronic device that cleans air by emitting zillions of negatively charged ions that act like magnets, attracting microscopic dust particles

One can plug one right into any wall outlet as this tiny thing (1/2"X3") is very inconspicuous With 'On' indicator light and a collector pad that can be rinsed and replaced, this gadget might be handy for your room Try your luck at shops selling foreign goods and get one for your living room — or, perhaps, one for each room

HEALTH

Herbal skin-care: Following the call for herbal products like herbal oils, shampoos, cosmetics and medicines, Calope capsules is here to stay.

Introduced by Geutech Laboratories Limited, this oral skin health nutrient is rich in exotic ingredients. It contains Evening Primrose oil and two essential fatty acids — GLA (Gamma Linolenic Acid) and LA (Linolenic Acid). The product claims that these acids rejuvenate the skin's moisture retaining capacity. It also eliminates wrinkles at the source and improves skin tone.

Priced at Rs 383 for a pack of 60 capsules, 'Calope is available in select chemists' and departmental stores.

Bride and Prejudice

■ It is not every day that we get to hear of an Indian making news overseas; moreso in an area as alien to Indians as fashion ('Cut and Thrust', June 11).

Tarun Tahiliani was almost making history when lady luck deserted him and his dreams were shattered. What could have been more disappointing than to be told at the 11th hour that the bride would not don his tailored trousseau, but would get married in a traditional Western outfit?

For a designer who had given his heart and soul to create the bride's outfit ('She is a dream person to dress', Tahiliani had said in the Magazine), the decision must have come as a rude shock. Hurting his sentiments more than humiliating him.

Does it then mean that Indian fashion is spurned abroad?

Aparajita Mukherjee,
Calcutta

■ Much as Jemima would have loved to wrap herself in Tahiliani's dream lines, she had to give in to her father's wishes. And a skirt and jacket it was and not a salwar-kameez.

No matter how lovingly you embrace a religion and culture, it is difficult to give up your own identity. So Jemima may have converted to Islam, but at heart will she not always remain a Westerner?

Hounded by the Press which was so critical of her marriage with a Muslim, she had little choice but to give in to the pressures at Imran Khan, in a feeble bid to preserve his Islamic identity, stuck to his churidar-kurta and Nehru jacket.

R.N. Chowdhury,
Calcutta

■ There are villages where people cannot afford to buy food, leave alone clothes. Should we then bother ourselves with Versace and YSL?

R. Chatterjee,
Asansol (W.B.)

■ Any designer should try to incorporate the colours, patterns and traditions of his land into his creations. Tahiliani's dresses were intrinsically Oriental. No wonder Jemima, a recent convert to Islam and one fascinated by the East, had chosen Tahiliani.

Jawed Nehal Qureishi,
Calcutta

■ I wonder if Tarun Tahiliani is a qualified designer. In this fiercely competitive age being creative is just not enough, the aspirant should be armed with certificates to establish his credibility.

Subhashis Ray,
Rourkela

■ Is the Magazine a fashion glossy? How many of the middle-class readers would be interested in Tarun Tahiliani whose clothes are in any case beyond their reach? It is difficult to believe that an outfit can cost as much as Rs 2 lakh.

Sanjib Dutta,
Calcutta

SO YOU THINI

THERE ARE VARIOUS PEOPLE WHO, FOR A VARIETY OF REASONS, are believed to have been extremely unlucky However, a closer examination would suggest that perhaps they were better off than most people realise For example

ROMEO AND JULIET

For generations, for hundreds of millions of people round the world, these star-crossed lovers, dead by their own hands, have been a symbol of tragedy — young love cruelly cut short.

No one reads the play without a tear in the eye and a sigh for what might have been.

They should thank their stars. Try and imagine what would have happened if the duo had escaped with their lives, secured parental permission and got married.

It is 35 years later (than their date of expiry). Early morning. Juliet looks a little different since she has put on 93 kgs of weight, her greying hair is in medieval curlers, the fabled beauty showing the effects of having borne nine children (Normal, and anyway, do not forget this was immortal passion) The face is not fully visible because it is covered with cream she has forgotten to wash off

The cream has not improved her looks, but it has stopped any more children

She is trying to ensure that six of the school-going ones have their lunch with them, their stylus in hand and actually set off in approximately the right direction The other three, aged five, three and two, are clinging onto her like papayas from a tree With one hand she swats whichever is closest, with the other she checks the stale pineapples the thelawala is trying to palm off to her

"Thou art a crook," she swears "Verily sirrah, I shall so get my kinsmen to impale thee, that never again shalt thou swive a damsel fair "

But the thelawala knows she is not serious, since she is keeping a close eye on Romeo who is taking a suspiciously long time to saddle his horse before setting off to office, which may not be unconnected to the fact that the neighbour's 15-year-old daughter is combing her hair on the balustrade, something she has been doing far too regularly the last month this time of the morning

But Juliet holds her peace since she has had a raging row with Romeo over the self-same nymphet just this morning

And besides, anyway, the thelawala feels, fain should Mistress Juliet speak of swiving Had not his friend, the dashing sword instructor, told him in his cups, of the refuge his sword had found and oft, in Mistress Juliet's wondrous sheath? And verily, two of the brats in sooth did bear a passing resemblance most strange to the swordsman

And Master Romeo, ah, a figure still to make the ladies sigh, though no doubt limping due to the gout and, of course, if he could only get back just some of his hair.

TERRORISTS, NOW THAT THERE IS NO TADA

Since people, whom the police know to be guilty, but without proof, can no longer be kept forcibly in jail, our cops have to resort to unconventional methods to make them stay in prison

If they leave, they are sure to commit further mayhem, leading to acute problems for the police

IG Adhik Ved to Shaitan Dubaiya who is flipping through a Playboy copy Shaitan Sahib, I am told you are not pleased with the hospitality we offer here in jail and plan to leave tomorrow morning May I humbly know the reason for your annoyance?

Shaitan Last night you put me up in your office to sleep because you know I feel upset without an air conditioner But somehow, mazaa nahin aaya So I am leaving

IG (trembling like a leaf) Shaitan Sahib, a thousand pardons Gustakhi maaph Tonight, I will personally stand behind you all night and fan you with copies of the Indian Penal Code while you take your rest

Shaitan I will think But I was shattered by the gulab jamuns from the Taj Hotel Just shattered There was hardly any mitthas to them I cannot bear this inhumanity anymore I am leaving

IG (desperately) A thousand pardons But see, here is a box of pedas A BSF plane has specially flown down for you from Mathura They are said to be the best in the world

Shaitan (examining them) What? But where is the silver foil wrapping them? I am going to leave this very minute

IG (laying his cap at Shaitan's feet) Forgive me, forgive me A horrible error For the sake of my family, my growing children, I implore you Stay Don't ruin my career

Shaitan (signing and selecting a peda) What to do? I have always been too tender-hearted All right Just one more day But make sure my clothes being laundered in Paris arrive on time and no more of this Indian five-star food, understand? I have developed a fondness for Icelandic mackerel

IG (clasping Shaitan's hand) Thank you Thank you You are a truly good human being, a real patriot

CENSORS

Most people think they have a thankless job, watching dozens of dimwitted films every week We try and imagine what must go on as they examine the latest offering

Main Censor (MC) to Assistant Censor (AC) Kindly freeze the frame right here

There is a timid knock on the door and a man creeps in

MC (sharply) Yes? Don't you see how busy we are protecting the nation's morals? In this very rainfall sequence we have to ascertain whether the heroine is wearing any undergarments or not Can you imagine the fate of the nation if we take a wrong decision? It will collapse Collapse, I tell you! Projectionist, please magnify the picture so we can see for ourselves. Ah, yes. Thank you Assistant Censorji, I think there is no doubt that the heroine*ji* has been forgetful in dressing up this morning. This will not do at all. After all we have a responsibility. Refuse them a certificate.

Man: Sir. I have been sent by the Producer Sahib only He felt there may be a problem and has begged the pleasure of your company and, of course, the AC*ji* for dinner tonight so, he can personally explain to you the subtle and artistic reasoning behind our most respected heroine*ji*'s lack of underwear in the rain dance

MC (sternly) I neither take nor give hospitality to filmmakers

Man Of course, sir But since the heroine*ji*, too, wishes to explain personally and will be waiting anxiously in the hotel suite for the producer to accompany you to the door, I hope you and AC*ji* will reconsider

MC Oh, I see Well, one must not discourage young talent, that is what I always feel It is our duty What do you think AC?

AC I am always with you, sir

POLITICIANS WHO LEAVE THE RULING PARTY

Everyone imagines they must lead a life of wretched loneliness Not really.

PS to the Departed Leader Sir, four editors of national newspapers want your daily abuse of the ruling party Departed Leader· Give them time.

PS Sir, the heads of the Opposition parties would like to see you to plan a common strategy for the next election

Departed Leader Call them for dinner

PS Sir, several disgruntled MPs of the ruling party are keen to meet you in private

Departed Leader Ask them to come at midnight

PS (excited) Sir, some Ministers of State have expressed a desire to communicate through common friends

Departed Leader Why?

PS They are angry because they have not been promoted in the reshuffle And sir, (really thrilled now), relatives of many Cabinet members have called to wish you in anticipation of your birthday, though it is several months away

Departed Leader (warily) Why?

PS They say they never know when you may be back

SECTION OFFICER IN THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA WHO IS ON HIS 16TH EXTENSION

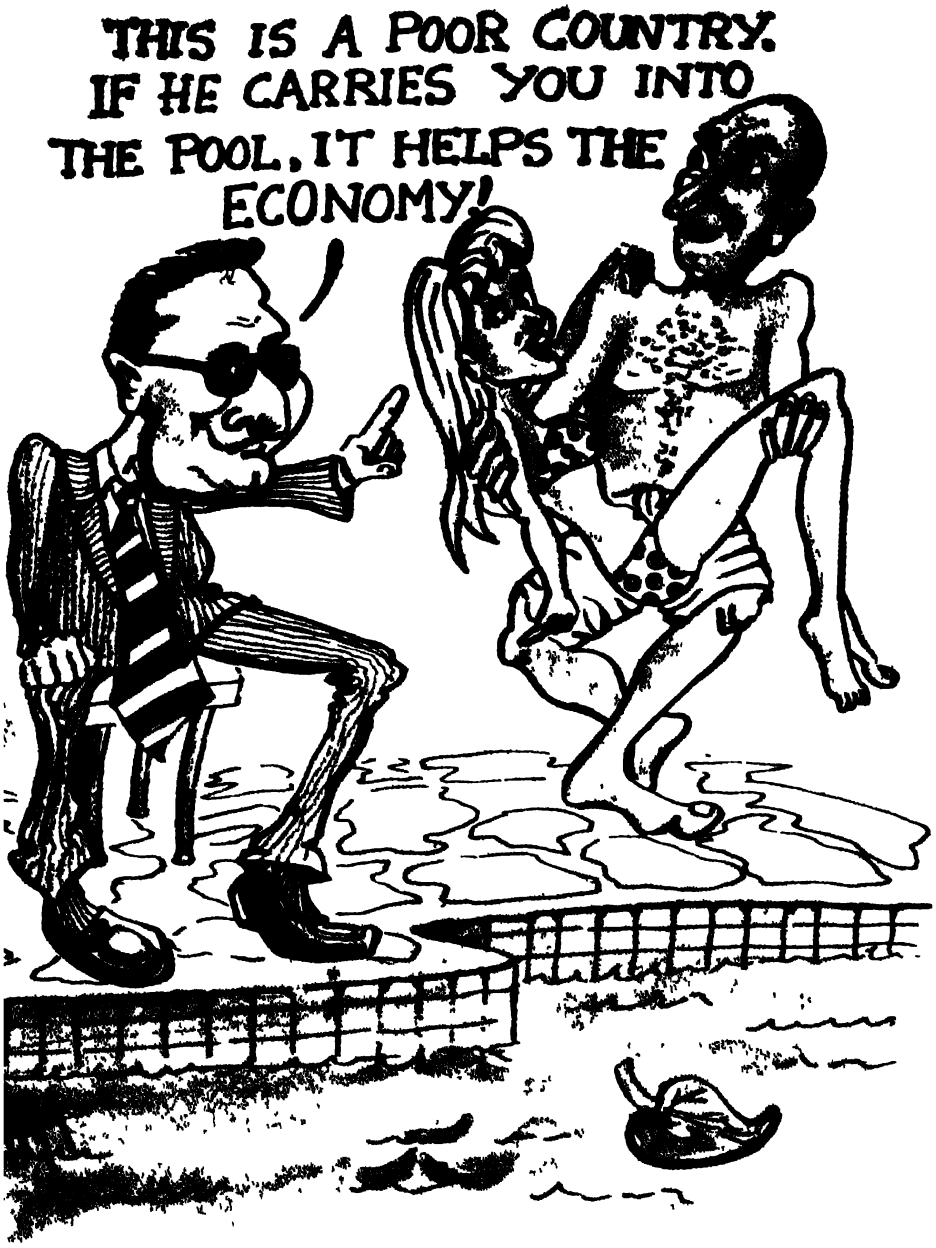
He is much pitied because he is always at work No one realises he actually runs the government

Hot Shot in the PMO Sir, I have found this Section Officer who has been given endless extensions It's time they were stopped

Old Hand Before that, shouldn't you answer the questions from the Press on the allegations of there being secret clauses in the Shimla Accord? Ask the Section Officer

Hot Shot (on the phone) What's this nonsense about secret clauses in the Shimla Accord?

Section Officer It's true, sir



Hot Shot Then dammit, where is the original of the Accord? It will prove our case in the UN on Kashmir conclusively

Section Officer It was carefully filed, sir The rats ate it

Hot Shot Who will believe that?

Section Officer Nobody, sir That's why we can't tell anyone why we can't show the Accord

Old Hand You see now, why we cannot let him retire He's the only one who knows what's happened to all the files

FOREIGN EXECUTIVES IN INDIA

They are much pitied by their near and dear ones for having to serve here A conversation between an FEI and a visiting relative

Relative My dear, how dreadful for you, having to live in this awful country in this tiny eight-bedroom mansion

Executive Yes, we were much more comfortable in our bed-sitter above the fish and chips shop back home

Relative Really, darling And the heat Why, I can hardly find the energy to slip off this chair into the swimming pool And look, the gardeners have left a leaf floating in the pool (shuddering)! How ghastly How filthy How can you live here?

Executive Poor thing Don't exhaust yourself Ask the servants to lift you into the pool

Relative That's another thing Absolutely no privacy with all these hordes of servants around You poor thing

Executive True Life was so much more comfortable in our bed-sitter when we had to do our own cooking, cleaning, washing, laundering, ironing, vacuuming and driving But the way I see it, hiring servants is my own way of helping the economy here It is a poor country, you know And one does what one can But dear, to be fair, they do come in handy for the daily entertaining

Relative It's noble of you to say so, dear But I know you much preferred nipping down for a nice bit of fish since you could always smell the kind of fish they were frying

Executive (laughing bravely) I never could fool you, darling But duty, you know White Man's burden and all that Relative Sometimes I think you are a saint, love No wonder you get a hardship allowance. You deserve every bit of it ■

AND WHAT ELSE?

What's this about superstitions, asks
Rajlakshmi Bhattacharyya, while narrating some of the popular beliefs*

When Henry Bourne, the curate of the Parochial chapel of All Saints in Newcastle upon Tyne, wrote Antiquitates Vulgares or, the Antiquities of the Common People, in 1725, it was with the idea of rescuing his parishioners from opinions which were regarded as "the produce of heathenism" or "the inventions of the devil", which he felt were weaning away people from an absolute faith in the providence of God

As the age of rationalism gained in momentum during the 17th and 18th centuries, superstitions declined in intensity and number, and by about the middle of the 18th century, it was looked to with nostalgic regret

Today the actual significance of most of the superstitions have been forgotten Omens that once prognosticated death are now merely the harbingers, it is believed, of 'bad luck'

Nevertheless, many people nurture those that have come down from their families, through mothers and grandmothers who are considered the traditional custodians of folklore and fantasies

Some superstitions are so popular, points out Moira Tatem and Iona Opie in the Oxford Dictionary of Superstitions, they are now a part of our language, the most likely instance being 'Touchwood' where one had to actually knock on wood to save oneself from a boastful taunting

These, and others such as the crossing of knives, walking under a ladder, spilling salt, or dreading Friday the 13th, remain as a sort of supplement to our ideas of what is essentially good and bad in the world

The number 13 is considered highly ominous, for, it dates back to the time when Jesus had sat down to sup with 12 of his disciples, among whom one, Judas Iscariot, was fated to betray him

Maybe since then, hostesses have never enjoyed having 13 people at the table and would hastily make arrangements for the 14th guest if possible

Some hotels like the plush Carlton Tower in Knightsbridge, London, is described as having 18 storeys, but has only 17 floors Number 13 is missing!

Friday is considered unlucky in itself for it was on this day that Jesus suffered on the cross No new work or marriage is solemnised on that unlucky day

As for the potent combination of Friday and 13, a whole cluster of superstitions abound Spilling salt on that day could bring a major disaster unless you throw some behind your left shoulder

On the way to work, steer clear of rooks, ravens, magpies, owls, swans and lizards should you want to avert death But you are in for luck if you spot a toad, a priest or a nun

Eating fish on Friday the 13th is okay, but if you are digging into salmons, better keep mum about it

Spill tea on the table cloth on that day and it could mean your blood will be spilt before the morning is out On any given day, it is unlucky to stir your tea with anything else but a spoon Stirring someone else's tea means stirring up strife

Since superstitions cover every aspect of human life, one is not surprised to hear of a bat in the room as a token of evil If a bat is carried three times round the house and then nailed outside the window with the head downwards, it will have the effects of a counter charm

To disarm evil as when a black cat crosses one's path from left to right which means they will have a puncture, one has but to stop the ignition of the car, or to give a friend anything black, as a black hen, a black dog or even a black cat

If black is a mystical colour in Scotland, it has always been clubbed together with the metamorphoses of Satan, or his carrier, such as a black cock

While the black sheep in Sussex is an omen of good luck, in Ireland, the first of the flock if born black, foretells mourning garments for the family within the year

White as a contrast, too, could bring evil In Chesire, the boys spit on anything white, be it a horse, a cat, flannels or even a white straw hat Some will put the blame of their misfortune on a friend who has sent them a gift of white flowers Midland lilacs, when white, are regarded as sure signs of death In Assam, the killing of a white wood duck invites, it is said, the wrath of the gods

While a white horse is unlucky, a grey one at a wedding is lucky Widows are branded inauspicious for such occasions worldwide Folklore has it, a lover will not give a white opal ring to his sweetheart for opals signify widowhood and tears

Colours in the theatre world are of immense import, according to another folklore record Blue is an unlucky colour for the players, silver being its only saving relief Certain shades of yellow in a tie, or vest or hat are thought to exert an injurious influence Even the orchestra leader would not allow a musician to play a yellow clarion

Superstitions in India are as myriad as there are ways to counteract their evil Sneeze when the person embarks on a journey, and he is in for trouble The thing to do is to come and rest awhile before starting on again, or to count up to 13 In the West, they say "bless you", because a sneeze momentarily forces the soul out of the body and leaves it vulnerable to the predations of the devil

A bit of a doggerel heard in many a homestead is "If you mend your clothes on your back, you will live much money to lack" And, "If you mend clothing on you, someone is telling lies about you"

Since men have been known throughout the ages as self-tormentors, the bad omens provide a catalogue which is at once more varied than the good They speak of man's fears of disobedience, of darkness and retribution They mirror the insecurity looming large in their lives ■

STRAINING AT THE LEASH

As life becomes more complicated, and stressful, we can only look back and learn a lesson, says Rumu Ray Chaudhury

We all carry a chip on our shoulder In our younger, fancy-free years, we did have problems and they always seemed to be very serious ones, which could never be solved

However, amazingly enough, anything new happening around us made the previous one trivial and we quickly forgot the issue on which life and death was dependent, and carried on with life!

But that was when we were young As we start facing real life with jobs, families, social commitments, with success or failure at every corner, we seem to place some extra baggage on our shoulder — some point has to be made There is a score to settle, and life becomes heavier and gloomier at each step we take

To some it is the success in their working life or their colleagues' success that worries them more Some are always worried about the running of their household — the success of the children, or their current status in society vis-a-vis the Joneses or the Jhunjhunwalas Apart from all these, there is also the extra baggage of different emotions, such as anger, hate and jealousy towards the near and dear ones or the society as a whole, and the load is too heavy a one to tote

Sometime back I had a shooting pain from my shoulder going up to the neck and giving me migraine I went to see a neurologist friend of mine who gave me some medicines and enquired about the worries that I was having, as it could be a psychosomatic pain arising from stress

I denied politely making it a point that I led a very smooth and happy life, almost like the women we see in the TV ads

But after returning home, sitting with my own thoughts, I shuddered to think of my ongoing predicaments

Dear God, do I have worries! The maid is playing hookey, the children's school exams are near, the car needs overhauling, the house needs a coat of paint, certain social commitments have to be met, worries after worries flooded my mind and oh, what a migraine I had! Desperately I sought comfort in pills

But was it the same in the earlier days? It seems to me life must have been easier as the pace was slower and people had time to deal with their emotions This present day of noise and speed, change of political scene, a new war every day in some part of the world, our thoughts are tried out at every step We are like bewildered children on a rollercoaster It is elating to be on it, but we do not know whether to face it with fear or excitement

This present day of noise and speed, change of political scene, every day a new war in some part of the world, our thoughts are tried out at every step. We are like bewildered children on a roller-coaster It is elating to be on it, but we do not know whether to face it with fear or excitement

It is very interesting to see how men and women create their own stress levels in very different ways From the very beginning men have been taught to be strong, dependable, brave, and to stand firm against all ad erse situations Their emotions are also accepted as real strong and steady ones

So, basically the vanity that has been implanted in their own minds when they were nice little boys creates havoc in their later lives As they go into their jobs and start earning their living, every step they take, the thought of being able to do better, sits on their shoulder and grows heavier with each passing day of the rat race

There is no harm in improving one's own self, but I feel pain to see that it becomes a baggage that they cannot unburden As the famous Bengali author, Buddhadev Guha, puts it, "Men do not live on what they eat, they chew on their ego to stay alive"

Sure enough these are not the problems of men alone Women by virtue of their birth look at life in a more utopian way Particularly now, when being a woman means she has to be efficient, have a perfect figure, preferably be a working woman, have all the right answers for everything as if she were Sushmita Sen and, last but not the least, she has to be a superwife and a supermother

Every little point to be 'scored' creates stress We would love the men to treat us equally, but it would be wonderful if they treated us chivalrously as well! Life does seem every bit unfair, and the bond of marriage itself is strained Both the partners feel the pressure and do not have the time or patience for each other We forget about loving and caring, the tender feelings and lose perspectives

Does it have to be this way? Why don't we stop and start all over again Actor Paul Newman was asked how his marriage had survived in Hollywood, where marriage was worth a penny, and he answered, "This is the age of disposable goods, plastics, even disposable wife and children! But in our house if a toaster does not work we do not dispose of it, we try to mend it Similarly with our relationships, when things go wrong we try to sort it out instead of discarding the relationship"

In the long run it seems to me it is the attitude that guides our actions Although we love to have our freedom, small compromises, little thoughtful gestures, do bring about a longer lasting relationship

So, loosen up a bit, laugh at every chance you get (it is good for your lungs, too!) and just go easy on the emotions, for everyday we walk one step forward towards our end

It would be the achievement of our life if we can think like the famous poet Yevtushanko—

Sorrow happens, hardship happens
The hell with it
Who never knew the price of happiness
Will not be happy

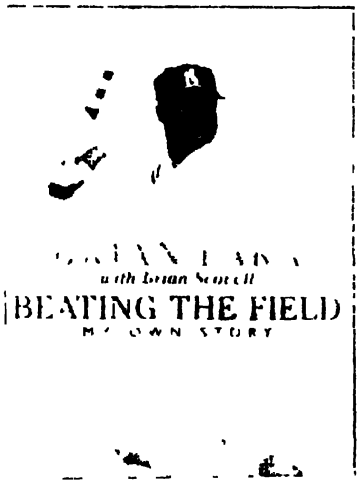
'Please Let Me Go Home'

All my frustrations about having my Test career delayed for so long came out at Edgbaston the day before the Fourth Test between England and the West Indies started there in 1991. A few weeks earlier Viv Richards told me "Don't worry about your pick for England. You'll be in the sixteen." I wondered why I hadn't played in the home series against the Australians if I was that much of a certainty. I had been in the best form of my life and some of the players who played in all five matches hadn't established themselves.

The 1991 tour of England was the most miserable period of my life and everything boiled up that day at Edgbaston. I was bowling to Viv Richards in the indoor nets when he drove the ball back to me and, trying to jump out of the way, I came down awkwardly on my ankle. It hurt a lot and I had to be helped back to the dressing-room. By this time tears were welling in my eyes and when I got there I burst into tears and said to Lance Gibbs, the manager, "I want my air ticket to go home. I've had enough!"

"Calm down," he said. "Tell me what happened." It wasn't the incident in the nets. It was an accumulation of all the slights I felt I had endured on the tour. I was twenty-two, eager to advance my career, and I hadn't been given a chance. When Gordon Greenidge was injured early on the tour, Clayton Lambert, the 29-year-old left-hander who was playing for Blackhall, the North Yorkshire and Durham League club, was called in and played in the last Test at the Oval. That was the solitary Test of his career.



I felt I tried to have as much respect as I could for the senior players but didn't think some of them showed the younger ones much respect back. One of them had made a remark at practice which implied I got into the side because Joey Carew was a selector. This was a senior player whom I idolised and it disturbed me greatly. I was thoroughly dismayed at the atmosphere around this time.

In practice, I was usually the last person to bat which often meant that the manager or some of the non-bowlers were the only ones left to bowl at me. I am happy now that that has changed. An incident in an Indian restaurant after our defeat in the First Test at Headingly hadn't helped my relations with Lance Gibbs. We were bowled out for 173 and 162 and England owed their first victory over a West Indies side since 1969 to a magnificent unbeaten 154 by Graham Gooch, their captain. Gooch showed the application and high level of concentration needed to combat the conditions and during dinner I said to David Williams, the reserve wicket-keeper, that I didn't think we had batted too well.

Gibbs heard me and said, "A player like you wouldn't have scored many anyway at Leeds. You would have been a failure." I resented the way he said it, as if he wanted to do me down. He may have been a great bowler for the West Indies but I don't think he was a good manager. His handling of certain players, me included, could have been much better. "You think you can bat like Gary Sobers," he said.

"I don't know yet if I can bat like Gary Sobers," I said. "But I would like to achieve what he has achieved." For the rest of the summer I tried to stay out of his way.

Now we were face to face in the visitors' dressing room at Edgbaston and

I had to explain why I wanted to go home. He said he would speak to Viv Richards about it As I was unlikely to be fit in time for the Oval Test in just over a week's time, he saw no reason why I ought not to be released I went to hospital for treatment and finished up having a plaster cast put on my foot

I had to accept that the only way I would get into the side was to wait for someone to retire I had been seen as a one-day cricketer I played in the third Texaco Trophy international in front of a 24, 871 crowd at Lord's but only because Greenidge was injured I made 23 before being caught and bowled by Richard Illingworth in a high-scoring game The West Indies lost all three one-day games and that gave a little more confidence to Gooch's side, who went on to draw the Cornhill series 2-2

After that I seemed to have travelled all round the world playing one-day matches — in Sharjah, Karachi, Lahore, Faisalabad, Perth, Melbourne, Adelaide, Sydney, Brisbane, Christchurch, Auckland, Wellington, Berri and Kingston before I finally became a regular in the Test side Too much one-day cricket is not good for a young player It doesn't help his development specially if he is a batsman.

I learned a lot from unhappy experiences in England It made me stronger mentally I resolved that I would score so many runs that the selectors wouldn't be able to ignore me I would force my selection on them and give them no alternative but to choose me It also gave more understanding of how young players should be treated Some of the senior men in the 1991 side may have been great cricketers who contributed a lot to West Indies cricket, but their attitude towards new comers could have been different Now I would like to encourage youngsters rather than show them indifference If I ever become captain, I will make a point of that

I played at Bristol and Worcester in the two opening matches of the tour, scoring 30 against Gloucestershire in a one-day game and 26 against Worcestershire Phil Newport bowled me at New Road, the first of several occasions when he has dismissed me Viv Richards scored a typical 131 from 153 balls in a drawn game and his great friend Ian Botham upstaged him with 161 in 139 balls

Two weeks later I thought I had helped my chances of a pick in the Test side by scoring 93 against Somerset at Taunton, but after scoring 3 and 26 in the next match against Leicestershire, falling victim to the Australian John Maguire in both innings, I learned that Phil Simmons was going to open in the First Test at Headingley with Dessie Haynes I could understand that they wanted a specialist opener and Phil Simmons, who is someone I think very highly of, fitted the bill Unfortunately he didn't have a very successful series, but later on he made a number of important contributions to the success of West Indies side He's a strong, very positive player but his record would be much better if he had been tighter

I failed at Derby and Northampton but was more hopeful after an innings of 75 against Hampshire at Southampton before the Nottingham Test I scored 82 against the Minor Counties at Darlington and the same against Wales at Brecon but by this time I had given up hope, and when I damaged the ligaments of my ankle at Edgbaston that was my tour finished I appreciate that with an average of 24 57 from 344 first-class runs (the matches against the Minor Counties and Wales were not first-class) I hadn't exactly forced my way into the reckoning with a good tally of runs, but I still think that with more encouragement and help I would have contributed more to that tour

Because of the World Series and the World Cup in Australia and New Zealand, I was only able to take part in three matches for Trinidad and Tobago in the 1992 Red Stripe Cup competition, scoring 135 in the opening game against Barbados, and averaging 47, but we won the Grant Geddes Shield by beating Barbados by 8 wickets Viv Richards retired, Gus Logie was about to retire — and I found myself playing my second Test in seventeen months against South Africa in April Since then I made sure I stayed in the side ■

MOONSONG MOMENTS

Today is Guru Dutt's 70th birth anniversary Although his sweetest— and best known— songs were those of gloom, the poetry of love in his films was no less worthy of celebration Just one, double-version example here

Yeh raat, yeh chandni phir kahan...

(Film Jaal, music Sachin Dev Burman, lyric Sahir Ludhianvi, singers Hemant Kumar and Lata Mangeshkar)

THE HEMANT KUMAR SOLO VERSION

This night, this moonlight, never again,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

On the branches of the trees slumbers the moonlight,
Lost deep in your thoughts this,
moonlight,

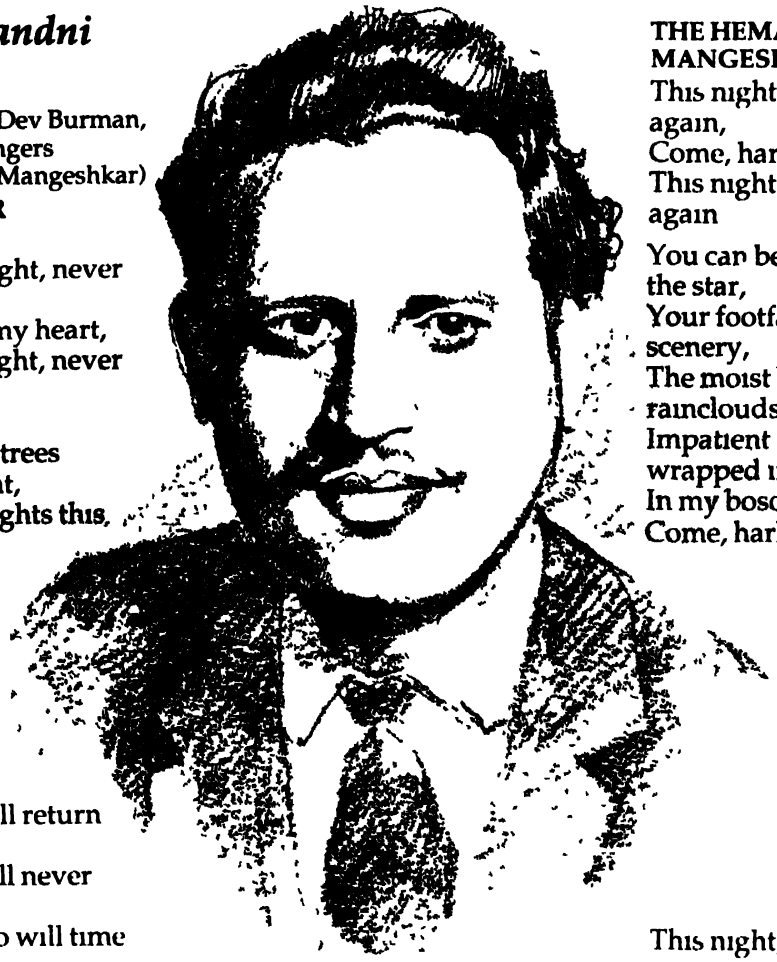

Illustration: Anup Ray

A while more and it will return spent,
This night of spring will never again be,
A moment more or two will time tarry,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

On the lips of the waves is a soft sonnet,
Within the moist breeze lies white heat,
In this beautiful fire come and smoulder, too,
Now, give tongue to your heartbeats,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

Receding is the spring, buoyant our youthfulness,
Beneath the shadow of the stars let's tell our tales,
If after beckoning you they pass on,
Never will they return these clutches of spring,
Come, life is in bloom yet,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

THE HEMANT KUMAR-LATA MANGESHKAR DUET VERSION

This night, this moonlight, never again,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

You can be heard in the falling of the star,
Your footfalls in the silence of the scenery,
The moist breeze, the lush rainclouds tell your tale,
Impatient is my youthfulness wrapped in flames,
In my bosom rises the smoke,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,

This night, this moonlight, never again

On the lips of the waves some lost lores,
The gardens of hope have all been autumned,
Where art thou who knows, all is deserted,
I know not where it will, the future world,
Demolished is my world of desires,
Come, hark the cry of my heart,
This night, this moonlight, never again

THE PASSAGE OF THE POTATO

"Seeds of the potato berries should be sown in adapted places by explorers of new countries"

So declared a botanically minded empire builder Among those who took this advice were Captain Young of the Sirmur Rifles and Mr Shore, Superintendent of the Doon

It has to be admitted that the Captain was motivated by self-interest He was an Irishman and fond of potatoes In 1823, he received some of superior quality and was considering where to plant them Till then, the northern hill districts had been in British hands for about 10 years, but no one had thought of resorting to them for rest and relaxation

The hills of central India, covered with jungle were known to be extremly unhealthy The Siwaliks near Dehra Dun were malarious It was supposed that the Himalayan foothills, also forest-clad would be equally unhealthy, but Captain Young was to discover otherwise

While he was deliberating where to sow the potatoes, some men from Garhwal arrived and mentioned that they were fond of English potatoes and had grown them in the hills with considerable success They suggested that the Captain try the upper part of the range, directly in front of the Doon

Captain Young and Mr Shore set out on foot and soon left the subtropical forest behind them Above 4,000' they came to forests of oak and rhododendron and above 6,000' they found cedars, known in the Himalayas as deodars or devdars — trees of God

They found the climate so cool and delightful that they gave up the idea of growing potatoes and instead erected a small lodge on Camel's Back facing the snows

Captain Young was to make a number of visits to his little hut on the mountainside Apart from the inhabitants of a few scattered villages in the valley below, no one lived on the mountain Bears, leopards and barking deer roamed in the forest There were pheasants in the shady ravines and small trout in the little Aglar river below

In 1826, Young, now a Colonel, built his first house, Mulinger (it still stands), on the way up to what is now

A suitable name for the hill-station would have been Mount Aloo, but Mussoorie got its name from the Mansuri berry, Coriara nepalensis, a shrub that grows abundantly in the area, but is of little use. Mansuri ought therefore to be the correct name and spelling, but then the British never could get Indian names right

The potato was, after all, something foreign and while today we jump at anything foreign, regardless of its utility, our forbears were more cautious. To determine its acceptability (or so the story goes), a conference of Brahmins was assembled and they, to their everlasting credit (and after much debate) gave their decision in favour of the humble vegetable

Landour Cantonment Then on the spur of the small hill he built Annefield (this was burnt down in 1947 and its ruins are now inhabited by goats and the occasional wild cat) Other people began to follow Colonel Young's example and by 1830, the twin hill-stations of Landour and Mussoorie had come into being

A suitable name for the hill-station would have been Mount Aloo, but Mussoorie got its name from the Mansuri berry, Coriara nepalensis, a shrub that grows abundantly in the area, but is of little use Mansuri ought therefore to be the correct name and spelling, but then the British never could get Indian names right

Shimla and Nainital sprang up at much the same time as Mussoorie, but although the pleasure-seeking residents of these hill-stations took little or no interest in potato-growing, the farmers of the hills cetainly did Potatoes flourished in the terraced fields of the Himalayan hills and valleys

It was a mixed blessing at first bcause the enthusiasm for its cultivation resulted in the destruction of much fine forest, particularly near Shimla

The British can justifiably claim that the introduction of potato cultivation in India was one of the lesser known benefits of their rule Certainly our meals have been enriched by the variety of uses to which the potato can be put but at first, it was by no means certain that the population would accept it

The potato was, after all, something foreign and while today we jump at anything foreign, regardless of its utility, our for bears were more cautious To determine its acceptability, (or so the story goes) a conference of Brahmins was assembled and they, to their everlasting credit (and after much debate) gave their decision in favour of the humble vegetable

But was the potato unknown in India before the British came? Terry, the Chaplain of the Embassy sent by James I to the Emperor Jehangir, was present at a dinner given to the Ambassador, Sir Thomas Roe, by Asaf Khan, the brother of Noor Jehan

He describes the various dishes that were put before them and mentions potatoes and remarks that they were very well cooked Did Asaf Khan get his potatoes from vilayat or was he already cultivating them in his backgarden near the Jamuna?

It is possible, of course, that Terry mistook yams for potatoes, their flavours are similar The accounts of early travellers are not always accurate The same Terry gives us a description of a tiger and then calls it a lion

Mark Thornhill, a magistrate in Agra in 1857 remarks in his memoirs that the turnip was also introduced to India by the British Mr Thornhill was wrong The turnip has been cultivated in Punjab from times immemorial Turnip pickle was unknown in the West till the Punjabis took some there

We have gone a long way from Mussoorie, but then, so has the potato

FREE MARKET AT ALL COST

Supporters of market forces have now marched victorious over the globe for more than a decade, promising economic solutions Free markets, they insist, will result in improved efficiency, higher economic growth and therefore the welfare of all

But it hasn't proved that simple, specially in Britain, where the market principal has driven deeper, faster and more extensively into society than in any other Western industrialised state The debate over a 'human face' to reform is not limited to India, and many Indians will be interested in a new book by Will Hutton, the economics editor of The Guardian

In The State We're In, he argues powerfully for a new system of values, and a complete overhaul of British democracy Market forces have brought limited gains in efficiency, but the social costs have been enormous As the economy cannot be isolated from the social and political system, Hutton insists that the British state has to be broken and put back together again

This book has provoked a storm of debate in Britain because it has touched a raw nerve Hutton points out that freeing of markets has led to the slowing, not increase, of growth, as well as damage to the welfare of the majority

The profile of Britain now is one of increasing inequality Never in recorded history has the gap between the top and lowest salaries been so great Society can now be divided in a 40/30/30 ratio The top 40 per cent have full-time employment or secure self-employment

Thirty per cent are insecurely self-employed, involuntarily part-time, or casual workers At the bottom are 30 per cent who are marginalised, unemployed or working for poverty wages One in four of the male workforce is without a job

Inequality, as Hutton points out, is not only about income, it is also about self-esteem Despondency at not being able to do well in a world where education, transport, health, jobs, all are in the market place, leads for some to a loss of the desire to live

Deregulation of the labour market has led to longer working hours than anywhere in Europe The atmosphere of insecurity has caused permanent stress, making it difficult for parents to keep their marriages going, let alone look after their children

Britain has the highest divorce rate in Europe One in three British children grows up in poverty,

The education system itself has been subjected to the free market At the bottom of the pile are now schools run on limited funds of local authorities above them are schools which have 'opted out' of the system, with larger central funds, and supreme are free-payingpublicschools

This system is an example of exclusion and systematic inequality The children from public schools, which only the very richest can afford, go on to a secure place in life and still fill 50 per cent of the places of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge

These are the people at the top and this, says Hutton, is where the rot starts He quotes Lord Hogg's description of the Westminster system of democracy as "elective dictatorship" Once you are in power in Britain — where there is no written constitution — you are subject to precious few checks and balances

As a result successive Conservative governments have been able to introduce increasingly centrist market-led system Former state or elected institutions have been replaced by Quangos (Quasi-autonomous Non Governmental Orgarisations) whose office-bearers are appointed by the central government Two hundred and seventy-two new Quangos are said to have replaced the old Labour-controlled Greater London Council alone

As estimated 70,000 such jobs are now handed out by Conservative ministers, meaning that the country is returning to the 19th century tradition of rule by a private oligarchy of unelected Conservatives

The British judiciary was never reformed and is still appointed by the Lord Chancellor, largely from the same class of natural conservatives which forms the government and the bulk of the civil service

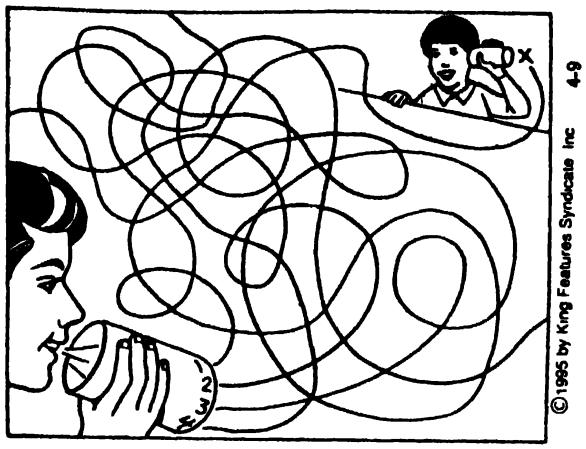
Companies and financial institutions, argues Hutton, are also cursed by the same 'gentlemanly' traditions

Defenders of the free market maintain that Britain's failures are due to too small a dose of market forces Hutton, on the other hand, maintains that market forces do not on their own reach optimal solutions and capitalism has always worked best when subject to some controls

In the British system he identifies the "gentleman businessman's" unreined desire for quick returns and high dividends as the main reason Britain falls behind.

Not all, though, is lost Britain's problems themselves may provide the spur to revitalise the nation's decaying institutions For Hutton, what's needed is a spirit of republicanism to act as a force to devolve political power to the regions and cities.

In business, companies must be recognised as social as well as economic organisations — not just to be run by opportunist traders for short term gains This means restructuring financial institutions to allow more long-term loans and less pressure to give maximum dividends to shareholders



Britain is more in the global marketplace than most One quarter of all British shares, bonds and bank deposits are owned by foreigners Capitalism can function best, argues Hutton, if the volatility of exchange rates can be regulated

His world view of a stability giving all nations an environment to develop their economics according to their own genius, may strike a chord in India too, while his catalogue of British mistakes may warn of the dangers of too much free market dogma

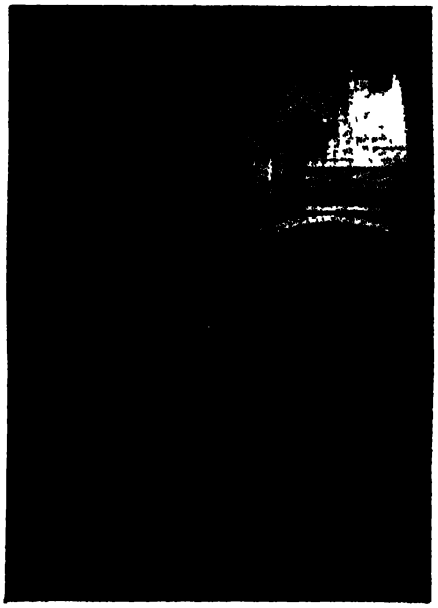
REMEMBRANCE OF MURDERS PAST

Anne Perry, a widely acclaimed mystery writer, holds forth on why the Victorian age is an obsession with her Arthur J. Pais unearths the details

"England was at the height of its power and prosperity during the Victorian age," says Anne Perry "It ruled half the world including India And yet, there was so much of corruption, crime, misanthropy, and subjugation of women in that era And the world hardly knows about it "

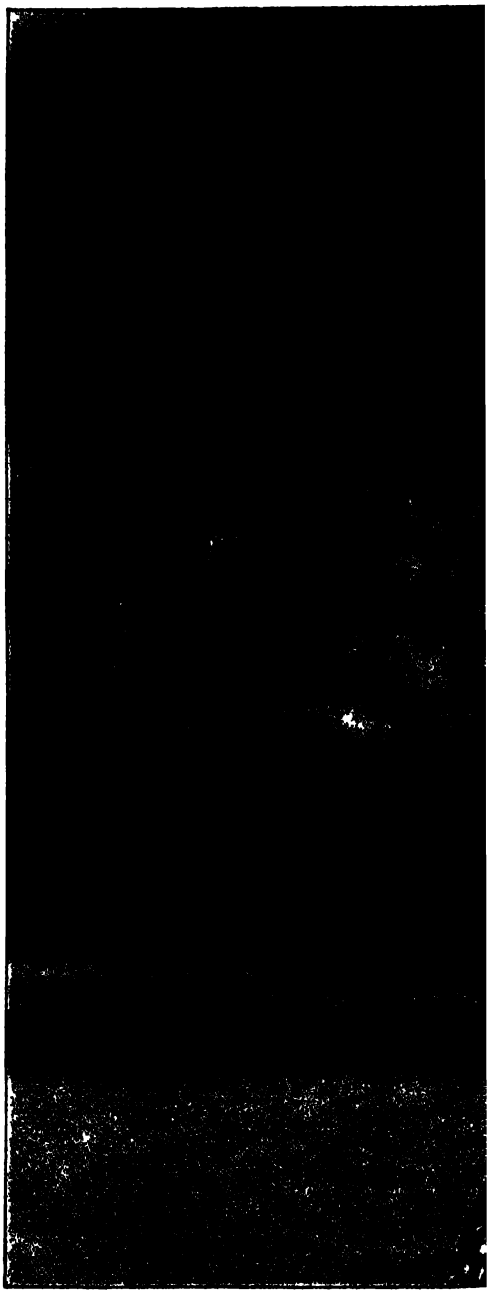
She wants the readers, particularly in the former colonies, to understand how the veneration of wealth and power during the Victorian era brought about untold tragedies in England itself — and how these tragedies might have been echoed elsewhere

"I have found the Victorian era a fertile ground for my mystery books because it offers any number of opportunities for high and low crime," says Perry, one of the most popular and critically acclaimed mystery writers



She is indeed unique among crime writers, for, as a report disclosed recently, Perry herself is guilty of a crime found in most of her books murder

About 43 years ago, Perry, a teenager, helped a friend kill her mother in New Zealand and served nearly seven years in a prison



Despite the sensational revelation that made page one in England last year, Anne Perry's reputation as an astute observer of British society remains intact and her new book, Traitor's Gate, has received wide acclaim

Perry, who lives in a sprawling seaside cottage in Scotland, is the writer of more than 20 mystery books, including The Hyde Park Headsman

"Anne Perry can write a Victorian mystery that would make Charles Dickens' eyes pop," wrote the New York Times while reviewing one of her recent books And Carolyn G Hart, a fellow writer, added "Anne Perry writes of yesterday, but her perceptions speak of today Her books condemn the evil that existed in the Victorian times, but many of those evils are very much with us today There is too much of class-conflict and hypocrisy, greed and corruption "

More than half of those books feature Inspector Pitt and his gutsy, inquisitive wife Charlotte, the other series features an elusive, enigmatic William Monk, an amnesia victim and former police inspector In her latest, Traitor's Gate, Pitt is charged with investigating a treasonous matter Someone in the Colonial Office is passing information to Germany about England's strategy in Africa The traitor is surely one of the top half of a dozen civil servants But Pitt will soon find out that the case is not only far from being a delicate investigation, there are many moral dilemmas involved in solving it

"I have always been fascinated by the conflict of ethics, specially involving honesty, compassion and courage, whether a person under stress has the grace to face up to the truth and act honourably," Perry says "Appearances and reputations mattered intensely in that age, and so much was hidden. There were great many situations when people did not have legal recourse to help or justice. Thus blackmail often provided perfect excuse for a murder"

Her mother used to tell Anne Perry. "We judge people too quickly" This is one of the themes she constantly explores in her books "The culprit in my novels may not be the person most responsible for the tragedy or the crime

on the murder Anne Perry committed in 1952

It is the society that is often guilter"

Subtly, she also adds messages to her mysteries "I believe that human beings are not born in sin and that you cannot be punished for others' sins," she says "I also believe that we should rise to the full measure of our creation And you will find many people in my books doing that"

Readers love her mystery books not only for their suspense and ambience, but also for their colourful detail Did you know that reading the newspaper was considered "indelicate" in the 18th century? That carpets were swept with sand, and boiled bran was used to clean chintz, and warm cow's milk was used to remove vinegar and wine stains?

"Details, details, details," says Perry "Details are very, very important to my books"

She feels that women mystery writers have made a great progress in recent years not only because they have been concocting superior plots, but also because of their excellent observation

"Women often observe people more closely than men writers," she says, "and that is reflected in their books Speaking generally, men don't notice fine inflections or facial expressions as keenly because they are more interested in facts"

How does she go about doing research?

"I began by collecting auction

Did you know that reading the newspaper was considered 'indelicate' in the 18th century? That carpets were swept with sand, and boiled bran was used to clean chintz, and warm cow's milk was used to remove vinegar and wine stains? 'Details, details, details,' says Anne Perry. 'Details are very, very important to my books'

WRITER AS MURDERESS

"My childhood was scrappy and largly self-obtained," Anne Perry told this writer a while ago "I was privately tutored because of my ill-health, thankfully all behind me now." There was a feeling that she was not too comfortable discussing her childhood

A few months later, newspapers in Britain, and then in America, Europe, Australia and New Zealand broke the story that Anne Perry had served nearly seven years in a New Zealand jail because she had helped a friend kill her mother in 1952

She had visited New Zealand to recuperate from a nervous disorder and other health problems Since her health remained frail after the sentence, she continued her eduaction at home in England where she took on her stepfather's name About 17 years ago she began writing mysteries

The story of the murder came about when a New Zealand movie director announced the project, Heavenly Creatures, based on the sensational murde.

As part of his story on the movie, a New Zealand writer began finding out about the two young women involved in the bizarre murder It was his trail that led him to England, and to Anne Perry

With TV cameras and reporters on her doorsteps in her cottage in Scotland, Anne Perry slowly talked about the murder. She said she had foolishly, but utterly, believed that either it was her friend's life or that of the mother's.

She was also taking medications at that time which caused suspension of judgment, she explained That drug has been long withdrawn from the market

Though she had been atoning each day for her "horrendous crime", and had found consolation in religion, she did not come forth to disclose her part in the murder because she was afraid that people may judge her "too quickly and too much".

Perry has said that the critically acclaimed Heavenly Creatures has not understood her story adequately, but the producers of the film say that by and large their movie has been faithful to the events.

In the movie, the two girls — Julie Hulmes, from Britain, and Pauline become inseparable friends — and there is hint of lesbianism

When Juliet Hulmes (Anne Perry) is sent to a sanatorium because of her failing health, the friendship becomes stronger. When Juliet returns from the sanatorium, she finds her mother in bed with another man; the division between the mother and daughter becomes wider Juliet is further upset that her parents are going to divorce and her mother is marrying the lover.

As the Hulmes prepare for divorce, they decide to leave Juliet with relatives in South Africa for a few months Pauline presses her mother to let her go with Juliet

When Honora, the mother, makes it clear that she will not allow her 15-year-old daughter to leave home, the two girls began to imagine one solution· the murder

Anne Perry says that while many of the things in the movie are true, filmmaker Peter Jackson did not get the motive for the murder right. At least she (Juliet) sincerely thought her friend was being tortured by her mother and may even be killed

Though Perry has refused to see the film, she criticised Jackson and writer Frances Walsh for taking cinematic liberties

But Jackson defends the movie "The friendship was for the most part a rich and rewarding one," he says, "and we tried to honour that in the film It was our intention to make a film about friendship that went terribly wrong "

Pierre Vinet

A still from Heavenly Creatures: Friends in crime

catalogues, copies of advertisements from old issues of London Illustrated News, museum artefacts, vintage books, but mostly from good films and a large collection of modern books about every aspect of the 19th century

"I love writing and I feel time is treading on my heels I usually work at least some part of everyday, frequently all day, except on Sunday.

"I never work on Sunday because of my religious convictions," she says "I also think it is common sense"

Anne Perry was an air hostess for five years and a sales person for several years before turning to full-time writing She says she survived the initial rejections and small sales because she lived a very frugal life. Besides, she has never married. "Life becomes lonely at times," the novelist who is in her early fifties, says "But don't married people also feel loneliness from time to time?" ■

Beginning

There are no signs to tell me from where the road begins,
There are no marks to say where the trial ends
I make my debut
Unsure and uncertain,
But that does not worry me
For no journey
However great or small,
Successful or disastrous, Began with more than a step Tomorrow I may come to a dead end
But today I've made a start:
The terminus may not be guaranteed
But at least the beginning has been

POST MORTEM

Mystic Mind

■ J. Krishnamurti talks about human consciousness being in a state of crisis and the growing need for change ('Seer Magic', June 16).

Sri Aurobindo had identified this oncoming crisis as an evolutionary one and talked about the emergence of a faculty higher than the mind called supermind which, according to him, was the future guiding principle of man

Krishnamurti reinforced this teaching in a form that was more suitable for an accomplished, intellectual and technologically advanced people

He spoke in a language shorn of metaphysical nuances. And this made his thoughts provocative, teasing and modern at the same time.
Nilanjan Chatterjee,
Jamshedpur

■ The focus of the cover story was Pupul Jayakar rather than Krishnamurti. In fact, it was boring having to read about the personal achievements of the queen of culture.
Debabrata Mohanty,
Balasore (Orissa)

■ No doubt the cover story was a provocative piece of writing. But wasn't it a bit beyond the understanding of the common man?
P. Das,
Jamshedpur

■ Some time back Pupul Jayakar had edited a book called Within the Mind containing some invaluable articles from renowned scientists and Krishnamurti's interaction with a group of American psychiatrists.

Had you included an extract from this book, it would have opened up new vistas on the study of this seer.
T.K. Ray,
Ranchi

Pupul Jayakar: In quest of culture and consciousness

■ The cover story came as a pleasant surprise, used as we are to reading only about fashion, glamour and stories of the rich and super-rich in the Magazine
Sunil Banerjee,
Calcutta

Women in Love (with Women)

■ For some, homosexuality is not an aberration, it is a way of life ('Ladies' Lady', June 18) Through the medium of films Pratibha Parmar has exploited a 'clandestine' relationship.

At least, she is honest and courageous enough to admit her sexual preferences.

Homosexuality is so common these days, even in India, that a telefilm called Adhura is being made on this subject. It remains to be seen whether Mandi House gives the green signal to Ashish Nagpal's venture.
Devraj Singh Kalsi,
Kanchrapara (W.B.)

■ Who are we to look down upon people with different sexual choices? Just as we find such people unnatural, they too, could be finding us unnatural.
Arthur Manly,

COVER STORY

CRYING WOLF

When Alisha Chinai accused Anu Malik of sexual harassment, nobody was amused. That was no way to treat a lady— if what she said was true. It also threw up the question again of 'honesty among thieves'. Anil Grover gives past examples of pots and kettles in the film industry, an industry which chiefly thrives on the black: money and vessels. And they all go with their eyes open: it is no place for good little babydolls...

Anu Malik: 'LML, baby, LML'

Sexy, sexy, sexy, mujhe log bolen,
Hi sexy, hello sexy, kyon bolen,
Neeli neeli aankhen meri, main kya karoon,
Honth mere lal lal, main kya karoon;
Husn ko chhupa kahan, chehra yeh le jaaoon kahan,
Romeo hazar aage peechhey dauden ..

—Alisha Chinai sings to Anu Malik's tune and Indeevar's lyric in Khuddaar

WHO CRYING? BOLLYWOOD PLAYBACK SINGER and pop performer Alisha Chinai, who began as Babydoll, went on to clone herself on Madonna — voice, numbers, image, T&A, and all — hit the Hindi pop charts with horny numbers as Kaate nahin kat-te din yeh raat (Mr India) and Sexy, sexy, sexy (Khuddaar). Chinai who established herself with Bombay Girl and outrageous songs like Ruk ruk ruk (Vijaypath) and is well on her way to soaring heights (with a much-delayed mode change to 'more sober') with Made in India.

ber Saaranga tere pyar mein?), who got his big break with Ek Jaan Hain Hum, wild-fired the film industry with a brilliant Sohni Mahiwal and a Mard of a movie later Receded from the limelight thereafter (though did the music for Alisha's debut album, Jaadu in 1984 and then roared back in 1994, specially with Chura ke dil mera (Main Khiladi Tu Anari), and a host of other lifted/adapted/original hits

So, what's all this about crying wolf and all that?

The latest reports on the recently divorced Alisha Chinai and her hitherto favourite music director Anu Malik speak of Malik sexually harassing Chinai and Chinai spilling the beans on him (or squealing, as they would prefer to put it within the industry) and threatening legal action

Surprise Number One Who squealed? Alisha Chinai? You can almost hear the tch-tch reverberating Pooja Bhatt: Like a virgin?

Parveen Babi. Cut-off age, 14

in the studios of Bombay Sau sau choohe khaa ke billi Haj ko chali, they must surely be saying Surprise Number Two Is Chinai taking her image-change too seriously? Isn't she the one who has, all her career, been crying herself hoarse that the Indian world can't handle her sexuality, that what she loves about her mentor, Madonna, is her sexual honesty, and all the rest are just in a teddy bears' picnic?

Surprise Number Three Wasn't there something raging between Chinai and Malik years back? And hadn't Chinai laughed off those queries with a keep-guessing chortle and then added that they were great pals, and he did make a pass now and then, but all in good fun and he knew that she would bonk him on the head if he ever tried to get serious Perhaps, she was just being 'professionally correct'

Surprise Number Four Malik did get serious, after all?

Surprise Number Five Hear the recent number from Haathkadi again (lyric Dev Kohli, the guy who has about the same time given 'family' lyrics as in Hum Aapke Hain Koun !) and try keeping your eyebrows in place at the irony

Tuned by Anu Malik and sung by Malik and Alisha Chinai, it has the lady making the aggressive moves with LML, baby, LML (Let's Make Love) and Malik rejecting the sexual harassment with GTH, baba, GTH (Go To Hell)

Then, Chinai gives him the full treatment in the last stanza Kyon tu mujh se door hai,

Manisha Koirala (left): Looking up to godfather Subhash Ghai

Lagta hai majboor hai,
Is mein koi raaz hai,
Koi baat zaroor hai,
Baat koi aur hai, poochh ke rahoongi,
Bada kamzor hai, sab se kahoongi

Stung to the quick about his machismo, nay, potency, Malik retorts

Main tujh ko batlata hoon,
Rang apna dikhlata hoon,
Kas ke bahon mein tujhe,
Tere hosh udata hoon,
Jaayegi kahan tu, tohmat laga ke,
Baby tujhe deta hoon, chhutki baja ke

And the roles are reversed, now you have Malik charging, LML, baby, LML and Chinai turning coy with GTH, baba, GTH!

Surprise Number Six You've heard about life imitating art and art imitating life But here's art imitating art

Forget the image, or change of it, doesn't Alisha Chinai know which industry she is working in? Is she really a babydoll lost in the Bolly woods?

Certainly, at any given time, in any given circumstance, if what Alisha Chinai says is true, that was no way to treat a lady Anu Malik behaved exactly as the MCPs and Wolves in the industry do, and deserves fullest condemnation

But, in Hindi film lingo, saanp ke bill mein koi haath daalta hai? Let's put it another way can one hope to take a dive in a pool of muck and come out clean and shining

And this is an industry which aspirants enter with their eyes more open than a night watchman's, and can hardly pretend to hear 'BC' and 'MC' and think it refers to Bharatiya Chetna and Mamta Kulkarni: Couldn't come cleaner.

Missionaries of Charity

No one is condoning what Anu Malik may have done, but having consciously stepped into a hornet's nest more than a decade ago, is there any point — in this pro-choice era — of screaming and running with the sting brigade chasing your behind?

Let's put it more bluntly you don't step into a boxing ring to have a bout with 200 Mike Tysons all at once and hope to come out with a nose covered with strawberry icecream

Surprise Number Seven Alisha Chinai did not know all this? She is a Bombay Girl, a today-woman who not only knows her onions, but her potatoes and lemons, too

It is an industry full of pots and kettles and an industry that thrives on, actually draws its lifeblood from, the black money and vessels It is not an industry about handspun cotton and computer graphics, it is all about tips and toes It is showbiz

Is it any surprise, then, that Alisha Chinai gets that kind of reaction even after accepting that Anu Malik did a very wrong thing?

Going further, the whole incident once again throws up that question of squealing in a world in which the casting couch is practically the only furniture visible or available

Just the other day, starlet Vaishnavi frankly admitted that the situation was such that most of them had to grace the casting couch and anyone denying its existence was lying Mamta Kulkarni, who went on record on the cover of Stardust, is no liar, however, and screeched in the headline that she was a virgin, and even looked it

A few years ago, Pooja Bhatt said point blank, "There were no virgins in the film industry," and promptly sent even staid newspaper assistant editors rapping out gleeful editorials

Even about 15 years ago, Parveen Babi had said much the same thing as Pooja Bhatt, except that she qualified "no one" with an age bar, "above 14" Sure, these things were not spoken about as boldly as in this MTV age, or even in the Parveen Babi era, and not at all in the days of the Nargises and Madhubalas and Meena Kumaris and Waheeda Rehmans and Hema Malinis and Mumtazes and Zeenat Amans and Jaya Pradas

And the question of 'honesty among thieves', much as one hates to even use that phrase

It is a very strange world there And when you wag a finger at one person

Rajesh Khanna (left) and Sabia: Not taking it lying down in the industry, you are actually pointing a finger at the entire (correction almost entire) industry, male and female There, money has no colour and sex has no gender

So, it is not a sexist or feminist issue at all If Chinai files a police diary or a legal suit, she may get her justice (and peace), and we are all with her. But she can hardly expect any shock, outrage or cascading tearfalls (some cover stories, yes) from the general public

Alisha Chinai admits as much in her interview to another magazine, she admits having waited eight years and then eight months after each incident of molestation and violent passes "It takes guts and courage to turn the fear, the unnecessary guilt and the shame into something more productive. I thought no one would believe me. After all, it is his word against mine and after all my sexy videos and my raunchy image, there is the character evaluation clause that has gone against every single case filed But the fact remains that you are free to represent yourself or project yourself in any way you choose and be spared from the stress of worrying about whether you will be harassed [sic]"

If all that she says is true, yes, we are with her

But the moot point remains the film industry does not have one Anu Malik, it is full of Anu Maliks If you think you can fend for yourself in a world which is completely different from ours — and there have been a handful who have successfully done that — very good for you Most succumb for their own vested interest, some survive by continual evasive action, but hardly anyone cries wolf (literally) from the rooftops

That is where we talk of the Bollywood principle of 'honesty among thieves' Not to say, that that is the right principle. To talk about premarital and extra-marital affairs an bigamy and trigamy which are rampant in the industry would require more newsprint than produced in the whole of Korea

Is that merely the collective feverish imagination of gossip journalists? should not convince even those who think vanishing cream was invented by P C Sorcar Jr

Go through old issues of these m

A few years ago, Pooja Bhatt said point blank, 'There are no virgins in the film industry,' and promptly sent even staid newspaper assistant editors rapping out gleeful editorials. Even about 15 years ago, Parveen Babi had said much the same thing as Pooja Bhatt, except that she qualified 'no one' with an age bar, 'above 14'

MAKING MUSIC TOGETHER

Two perfect examples of Anu Malik-Alisha Chinai numbers, both written by Anwar Sagar They do not require translation, and would probably be unprintable then

Lu-lu-lu-lu-lu-lu-lu, li-li-li-li-li-li,
luli-luli-luli-luli-luli...
Akeli main aayee, akeli main aayee,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja,
Dulhan dulhe se bole,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja.

Main teri rani, tu raja mera,
Main tera geet, tu baja mera,
Baja bajane ko, jam ke bajane ko,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja.

Raat toofani hai, barah baje hain,
Thak thak ke log sare, sone lage hain,
Darwaza band hai, khidki khuli hai,
Khidki se aaja, sej saji hai,
Main teri rani, tu raja mera,
Main tera geet, tu baja mera,
De dhanadhan karne ko, de dhanadhan karne do,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja

Ghungta utha ke, andhere mein saajan,
Chhanka de choodi, khanka de kangan,
Rakh de dil ko, dil ke oopar,
Maar ke kankar, tod de gaagar,
Main teri rani, tu raja mera,
Main tera geet, tu baja mera,
Dum dumadum karne ko, dum

dumadum karne do,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja

Gore gaal pe til hai kala,
Khol de mere kamre ka tala,
Tere paas hai kamre ki chaabhi,
Kamre mein dekhenge picture Bobby,
Main teri rani, tu raja mera,
Main tera geet, tu baja mera,
Tan tanatan karne ko, tan tanatan karne do,
Hoja tayyar hoja, hoja tayyar hoja

Kal saiyyan ne aisi bowling kari,
Ek over bhi main khel paayee nahin,
Chauthe hi gend mein out huee,
Paanchwa gend main jhel payee nahin

Pehla gend pada uska mehnga,
Tooti choodi, sarka lehnga,
Ball damdaar thi, tez raftaar thi,
Balla sambhale hue main tayyar thi,

Kya karti mohe woh jhatka laga,
Kya karti mohe woh jhatka laga,
Run koi bhi main jod paayee nahin.

Dooja ball jab usne mara,
Dola dola gora tan sara,
Ball choli pe padi, main saiyyan se ladi,

Bouncer gend piya daalo na ghadi ghadi,
Dhire dhire se bowling karo sajna,
Dhire dhire se bowling karo sajna,
Main sajni hoon koi lugai nahin

Teeje ball ne haalat bigaadi,
Julmi tha woh purana khiladi,
Ball ko ghisne laga, mujh ko takne laga,
Dil mera darne laga, woh moa hansne laga,
Phir kas ke jo maari gend usne,
Phir kas ke jo maari gend usne,
Aayee hichki main par chillaayee nahin

Chautha gend gajab ka dala,
Peechhey hat ke khud ko sambhaala,
Choodi toot gayee, bindiya chhut gayee,
Meri to gili udi, haye main thandi padi,
Bedardi ne out mujhe aisa kiya,
Bedardi ne out mujhe aisa kiya,
Der tak hosh mein main aayee nahin

Kal saiyyan ne aisi bowling kari,
Ek over bhi main khel paayee nahin,
Chauthe hi gend mein out huee,
Paanchwa gend main jhel payee nahin

zines and you will find each and every story having come true eventually, including those vehemently denied and sometimes accompanied by violent reaction

Take the best examples of reports dismissed as 'rag journalism rubbish', even inviting legal suits, they all turned out to be cent per cent true

Take the case of Dilip Kumar's love for Kamini Kaushal or Madhubala or, much later, the messy tie-up with Asma Khan, take the case of Zeenat Aman's top-secret affair (and secret marriage) with Sanjay Khan and her being beaten up by him constantly, or Dharmendra's bigamous knot with Hema Malini; or Raj Kapoor's torrid thing with Vyjayanthimala till their common doctor friend, Dr Bali, rescued her; or Shammi Kapoor's dangerous liaisons with all 'new faces', specially his godfathering of Mumtaz. Or, Saira Bano's 'rebound marriage' with Shobha De, then the editor of Stardust, put it best while answering a query if whatever they published was at least half true. She said: 'It is only 10 per cent of the truth. If we published anything more than that, it would be pornography.' And this was said sometime in the mid-Seventies, some 20 years ago!

Dilip Kumar after Rajendra Kumar let her down

Remember Rekha and Vinod Mehra's underground marriage? Or Sridevi and Mithun Chakraborty's registered marriage (the certificate of which, too, was unearthed by Cine Blitz)?

And we are not even talking about the staple diet of Bollywood as enshrined in the Three Musketeers' motto, and followed to a nicety in filmdom one for all and all for one!

Shobha De, then the editor of Stardust, put it best while answering a query if whatever they published was at least half true She said "It is only 10 per cent of the truth If we published anything more than that, it would be pornography " And this was said sometime in the mid-Seventies, some 20 years ago!

There have been certain cases of outraged industry women raising an alarm. Nowadays, they don't name names, but give enough evidence about whom they are talking. Nowadays, they are a lot bolder and since society too is a lot more 'tolerant' now, they can speak out and not incur damages to their careers

But nearly 20 years ago, one remembers a sensational interview, even by today's standards, by Imtiaz Khan, a zooming villain then, to Cine Blitz He talked in graphic detail about his unbridled libido and talked even more explicitly about Rekha, her likes, dislikes, and insatiable appetite for the hotter things of life

There was no response from Rekha herself, but even being a starlet and sex symbol in an MCPs' world, the industry did not spare Imtiaz He was quietly and quickly hounded out of the industry That 'honesty among thieves' syndrome working overtime, you know

Much later there was a charge of 'attempted rape' against top star Rajesh Khanna by newcomer Sabia, unproven and uncontested Forget the fact that Sabia was the daughter of Ameeta, a 'side actress' (as the second string used to be called) for decades, who ought to have known better than to expect anything else in Bollywood

ADMISSION OPEN

Sure enough, Sabia rightaway became Sabia Who.

More recent memory is of Manisha Koirala making noises about her godfather, Subhash Ghai—an occupational hazard, so to speak, for all filmy godfathers—even while Saudagar was being readied for release. She had to virtually hibernate, but all was forgiven when she made some noises again, this time entirely in favour of Subhash Ghai, one of the industry's most powerful presences

Since then, of course, the all-over-the-place Koirala hardly has any time to make noises about anyone Things obviously have changed with the times, too.

With the Made in India album, Alisha Chinai also has it made, and soaring success will probably give her no time to make any noises, either.

Good for her she is talented, she is in the industry to do her job, she has the right to project the image she thinks is good for her and her career, and you just can't keep a good woman down

And good for everyone, too If in Anuland, one Malik stands accused of sexual harassment, and is proved to have been a big bad wolf, too bad for him, the industry and its image

Rekha: Playing with fire

And if Chinai teaches him an exemplary lesson, she might just help in cleaning up the stables, haystacks included That will have been the greatest contribution Alisha Chinai will have made to the film industry She will have converted the stables into an anti-septic clinic, a place of worshippable work, a place where the talented and serious professionals would be giving their all to their vocations only

Till then, as Ketan Mehta might have said, but did not Oh Darling, Yeh Hai Bollywood ■

VIEWPOINT

DANGEROUS LIAISONS

Joanna Coles on how to take the extra out of extra-marital sex*

If only it were true that family values were in our genes That human beings really were a pair-bonding species, instinctively nesting together for life like geese or swans or doves

If only it were true, as Desmond Morris supposed in The Naked Ape, that the purpose of human sexuality is "to strengthen the pair bond and maintain the family unit" How much easier life would be

Instead, we appear to live in a state of natural and permanent sexual tension Our promiscuous nature wrestles with our public veneration of a monogamous social order

The good news, as Robert Wright surmises in his new book, The Moral Animal, Evolutionary Psychology And Everyday Life (Pantheon) is that we are at least programmed to fall in love

The bad news is that we are not designed to stay there

Wright's book has taken America by storm, making the cover story of the Time magazine, a sure sign of hitting a nerve in a country where 'quickie' divorce is now available at the press of a few buttons at a hole-in-the-wall machine

The author's central theme is the way evolution has shaped human love and his conclusion is not optimistic

The more sophisticated we become, the less we are likely to want to stay with one partner

"Men and women have always been designed to make each other miserable, but these days they are specially good at it," writes Wright Promiscuity tends to be determined more by the logistics of opportunity than by the level of moral fibre

Neither has the arrival of women in the workplace, capable of providing for themselves, dulled the allure of rich and powerful men

The hunter-gatherer's trophy catch has simply been replaced by the money and success of the super-achiever The more successful the man the more likely he is to change his partner and to increase the spread of his monogrammed genes

Or as J Paul Getty Senior married five times, once put it "A lasting relationship with a woman is possible only if you are a business failure"

But what does this mean for a culture based on monogamy? Are the sexes to remain in permanent combat, women hunkering down with the children while men window-shop, subconsciously driven by the fact "that each new mate offers a chance of pumping genes into the future"?

If most people's goal is to maintain a stable relationship is there not a way of fooling our genetic instincts of keeping our sexual impulses sufficiently satisfied to undermine the desire to stray?

The main enemy of monogamy is sexual boredom If we can find a way of alleviating it within the long-term relationships there are likely to be many more long-term relationships around and far fewer broken homes

But almost no serious research has been conducted on how to combat sexual boredom among cohabiting couples Terror of AIDS is not sufficient inducement to keep people from straying And anyway, it is a wholly negative one

David Goldmeier, a consultant at St Mary's Hospital, London, is one of the very few experts researching positive reasons for staying within the bounds of one sexual relationship

But it is tough going In spite of its name, the study of sexual boredom and how to banish it from the boudoir, is not sexy, at least not in terms of research budgets or well funded projects

Instead, the government prefers to spend money on limiting the damage of promiscuity and marriage breakup, while the study of its underlying causes are sadly ignored

Some prescient advice, based on hard research on how to maintain sexual interest in a long-term partner would surely add invaluably to our net national happiness. Is it not time that this crucial area is moved from the glib, quickfix solutions of the problem pages to the realm of serious research?

THE DREAM COTTAGE

It is many years since I left Maplewood and I wouldn't be surprised to hear that the old cottage has disappeared. Already, during my last months there, the trees were being felled and a new road being blasted through the mountains It was going to pass just below the cottage

There were no plans to demolish the building but it was already shaky and full of cracks, and a few more tremors such as those produced by passing trucks, drilling machines and bulldozers must eventually bring it down .

When I moved in, it had been nestling there among the oaks for over 70 years It had become part of the forest. Birds nestled in the eaves, beetles bur owed in the woodwork A jungle cat lived in the attic Even during my residence, some of these denizens remained And I was there for- . how long? Nine or ten years, I'm not sure It was a timeless sort of place Even the rent was paid once a year, at a time of my choosing

I first saw the cottage in the late spring When the surrounding forest was at its best — the Himalayan oaks and maples in new leaf, the oak leaves a pale green, the maple leaves red and gold and bronze, turning dark green as they matured Our maple is quite different to the North American maple — only the winged seed-pods are similar, twisting and turning in the breeze as they fall slowly to earth, so that the Garhwalis call it the Butterfly Tree

There was one very tall, very old maple above the cottage and this was probably the tree that gave the house its name. A portion of it was blackened where it had been struck by lightning but the rest of the tree lived on, a favourite haunt of woodpeckers The ancient, peeling bark seemed to harbour large numbers of tiny insects, and the woodpeckers would be tapping away all day trying to dislodge them

A steep path ran down to the cottage During heavy rains it would become a water course and the earth would be washed away to leave it very stony and uneven I first took this path to see Miss Bean, an indomitable old lady who had been left behind when the British left India She managed on a very small income in two small rooms on the ground floor

It was she who told me that the rest of the cottage was to let provided she could remain in the portion below Her rooms were reached by a flight of steps which also took the rush of water when the path was flooded

Miss Bean was a spry 82 who could get up the steps without any help from me She led me into her L-shaped sitting room There were two large windows and when I pushed open the first of these the forest seemed to rush upon me

The maples, oaks, rhododendrons and an old walnut, moved closer as though out of curiosity A branch tapped against the window frame, while, from below, from the ravine, the deep-throated song of a whistling thrush burst upon me

I told Miss Bean I would take the place She grew excited It must have been lonely for her all those years with the rest of the cottage lying empty, and only an old watchman and a mongrel dog for company Her own large house had been mortgaged to a local money-lender when she was left high and dry after Independence Her brother and sisters were long gone "I'm the last Bean in India," she announced proudly

It was all done on an impulse — the decision to give up my job in Delhi, find cheap accommodation in a hill-station and return to freelance writing It was a dream I had for some time and lack of money made it difficult to realise. But then, I knew that if I was going to wait for money to come I might have to wait until I was old and grey and full of sleep I was 35, still young enough to take a few risks If the dream was to become a reality, this was the time to be doing something about it.

I'm not sure what led me to Maplewood Miss Bean said it was probably preordained Or was it just chance? Chance gives and takes away and gives again It was the first place I saw and I did not trouble to look elsewhere The location was far from ideal The cottage faced east and stood in the shadow of the hill, so that while it received the early morning sun, it went without the evening sun

There was no view of the snows and none of the plains The forest below the cottage seemed full of possibilities and those large windows probably decided the issue In my romantic frame of mind, I was susceptible to magic casements opening wide

I would make a window seat and lie there on a summer's day writing poetry . But long before that could happen, I was opening a tin of sardines and sharing them with Miss Bean

And I did write a lot during those years at Maplewood, stories, poetry, books for children New people came into my life The forest grew around me And the old cottage was kind to a struggling writer.

(Sanctuary Features)

There was one very tall, very old maple above the cottage and this was probably the tree that gave the house its name. A portion of it was blackened where it had been struck by lightning....The ancient, peeling bark seemed to harbour large numbers of tiny insects

Gaps

I lost the war
without firing a shot
Was it a war, a battle, or just a skirmish?

I hung my head in shame,
but when I looked up there was no one to take me hostage,
Was I fighting a shadow-warrior so long?

I only saw graves whirling before my spintop eyes, even as my heart
turned into a blooming poppyfield

I remained a mute witness, since for me wars are gaps which gossip with each other,
just amused onlookers,
while words wrestle with spaces
on the mud-pit of plain paper, the wrestler's blue veins showing through their interlocked muscles

The Hermit

The silver-haired, weathered hermit sits crosslegged on the lotus
As the glistening spray of the waterfall
Cascades gently around him
And he meditates,
Under the cloudless blue sky Gaze turned unseeingly towards the dazzling sun
Counting his prayer beads
To find peace for me

The bridge of loneliness
Can be crossed only in my mind
In the treasure trove of my memories,
Who have lived and faded away from me, my heart is made up all those

I am the hermit locked into solitude
Lost in the realms of reality
Isolated from the world
And yet light years away from

The letter turns up every now and then
When I clear the heaps of paper
That articulate portions of my life

The handwriting startles with its familiarity
And after reading the now irrelevant details
I cry, friend, why didn't you write
Your address on the letter instead of
On the envelope which I have lost?

Sometimes, I wake up guilty,
Have I done it deliberately?
By destining that innocuous piece of paper
To the dustbins of obscurity
Have I just conveniently extinguished
Something that doesn't fit in anymore
Into the scheme of things that is me today?

GENES AND GENESIS

Are men and women that different? Old-fashioned feminists said human nature was one, but now 'difference feminists' say the opposite

Besides them are a whole body of Western sociobiologists who say the sexes differ so much they can be treated almost as separate species.

The aim of both, in genetic terms, is to have the maximum number of surviving offsprings But they do so through mutual exploitation

If you believe in the evolution of species, then man is also a creature shaped by the same forces as fruitflies, gibbons and gorillas. We have brains which are extremely flexible in responding to our environment — but our environmen. is not the sum of our being

Much is inherited through our genes These are the genes which have, through natural selection, evolved in a remote past when there were no condoms, computers or internal combustion engines

We are still carrying around instincts shaped in our ancestral environment but are not necessarily conscious of it Sexual attraction, for example, is something felt, not decided Emotions, say the new followers of Darwin, are merely evolution's executioners carrying out the orders of our genes

The key difference in our natures, they say, comes from the difference in our physical make-up. Females have a shorter reproductive life, few eggs and can only produce one infant a year

Males, are, well, the opposite. They therefore have to compete for comparatively scarce female resources. Females, on the other hand, have cause to be choosy about their mates as they have to invest a lot of their energy into producing and caring for a child

Hence, not just in humans, but in nature as a whole, males are almost always the wooers

They are also far less choosy Prostitution and pornography, for example, fill an overwhelmingly male, not female, need (In The Evolution of Human Sexuality, Donald Symons provided more evidence for this by looking at cultures around the globe, and finding that the general principle was that men tend to find sex with a wide variety of partners an extraordinarily appealing concept)

But evolution has given men genes for fidelity too Unlike in most other species, mankind has developed a high level of male parental investment This may have been because in our ancestral environment, people with better developed brains did better, and two parents gave more input to their children. both in terms of food and eduaction

Therefore, it was in our genes' interest to evolve love, both between a man and a woman and between them and their children

Man, then, has a dual nature — to procreate by having many partners, and to invest years with a wife or wives In other words, he is built for treachery To indulge in the former, he has to deceive the latter

Feminist sociobiologists, however, argue that women too are designed for deceit, though to a more limited extent In most mammals, female-ovulation is very apparent, in humans it's not

This crypto-ovulation could have evolved partly to allow a woman to cuckold her mate and still persuade him to bring up her child as his own (This could also account for the nature of male jealousy, the extreme emotion provoked by the concept of the sexual act of his mate with another man

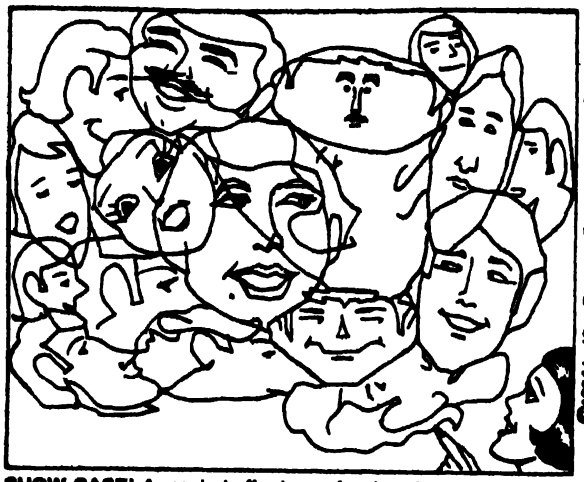
The nature of female jealousy is slightly different Her genes, say Darwinists, require her to monopolise a man so that he invests fully as a parent, and her main underlying fear would not be so much of a simple physical act, traumatic though that might be, as of desertion caused by her mate's deep emotional relationship with another woman)

But if monogamy is an obstacle to a man in particular expressing his full nature, why is monogamy so prevalent in societies dominated by men? In a way, it isn't Nine hundred and eighty out of 1154 societies for which anthropologists have data, have permitted more than one wife, but in nearly half of these, polygamy was occasional and not the norm The answer could be that most men are better off with one wife

Monogamous societies where wealth is unevenly distributed are where males benefit from dowry Dowry generally isn't a fe ture of polygamous societies. Most importantly, polygamy means less wom en to go round. In fact, it has been argued that, in contrast to men, most wom en are worse off with monc gamy as being the co-wife of a man with wealth or sta tus, may be genetically a better bet than being stuck with poor ne're-do-well.

It may also be a better be than divorce or desertion. In occasionally polygamous societies, the women who do have a monogamous marriage have more men to choose from and can marry above themselves

The unmarried men left over are a threat to themselves and to society Here too, there is a big difference between male and female natures Females, say sociobiologists, pacify males For example, an unmarried man between 24 and 35 is three times as likely to commit murder as a married one He is also more likely to rob and to rape



A polygamous nation, where many low-income males remain mateless, is not a place any of us would like to live in Ironically, this is the society of the West — although instead of having several wives at one time, men monopolise women one after the other in a socially destructive 'serial monogamy'.

Studying human evolution cannot tell us what is wrong or right, but it seems to show how deep differences go and perhaps this knowledge can make life, and our limitations, easier to understand

Who is the hot favourite in Hollywood? Mike Ellison finds out

Pity Britain's Alan Bates. There he is, flogging away in films by Claude Chabrol, Sam Shepard and Dennis Potter, but it does not seem to make much difference No matter what he does, Bates is less likely to turn heads in the Hollywood boardrooms than Glenda Jackson, his co-star in Ken Russell's 1969 film, Women In Love

And she does not even make movies any more, restricting her performances instead to the House of Commons. Simon Callow's role in Four Weddings and a Funeral has not exactly propelled his career into a different orbit either. He has precisely the same standing as Jackson in Star Power '95, Hollywood Reporter's new survey of bankable actors

The film trade paper asked international distributors, producers, sales agents, talent agents and studio executives to give marks out of 100 to the stars on whose names alone they can rely for a film's international success.

Bates gets 25, Callow and Jackson 26 each. The A-plus list predictably enough shows Tom Cruise, Harrison Ford, Mel Gibson, Tom Hanks and Arnold Schwarzenegger on maximum points, but Jim Carrey draws level with Kevin Costner (on 97) on the basis of one surprise hit, Ace Ventura Pet Detective, and two other successes, The Mask and Dumb and Dumber

Schwarzenegger: Muscles that sell

Jodie Foster: Leaving Julia Roberts behind

There are no A-plus women, and Julia Roberts' tally of points has fallen for the first time in four years, making the name of Jodie Foster the female one that film professionals most want to hear. But Roberts is still well up the A-list, along with Demi Moore and Sharon Stone

Emma Thompson, Kim Basinger, Glenn Close, Sigourney Weaver, Anjelica Huston and Holly Hunter all slid down the ratings Sigrid Ann Davidson a Cinevox International sales executive, said there were "not enough women writers, directors and producers out there — films like Little Women just don't get made as much any more".

Wendy Palmer, head of CiBy Sales in London, said "It was a terrible year for women There were hardly any mainstream movies that offered decent female roles a la Fried Green Tomatoes or The Piano."
Four Weddings helped Hugh Grant to the extent that he leapt by 32 points and found a place on the A-list, an elevation which was matched only by Brad Pitt, who rose by one point fewer. But Grant and the next most bankable European actor, Daniel Day-Lewis, have some way to go before they can challenge the enduring Sean Connery on 94 points

Kenneth Branagh heads the B-plus chart even though Mary Shelley's Frankenstein received a less than rapturous welcome last year, and Liam Neeson, who has just opened in Rob Roy, comes just behind Branagh thanks to the success of Schindler's List

More actors from outside the US are getting a slice of the action because the value of the European market now equals that of the American and because Hollywood producers fear that quotas may be introduced over the next year at France's initiative

John Travolta's part in Pulp Fiction, which won the Palme d'Or in Cannes last year, brought him back from the cinematic dead and secured a place on the B-plus list But other than Travolta, the actor who benefited most from the movie was not Samuel L Jackson, Bruce Willis or Tim Roth, but its director, Quentin Tarantino

The boy genius is sandwiched between Anjelica Huston and Madonna on the B-list, although his only screen appearance since Pulp Fiction was a cameo in Sleep With Me

Black actors have the toughest time breaking into the international

Demi Moore: $12 million star market, specially in Japan One sales executive said "If Blacks want to make inroads into the global marketplace they have to make movies with universal themes in them."

Bonnie Voland, an international consultant, said: "When Black film-makers make films for Black audiences, it really isn't fair to say those films aren't getting their just due if they just play to Blacks."

Whoopi Goldberg is considered to bear this out because she breaches three barriers. "She's a female superstar in a man's world," said Kathy Morgan of Kathy Morgan International "She's an African-American actor who is strongly accepted outside the US, which is rare And she's comedic when the old saying goes that comedians don't travel overseas She's a very unusual superstar"

Goldberg is being paid $20 million to make two forthcoming Buena Vista movies, but that still does not match Demi Moore She is getting $7 million for The Juror, which is being made at the moment, but $12 million for Striptease — or, put another way, it costs $5 million to persuade Moore to take off her clothes

The intense light emitted by the stars is always changing, so there is always room for the bright newcomer Take O J Simpson With 36 points he was rated higher than Burt Reynolds and on the same level as Faye Dunaway But OJ is not available for a while

NUMBER WISE

When it comes to popularity in India, none can beat Amitabh Bachchan and Madhuri Dixit yet, says Susmita Banerjee

He is neither young nor angry anymore But he is still the No 1 And the actor men, women and children still love to adore, admire and idolise.

Amitabh Bachchan, who towered over the Bombay film industry for nearly a quarter century, earning such sobriquets as 'megastar' or a 'one-man industry', and with more than 85 films to his credit, is still Bollywood's most popular actor, established a recent survey.

Amazing how with just one release in 1994 (Insaniyat) Amitabh's popularity could zoom past that of the hot shot, disco-rapping brigade of Akshay Kumar, Shah Rukh Khan, Sunil Shetty and Ajay Devgan.

Akshay Kumar: Turning women crazy

Amitabh Bachchan: Going strong at 53

Madhuri Dixit: Hum aapke hi hain

Is the audience getting tired of the college-going, prancing-romancing hero? Even at 53, the Bachchan magic is as potent as ever.

But poor jumping jack Shah Rukh Khan! Dame Fortune deserted him, quashing all his dreams of being at the top Going by the mega success of Baazigar and Darr he should have been flying high and the most saleable actor in tinsel town But it seems people still love to watch Amitabh in action Tch, Tch Ajay Devgan and Jackie Shroff may stop flashing their fists of fury.

Amitabh has even dwarfed the popularity of mast, mast Akshay Kumar who has had women swooning over him ever since the release of Mohra and Yeh Dillagi But Akshay can take heart Women (and by last reports, also gays) blush at his SA

Like Amitabh Bachchan, Madhuri Dixit's popularity has also not waned. On the wrong side of 20 and in the industry for nearly a decade now, Madhuri remains the undisputed queen of the silver screen, her No 1 position unchallenged by sizzling newcomers like Kajol, Manisha Koirala, Raveena Tandon and Mamta Kulkarni

Manisha Koirala: Madhuri in the making

Hats off to this dhak dhak actress — Husain's current dream girl — for grooming herself to look more and more beautiful in every film she makes and for maturing into such a sensitive and fine actress

Industry pundits even wonder if she is a female Amitabh in the making for she is the only heroine whose name can make a difference to the price of a film.

Hum Aapke Hain Koun ! is still running to packed houses and her derriere-swinging Didi tera devar deewana has become a national craze.

But who will take off from Madhuri? Karishma? She is way down in the popularity chart And so is Kajol and Raveena and Manisha (though this was before Bombay.)

The grapevine has it that Madhuri commands a market rate of Rs 51 lakh — making her the highest paid actress in Indian cinema.

There is no way 'K-K-K-Kiran' Juhi Chawla (with five flops last year) can touch the Dixit damsel's popularity. So move over Sridevi, Juhi Chawla and others, Madhuri is here to reign. ■

Don Juan De Marco: About a young man in a mask (Johnny Depp), who has arrogated to himself the role of Don Juan, seducing every woman in sight.

He is put under the care of a psychiatrist (Marlon Brando) who tries at first to free the youth of his illusions and then begins to wonder whether there might be something to it.

Director Jeremy Leven, himself a former shrink, gives the film a comic treatment

Depp's cool and cute ways are enjoyable, and Brando, realising there is fun to be had there, has a whale of a time, specially in scenes with Faye Dunaway, who plays his wife.

He takes the movie to heights that match his impressive stature.

FASHION

Coming Klein: Fashion houses in Paris are swooning over a recent Calvin Klein presentation which has a model

It is stringed together at the neckline and falls ankle-deep in neatly pleated folds, flowing on to what looks like rooms of beautiful fabric.

Short, blonde hair, curled and swept at the side, leaves the neck long and inviting. The gown's rich satin colour is an exquisitely pleated ivory evening gown.

For someone whose fashions fit well with the American emphasis on physical fitness, the gown is meant to emphasise the luscious figure of the wearer.

BOOKS

Reeling details: This tome, Encyclopaedia of Indian Cinema, is the most comprehensive on the world's largest entertainment industry yet, and quite obviously a labour of love by Ashish Rajadhyaksha and Paul Willeman.

With over 1,460 entries on key films and with over 750 entries on key people and institutions with their filmographies, it covers every aspect of the industry one could possibly think of. From the student of cinema to the dilettante to the trivia buff, this book covering cinema from 1896 to 1992 is worth every single rupee of the price (Rs 995).

Having said all this, there is room for improvement: the authors show meticulous attention even in 'aka' entries, fascinatingly as 'Shankarsinh Raghuwanshi and Jaikishen Dayabhai Panchal' for music directors Shankar-Jaikishen, but do not give all of them (e g. Mithun Chakraborty's real name being Gauranga or Sridevi's full name being Anjanayelu) Ditto for spellings of names (Shekhar Kapur, Kamalahasan, Asha Bhosle) misspelt even by film buffs, but slipping on others (e g Nurjehan, Ajay Devgun).

A lot of important names are missing. you have Jahnu Barua, but not Jamuna Barua; K Bhagyaraj but not Bhagyashree; the Anand brothers, but not Suneil or Ketan; the Kapoor brothers, but not Randhir or Rishi or Rajeev or Karan or Kunal or Sanjna; the Mangeshkars but not Usha or Meena, you have the national award winning actress Sharada, but not the Shankar-Jaikishen singer-find, Sharda, Kaifi Azmi and Shabana, but not Shaukat or Baba, Balraj Sahni but not Parikshit; Dharmendra but not Sunny Deol.

Worse is the almost total ignore great cinematographers have been given. You do have cinematographer-directors like Babubhai Mistri, but not Fali Mistry or Jal Mistry, who were institutions in their own right.

Appalling is the inclusion of top actresses from Madhubala to Meena Kumari to Madhuri Dixit, but — can you believe it — not Mumtaz! Nor, for that matter any of the Khans, from Feroz/Sanjay/Akbar/Sameer to the current crop of Salman/Aamir/Shah Rukh.

For that matter, though it is updated till 1992, a whole body of contemporary names are missing none of the current superstars or the music directors (Anand-Milind, Nadeem-Shravan, etc), lyricists (Sameer, etc), playback singers (Kumar Sanu and gang) merit attention, it seems.

In such a voluminous undertaking, such gaps will be there and will have to be filled. But despite them, Oxford University Press (in association with the National Film Archives of India) and the British Film Institute have done meritorious service.

Quality is not what the multinationals are bringing to India for the first time. It's not a wonder gift from abroad Twenty years ago a brave new Indian company decided to go to any length to deliver quality Quality through superior technology And the auto industry was the first to benefit from it. The same commitment to quality took this relatively young company places. From fine blanking, IFB moved successfully into special purpose machines, home appliances, global trading, agribusiness and financial services. Everywhere quality took the front seat Today, IFB quality is recognised around the world With manufacturing plants in the UK and operations in 14 other countries, IFB is breaking new ground everywhere, everyday What's more, at a time when the world is being taken over by multinationals, India can be proud of the International Indian who redefined, perfected and presented quality long before the multinational Santas hit the scene

■ Plastic has become popular because most of the items of daily use which were earlier made of metals or glass have been replaced by an easy-to-use and easy-to-carry, attractive plastic

There is no need to get alarmed about the ill-effects of plastic since recycling has already started in India and per capita consumption is also not that high — 1 4 kg per annum as against the world average of 18 kgs

India, which is on the great road to globalisation liberalisation and rapid industrialisation should not demoralise the plastic industry

The plastic industry has an investment of about $1 7 billion and is poised to become a $5 billion industry in terms of investment by the turn of the century

An estimated 1,000 tonnes of plastic waste is received for sale to reprocessors everyday at plastic collection centres across the country Delhi being the nucleus market for plastic wastes in North India, has the largest plastic waste market in Asia — with about 5,000 dealers and more than 200 reprocessing units nearby

THE MARLON MYSTIQUE

Anna Kashfi, who claims she is an Indian and was raised in Calcutta, blames Marlon Brando for everything that has gone wrong in her life, and that of their only son Christian Devi Brando But a new biography of the actor asserts that Kashfi was a liar and created many of her own problems Arthur J. Pais reports

With Faye Dunaway in Don Juan DeMarco Veteran vibes

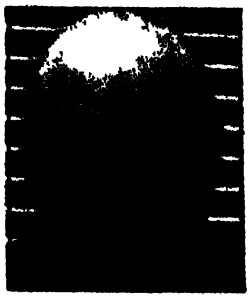
SOMEWHERE ON THE OUTSKIRTS OF THE chic tourist town of Santa Fe, in New Mexico, she lives in a trailer, getting comfort from her cats — and her alcohol. She meets reporters occasionally, but refuses to speak unless she is paid a hefty sum

The last time she gave an interview for an American television network about six months ago, Anna Kashfi got about $10,000. All that she had to do was to talk for about 10 minutes, and in those 10 minutes, she poured venom on the man who she asserted had not only driven her nearly insane, but turned her into an alcoholic, ruined her Hollywood career, and let their son, Christian Devi Brando, take to alcohol at 13 and quashed his Hollywood career.



Marlon Brando and Anna Kashfi· A wedding portrait

Christian is serving a jail sentence for killing the boyfriend of his half-sister, Cheyenne, following a drunken argument

To many Americans, Anna Kashfi is one of the many women Marlon Brando came to know, and with whom he had a tempestuous relationship But her story is uniquely tragic

According to Peter Manso, the author of Brando, the bestselling biography of Marlon Brando released early this year, Anna Kashfi snuffed her budding movie career by devoting herself to Brando initially

But her own short-fuse temperament, fondness for alcohol, and her determination to keep their son all to herself created a lot of problems for her Manso's book came out at the same time Brando himself published The Songs My Mother Taught Me

'She is fake and just used the so-called Indian connection to impress Brando,' says a Hollywood source. 'She knew nothing about India, truly. Otherwise would she have named her son Devi? She would have opted for Dev'

Brando with son Christian (centre) and second son Miko

Brando's will be ever infamous for its reticence, while he speaks little about the problems that he has caused unto himself and others, there is little about the likes of Anna Kashfi

There is a spate of books on Brando released and re-released recently Among them is Paul Ryan's Marlon Brando, an excellent study of the star and the factors that led to his downfall But Manso, who has written a definitive biography of Norman Mailer, and whose articles have appeared in Vanity Fair and Playboy, has written a far more engaging and thorough book than anything ever appeared on Brando'

Marlon Brando has refused to speak on Manso's voluminous book

Anna Kashfi, who arrived in Hollywood from Britian with dreams of making it big in movies, was born in Calcutta, according to her own accounts, and moved to England when she was a teenager

But her story has been disputed widely She had not been able to explain adequately how she got the name Kashfi

"She is fake and just used the so-called Indian connection to impress Brando," says a Hollywood source "She knew nothing about India, truly Otherwise would she have named her son Devi? She would have opted for Dev "

Introduced to Brando by director Edward Dmytryk, she became his girl friend in a few months — and pregnant in no time Though Brando was not prepared to marry anyone, he changed his mind because he did not feel like letting her abort the child Nor did he want to have an illegitimate child They were married in a secret civil ceremony in 1957

The marriage ran into trouble in no time Within a few weeks after they got married, William Patrick O'Callaghan, a Welsh factory worker told reporters that Anna was his daughter That her real name was Joanna, and that she had never stepped on Indian soil

He could not explain how she had a wheatish complexion "There must have been some gypsy blood in our family somewhere along the line," he is supposed to have joked

Dmytryk said he knew that Anna Kashfi had an Irish name on her passport, but he assumed that she was an Anglo-Indian

Brando told Anna Kashfi that she had betrayed him, but he was not going to dissolve the marriage He merely wanted to get to the bottom of the truth The private detectives he employed could not get Anna to say anything revealing

Brando's sister, Joycelyn, thought that Anna Kashfi had deluded herself into thinking that she had been born in India

To this day, Anna Kashfi has maintained that she was not only born in India, but had a brief and unhappy marriage to an Indian, too When Brando began championing the cause of American Indians in the Seventies and refused to accept an Oscar for this work in The Godfather as a protest against the treatment of American Indians in Hollywood movies, Anna Kashfi issued a statement that she, too, was an Indian — an Asian Indian — and that Brando had exploited her and ruined her life

Joycelyn told Manso "She had adopted that identity — that she was Indian from Darjeeling and raised in Calcutta "

While Brando withdrew from her for most hours of the day, Kashfi tried to win him over, but to no avail She thought she was intellectually inferior to him, and began taking classes at the University of California "so that she could discuss philosophy with him"

But even that did not help Meanwhile, the newspapers were running long stories about how the two were quarrelling, and were miserable Some of the pieces were utterly hostile

Hedda Hopper, the most celebrated of Hollywood gossips liked Anna Kashfi "My heart aches for the girl," she wrote "She doesn't deserve the rough treatment"

When Hedda Hopper's piece appeared, Brando got angrier Why did Anna speak to the reporter, he asked Hadn't he told her that "reporters are all scum" They are "hired buffoons, scribblers, assassins"

Manso believes that Brando's perpetual womanising caused a lot of strain on Kashfi and led to numerous quarrels between the two For all practical purposes, the marriage ended in less than a year after it was officiated

Brando, The Biography highlights some of the bitter fights

✔ Initially it was Marlon Brando who had limited visiting rights When Anna Kashfi convinced the court in late 1959 that Brando was creating chaos in her house because of his bad temper, the court restricted Brando's

A SHOT IN THE ARM

Marlon Brando may not have the kind of box-office clout some of the older actors like Paul Newman and Robert Redford have But after a spate of indifferently made movies, he has a winner in Don Juan DeMarco, a small budget comedy which has made good profits

Brando took the part mainly because Francis Ford Coppola — who directed him in The Godfather and Apocalypse Now — produced the film

He plays Jack Mickler, a highly respected psychiatrist who has fallen in bad times Into his life comes a young man (Johnny Depp) who claims to be Don Juan, the world's greatest lover, who had won over 1,000 women

But this Don Juan is distressed and sad; he has lost his most precious ladylove and is convinced that there is nothing left for him in life

How will Mickler, whose life itself is at its lowest level, help the-modernday Don Juan? As he tries to understand the mind of the young lover, Mickler is forced to examine the importance of love and passion in his own life as he rekindles the spark long since lost with his wife, Marilyn (Faye Dunaway)

Will Don Juan DeMarco revive Brando's career?

"It all depends on Brando," says author Peter Manso and a long-time Brando watcher. "If he has been really serious about his career, he would not let it deteriorate after the huge sucess of The Godfather.

If only Brando can cut down his weight, he can have a strong new career, his admirers in Hollywood say He has lost about 30 lbs in the past few months, but at 260 lbs he is still very, very overweight.

"It is not just the problem with his weight and slightly arrogant attitude," says an influential Hollywood agent "But he is carrying too much of an emotional burden

"All of us carry some emotional scars but Brando carries most The fact that one of his sons is in jail, and the fact that one of his ex-wives, Anna, continues bad mouthing him, has crippled his ability to perform to the best of his ability"

With Johnny Depp and Faye Dunaway in Don Juan DeMarco: Deep performances by each visiting hours She also objected to Brando bringing his girlfriends with him when he visited son Christian In 1960 she told the court that two-and-a-half-year-old Christian Devi had already acquired such phrases as "go to hell" and "f___ you" The judge told Brando "You are a great artiste, and have the right to your eccentricities I know you want to have a secure, healthy child You are not going to have one if this bitterness continues"

✔ But as Kashfi began to drink heavily, the court gave the custody of the boy to his father But she continued causing problems for Brando, walking into his house at all odd times, and surprising him in the bedroom in the presence of a lover On one occasion, a furious Brando bound her hands and feet, and did not release her for half an hour till the police took her away

✔ On many occasions Kashfi was so drunk that her son, now a teenager, who would visit her every week, would beg the neighbour to help him to put her to sleep "She would get up in the middle of the night," a former neighbour told Manso, "and rush into his bedroom and snatch him up from a deep sleep and slap him and yell at times hysterically for him to apologise He kept saying, "Well, Mommy, I would, but I don't know what I am apologising for." And when he apologised, she would scream at him "What are you apologising for? What did you do? In 1971, Brando and Kashfi were awarded joint custody of Christian, who had just turned 12

✔ Christain Devi Brando became an alcoholic when he was around 13. Brando would later say: "I found a bottle of Jack Daniel's and other liquor bottles under the furniture in his room "If you are going to smoke pot and you are going to drink, do it at home," I said I told him that I don't approve of it, though"

✔ When the relationship between the father and son deteriorated, Anna

MISS TAKES

About 15 years ago, Warner Brothers approached Marlon Brando to play a small but significant part in the movie, Superman. So high was Brando's stature just then — following The Last Tango in Paris and The Godfather, Warner offered him $5 million and the percentage from the movie's box-office gross

The movie grossed over $400 million worldwide and Brando took home more than $50 million.

But many do not know that Brando lost $11 million from The Godfather deal 20 years ago. When the film was completed, Brando was not only pessimistic about the film's box-office potential, but also needed money urgently to pay for his legal problems with his ex-wife Anna Kashfi.

He had been paid $1 million for the movie and was eligible for box-office points.

But Brando did not have the patience to wait for the movie's release; he urgently needed $100,000, and forced his agent to renegotiate the contract. Paramount Pictures, the producers of The Godfather, gave in, but insisted that Brando won't have any part of the box-office.

The Godfather not only earned solid critical praise, a slew of Oscars, but also made a big killing at the box-office

According to conservative estimates, Brando would have made at least $11 million had he not renegotiated his contract. To date, Brando blames Anna Kashfi and the other women in his life for his loss, Hollywood insiders say.

With Al Pacino in The Godfather

When Hedda Hopper's piece appeared, Brando got angrier. Why did Anna Kashfi speak to the reporter, he asked. Hadn't he told her that 'reporters are all scum'. They are 'hired buffoons, scribblers, assassins' her wedding Her drinking worsened She often claimed that men loyal to Brando beat her up "It looked as if she was being beaten," a friend told Manso "But, in fact, it was because she was always falling down when she was drunk and stoned "

✔ She made one solid effort in 1975 to get the custody of her son She told the court that she had become sober, but Brando's emotional problems continued During a skiing trip at Sun Valley the previous winter, Brando had thrown a just showered, towel-clad

Kashfi attacks Brando outside a Santa Monica courtroom after a custody hearing

Kashfi bolted to Mexico with Christian Devi Brando hired a top-notch private detective who managed to get the mother and child back to America Meanwhile Kashfi wrote the book, Brando for Breakfast, in which she gave a totally negative picture of the actor He was the worst husband, worst father, and worst human being, she argued

In 1974, Anna Kashfi married again, but her husband died a few years after Christian to the terrace, then locked the door, keeping the boy outside in 15° F When Christian demanded to be let in, she alleged, Brando "dropped his pants, pressed his buttocks to the glass, and yelled 'Here, climb into this '"

Anna Kashfi, however, had no luck with the court

As years progressed, Christian Devi Brando turned out to be one of Hollywood's loneliest celebrity-sons Following his own comeback through The Godfather, Brando tried to get his son small parts in movies But Christian did not impress anyone in Hollywood His problems continued to grow, and then came the murder of his half-sister's boyfriend

Today, Christian is in a jail in California, and it would not be at least a few years before he is released What will happen then is anybody's guess

"The story of Marlon Brando, Anna and Christian Devi Brando is enough to fuel a mini-series," a Hollywood agent says "I wonder why nobody has thought of it "

HELL OF A MARRIAGE

An extract from Nellie Bly's book, Marlon Brando Larger than life

"Marlon leaves a lot to be desired as a romancer"

— Anna Kashfi

In October 1955, at 31, Brando was introduced to Anna Kashfi in the Paramount Studio commissary She had a small role in The Mountain He asked to be introduced She claims she had never seen any of his films and did not recognise him He followed up with a phone call to Paramount publicist Harry Mines, looking to date her

In her memoir, Brando for Breakfast, the demure Miss Kashfi recalls that she declined — unless she could bring a traditional amah or chaperone Brando agreed But it was Brando who brought the chaperone, his friend producer George Englund (One wonders why, if Miss Kashfi felt she needed a chaperon on her date with Brando, she would feel safer with another bachelor along Perhaps it can be attributed to the strange ways of the East)

In her memoir, Miss Kashfi claimed to be the product of "an unregistered alliance" between Devi Kashfi, "a professional architect," and Selma Ghose, and was born September 30, 1934 in Calcutta When she was two years old, she says, her mother married an Englishman, William Patrick O'Callaghan, and she was educated at a convent school in Darjeeling in the north of India She further claimed that at 18 she briefly attended the London School of Economics, and her mother and stepfather relocated to a small seacoast town in Wales

She was discovered at a party in London by a Paramount scout and soon found herself acting opposite Spencer Tracy in The Mountain, which was filmed in the French Alps When the production moved to the Paramount lot in Hollywood, she moved with it

According to Kashfi, she and Brando had dated for several months before they made love One night, in her apartment, he carried her into the bedroom When she asked if he had rape in mind, she claims he answered "Rape is just assault with a friendly weapon" Kashfi reports that he "is not well appointed" and refers to his sexual organ as "my noble tool"

MARILYN MONROE

In 1955 he also drew close to Marilyn Monroe After his blazing success in On the Waterfront, she had pressed Samuel Goldwyn for a part in his next film, Guys and Dolls She hoped one of her first independent projects would star Brando and Charles Chaplin

Asked to define sex appeal, Marilyn said, "There are people to whom other people react and other people who do nothing for people I react to men, too personally, I react to Marlon Brando" Marilyn never fulfilled her desire to work with Brando, but, according to biographer Anthony Summers, they did have an affair

Marilyn spoke of him to a friend as "sweet, tender" A photograph taken of them together at an Actors Studio benefit in December 1955, after the world premiere of The Rose Tattoo, shows Marilyn and Brando looking dreamily happy together

The friendship faded, but Summers claimed that in 1962, in the last days before her death, Marilyn would spend hours talking on the telephone with Brando

Anna had been hospitalised with tuberculosis at the City of Hope Medical Center in Duarte, California "Marlon was there constantly," recalls columnist Cindy Adams "No dark glasses, no back doors, no hiding Spoke to patients, gave autographs, hit the cafeteria Yet (he) lied to reporters that he even knew Kashfi"

Something about seeing Kashfi laying there in bed, weak and helpless, seemed to stir memories of his mother According to Kashfi, he began bringing her some of his late mother's possessions — "earrings, a brooch, her Bible, on one visit he brought the pillow she had died on (two years earlier)" He also shared memories of Dodie, including, according to Kashfi, a tale of urging his friend Carlo Fiore to seduce his mother while they were living together in New York

Fiore himself was there when Brando told her "I wish my mother was alive I wish she was here to meet you I'm sure you'd both love each other You are so much alike" And the ominous words "Yet- it's better that my mother is dead If she had lived, I could never have loved you She wouldn't have let me go" Kashfi later discovered that the latter thought was not original, but lifted from a letter from D H Lawrence to Frieda

Had she known that the thought was not original, she might have understood that this is a man for whom the line between authentic emotion and acted emotion often seems blurred

While she was hospital-bound, Kashfi claims, Brando, asked her to marry him and she accepted Ultimately, she would come to believe that "Marlon yearned to share himself with another person but that he could not and cannot"

That March, Brando left for a research tour of South-East Asia for his film for the United Nations Assistance Program

At his press conference in Singapore, Brando called fan magazines, "scavengers, against whom the libel laws give no protection" He complained, "I have enemies in the film world, because I don't want to follow the dictates of certain companies or give interviews to columnists I don't know " He criticised America for being "shoddy, vulgar, and commercial " He also met with local government and film dignitaries He praised Asian reporters for their "intelligent questions instead of the foolish emphasis on my sex life which I have to tolerate in the United States " The UNESCO movie never happened

On April 23, 1956, Brando arrived in Tokyo to begin filming Teahouse His co-stars were Glenn Ford and Louis Calhern Brando played Sakini, the Oriental houseboy

Brando and Glenn Ford loathed each other Louis Calhern died during filming Calhern was found dead in his hotel room on May 12

When Kashfi was released on Thanksgiving Day 1956, they celebrated with dinner at the home of Marlon's sister Jocelyn and her second husband, Eliot Asinof Marlon moved Anna into an apartment in the same West Hollywood building where Marlon Sr was living

A week later, while in New York for the premiere of Teahouse, he bought Anna an engagement ring of four clusters of pearls on a platinum band But when he brought it back to California and slipped it on her finger, he asked her to keep the engagement a secret from his family and reporters

According to Kashfi, Brando has always kept two cars In their courting days, he took her out in a battered and unkempt Volkswagen The white Thunderbird convertible that Sam Goldwyn gave him for Guys and Dolls

Rita Moreno Brando had a tempestuous affair with her, here she is in hospital after a car accident

Testifying on behalf of his son in court was reserved for "private occasions behind the public eye"

According to Kashfi, Brando returned from filming Sayonara in Japan having completely embraced the Japanese way He wanted her to wear kimonos, to dress and behave like a geisha, specially when it came to attending him

And about a month after he returned from Japan, she found a woman's black wig on his bedroom headboard He admitted it belonged to Rita Moreno There was a quarrel, a separation, a reunion A renewed engagement And Brando was soon off to Europe for pre-production on his next Fox film, The Young Lions, while Kashfi began filming Cowboy with Jack Lemmon and Glenn Ford

Around this time, Carlo Fiore, concerned about Anna's jealousy, tried to discourage the relationship Brando wouldn't hear of it, but he wasn't willing to give up any of the other women he was seeing either

"With women, I've got a long bamboo pole with a leather loop on the end of it," he told his friend "I slip the loop around their necks so that they can't get away or come too close Like catching snakes "

In late September, Anna Kashfi discovered she was pregnant and they decided to marry One night she and Marlon were awakened in bed by violent banging on his front door It was Rita Moreno Anna said, "It's her or me Make a choice — right now "

The wedding on October 11 1957 was at his Aunt Betty Lindemeyer's house in Eagle Rock Screenwriter Peter Berneis and his wife Ina were the witnesses Among the guests were his friends Kathy and Louis L'Armour But his father was barred

Anna recalls that her friends the L'Armours drove her to Betty Lindemeyer's house She had a premonition that she shouldn't be doing this, and L'Armour assured her that she could still back out But she went forward

But not immediately First, she decided, she had to have a nosegay of Madonna lilies But the closest place for the lilies was San Francisco, and that took two hours Meanwhile, everyone drank champagne and "by the time the lilies arrived," Kashfi recalls, "I was tipsy enough to have said, 'I do' to a baboon"

Anna yearned to be married in a Buddhist ceremony because she admired its simplicity and symbolism Marlon claimed that no Buddhist monk could be found in Los Angeles and offered to arrange for a Zen ceremony, which, Kashfi "felt to be ill-suited to my temperament" They compromised on a Presbyterian minister, Reverend J Walter Fiscus, pastor of the Little Brown Church in the Valley in North Hollywood

The groom wore a dark suit, opera cape, and homburg, the bride wore a green and gold sari

She discovered that Brando had not made any plans for a honeymoon, but his friend Jay Kanter offered them the use of his Beverly Hills house There they spent their wedding night, until she contacted her friends the L'Armours and arranged to spend the next week with them at their house in Palm Desert L'Armour and Brando spent hours target shooting with 0 38 revolver

In the outside world, news was breaking that a William Patrick O'Callaghan was claiming to be Anna's father, a claim that she vehemently denied According to her, he was her stepfather, her name was always Anna Kashfi and she only adopted Joan O'Callaghan for immigration quotas

Although Marlon stood by her, she grew to feel that she saw less of him now than before they were married

Anna grew rapidly disenchanted with her movie star husband She told Heda Hopper "Marlon leaves a lot to be desired as a romancer He's just plain clumsy and that's the truth If he were not a film star, he wouldn't get to first base with women"

Kashfi seemed to revel in belittling her husband in the press She told another reporter "Living with Marlon is like an afternoon at the races — short periods of orgiastic activity followed by long periods of boredom and anticipation He's almost never home" She added "He attracts women like faeces attract flies"

Brando attended the 1958 Academy Awards with friend George Englund Anna, eight months pregnant stayed home She did not get to see him lose

Domestic life chez Brando was tumultuous The staff, consisting of a cook, two gardeners, a chauffeur. and Anna's personal maid turned over frequently They discharged one cook when they found out she was raising extra money by offering guided tours of their house, with dinner for 50 cents a head "Fifty cents per person!" Marlon said, "I should think the traffic would bear a dollar"

France Nuyen with whom Brando had a longterm relationship

According to Carlo Fiore, when the Brandos quarreled, Anna displayed a "frightening" rage "During one argument, she came out of the bathroom with a huge bar of soap in her hand and let it fly at Marlon," he recalled, "It got him between the eyes and cracked in half Stunned, he staggered back and almost fell" On another occasion, Fiore says, Anna left baby Christian alone in her car parked on Wilshire Boulevard while she confronted Brando in his office, "beating at him with her fists, in a frenzy of rage"

On May 11, Mother's Day, 1958, Anna gave birth to a son, Marlon named Christian for his friend Christian Marquand She wanted to name him Devi, after her father They compromised on Christian Devi He called the boy Christian or Chris, she called him Devi

According to Kashfi, when she was breastfeeding the weeks-old baby, Brando returned home with the 18-year-old France Nuyen, who berated her for eating curry while breastfeeding, and took her last mango from the refrigerator Kashfi ordered him to get her out of the house The two of them left

According to Brando biographer Charles Higham, Nuyen denies the episode described by Kashfi

Nuyen told Higham that "Anna was completely out of the picture in Marlon's life when I met him again For six months, I resisted him, but his humour, cleverness, and little-boy qualities finally succeeded in winning me over He made me laugh He was very sweet"

Trapped in her unhappy marriage, Kashfi began to abuse alcohol and barbiturates She also lashed out at Brando himself, pulling his hair, throwing dishes at him, heaping him with verbal abuse.

The Brandos were headed for an eventual divorce, but according to Kashfi, their respective studios, MGM and Paramount, prevailed on her to delay any action so as not to affect their current films

Kashfi made one more film, Night of the Quarter Moon, with John Barrymore, Jr and Julie London, at MGM in 1958 Her Japanese maid, Sako Milligen, looked after Devi One afternoon in September, on a break from filming, Anna was napping at home while Sako swam in the pool Anna awakened to find Sako floating face down in the water She summoned the police, fire department, and Brando's business manager Somehow in the confusion word got out that it was Anna who had drowned Brando raced home, walked into the house and came face to face with his wife "Good God," he said, "you're still alive"

The death of Sako and her husband's reaction crystalised Anna's feelings and she fled that night, with her son She soon moved into a house in Coldwater Canyon

According to Kashfi, Brando soon surrendered himself to a parade of women, video-taping the encounters via a camera at the foot of his bed

Halfway through the production of One-eyed Jacks, Anna filed for divorce in Santa Monica Superior Court She charged Brando with causing "grievous mental suffering, distress, and injury" Anna's friend Kathy I 'Armour supported her claims of mental anguish She flew with Devi to stay with friends in Hawaii

Anna's petition for divorce was uncontested and became final on April 22, 1959

The settlement was a relatively generous $60,000 cash with $500,000 to be paid out over the next 10 years She also received $1,000 a month for child support until their son was of age and medical and dental coverage of over $500 a year

In mid-August, at two in the morning, Brando would later tell the Santa Monica court, "while I was home in bed, (Anna) came in and flung herself on the bed and bit me three times and slapped me I tried to restrain her and got her out of the house, but she went to get in her car and tried to run over me I went back in my house and locked the doors She threw a log through one of the windows and came back into the house through the windows I held her down on the bed and tied her up. I then called the police I told them I would not press charges and asked them to escort her home She refused but the police persuaded her"

GODFATHER RETURNS

Marlon Brando's comeback film, Don Juan DeMarco, is not a movie to remember, except for the brilliant performances by Johnny Depp and the veteran actor, feels Derek Malcolm

There are times when star power really is the thing, and it would be churlish not to celebrate the return to the screen of Marlon Brando in Don Juan DeMarco It is not a film to remember for anything much else, except perhaps that Johnny Depp stands up to Brando as the best young actor in Hollywood

Depp plays a young man who plans to kill himself because his one true love cannot stand the thought of his previous 1,503 conquests He is a latter-day Don Juan, so convinced of his identity that he wears the clothes of the period and is prepared to defend his honour with a sword

Naturally, the police who prevent him from killing himself in the nick of the time, get him to the nuthouse as quickly as possible Here Dr Mickler (Brando), a psychiatrist on the point of retirement, decides that one more case will not do any harm He is given 10 days to evaluate his delusional patient and recommend something other than the custodial treatment all other shrinks demand

Gradually, the doctor discovers that he is getting the treatment Listening to the young man's stories of passion, and watching nurses - male and female — falling hook, line and sinker for his patient, he goes home and finds himself courting his wife (Faye Dunaway) again

That's clearly the point of Jeremy Leven's film, which is almost a moral tale padded out to make a full-length feature Possibly it has its roots in some sort of experience, as the first-time writer-director has served time as both a Harvard professor and as a clinical psychologist

The presence of Brando and Depp is the bull point and, since we seldom see him nowadays, it is Brando's performance we look at most closely He is now as big as a whale and a bit self-conscious about it, to judge by the often diplomatic camera angles

But he does allow himself a joke at his own expense, when he comments to an almost equally tubby police inspector that they must both have gone to the same bakery And, right at the end he even allows himself a little jig of joy as he and his wife realise what Don Juan has accomplished for them in the way of emotional renewal One wondered if their legs could carry the body through it But they do, and very nicely too

Elsewhere, he warms to his part with a lightness of touch and incipient sense of humour that seldom fails If this was to be his epitaph on screen it would be a genuinely charming one, since the film is sentimental but rarely cloying

As for Depp, the part seems made for him, and he plays it without narcissism or camp You even begin to believe he may be who he says he is, and certainly that there would be no harm at all, as the psychiatrist suggests, to allow him to think it

At times, the film skates on thin ice There's the bed scene between Brando and Dunaway which one desperately hopes will not develop into an awkward sexual spasm, and the sequence in the restaurant where the couple revaluate their marriage with roses, jewellery and one of those embarrassing bands to serenade them

Thankfully Brando is good enough to transcend any awkwardness even if he is not, by any stretch of the imagination, Cary Grant By comparison Dunaway looks a little congealed in the sauce of it all But she keeps her end up without blushing and looking rather like a she-wolf thinking of dinner

The whole, though no great shakes as cinema, is romantic without being supersweet and, despite the weight of its leading actor, avoids the heaviness of most Hollywood attempts to spring a tear It is also the rare phenomenon, a good story decently told

But it is the acting that counts, and that, thanks to Brando and Depp, makes this sort of thing effortless and a good deal more sustaining than it might have been in other hands

THE OLD PHOTOGRAPH

I was 10 years old My grandmother sat on the string bed, under the mango tree It was late summer and there were sunflowers in the garden and a warm wind in the trees My grandmother was knitting a woolen scarf for the winter months She was very old, dressed in a plain white sari Her eyes were not very strong now but her fingers moved quickly with the needles and the needles kept clicking all afternoon Grandmother had white hair but there were few wrinkles on her skin

I had come home after playing cricket on the maidan I had taken my meal and now I was rummaging in a box of old books and family heirlooms that had just been brought out of the attic by my mother Nothing in the box interested me very much except for a book with colourful pictures of birds and butterflies I was going through the book looking at the pictures when I found a small photograph between the pages

It was a faded picture, a little yellow and foggy It was a picture of a girl standing against a wall, and behind the wall there was nothing but sky But from the other side, a pair of hands reached up as though someone was going to climb the wall There were flowers growing near the girl, but I could not tell what they were, there was a creeper too, but it was just a creeper

I ran out into the garden "Granny!" I shouted "Look at this picture! I found it in the box of old things Whose picture is it?"

I jumped on the bed beside my grandmother and she walloped me on the bottom and said, "Now I've lost count of my stitches and the next time you do that, I'll make you finish the scarf yourself "

Granny was always threatening to teach me how to knit which I thought was a disgraceful thing for a boy to do It was a good deterrent for keeping me out of mischief Once I tore the drawing room curtains and Granny had to put a needle and thread in my hands and made me stitch the curtain together even though I made long two-inch stitches which had to be taken out by my mother and done again

She took the photograph from my hand and we both stared at it for quite a long time The girl had long, loose hair and she wore a loose dress that nearly covered her ankles and sleeves that reached her wrists There were a lot of bangles on her hands but despite all her draperies, the girl appeared to be full of freedom and movement She stood with her legs apart and her hands on her hips and had a wide, almost devilish smile on her face

"Whose picture is it?" I asked

"A little girl's of course," said grandmother "Can't you tell?"

"Yes, but did you know the girl?"

"Yes, I knew her," said Granny "But she was a very wicked girl and I shouldn't tell you about her But I'll tell you about the photograph It was taken in your grandfather's house about 60 years ago and that's the garden wall and over the wall was a road going to town "

"Whose hands are they?" I asked, "coming up the other side?"

Grandmother squinted and looked closely at the picture and shook her head "It's the first time I noticed," she

'Yes, I remember...I remember what is not in the photograph. It was a spring day, and there was cool breeze blowing, nothing like this. Those flowers at the girl's feet, they were marigolds, and the bougainvillaea creeper, it was a mass of purple. You cannot see these colours in the photo, and even if you could, as nowadays, you wouldn't be able to smell the flowers or feel the breeze'

said "They must have been the sweeper boy's Or maybe they were your grandfather's "

"They don't look like grandfather's hands," I said "His hands are all bony "

"Yes, but this was 60 years ago "

"Didn't he climb up the wall after the photo?"

"No, nobody climbed up At least, I don't remember "

"And you remember well, Granny "

"Yes, I remember I remember what is not in the photograph It was a spring day, and there was cool breeze blowing, nothing like this Those flowers at the girl's feet, they were marigolds, and the bougainvillaea creeper, it was a mass of purple You cannot see these colours in the photo, and even if you could, as nowadays, you wouldn't be able to smell the flowers or feel the breeze "

"And what about the girl?" I said "Tell me about the girl "

"Well, she was a wicked girl," said Granny "You don't know the trouble they had getting her into those fine clothes she's wearing "

"I think they are terrible clothes," I said

"So did she Most of the time, she hardly wore a thing She used to go swimming in a muddy pool with a lot of ruffianly boys, and ride on the backs of buffaloes No boy ever teased her, though, because she could kick and scratch and pull his hair out!"

"She looks like it too," I said "You can tell by the way she's smiling At any moment something's going to happen "

"Something did happen," said Granny "Her mother wouldn't let her take off the clothes afterwards, so she went swimming in them, and lay for half-an-hour in the mud

I laughed heartily and grandmother laughed too

"Who was the girl?" I said "You must tell me who she was "

"No, that wouldn't do," said grandmother, "I won't tell you "

I knew the girl in the photo was really grandmother, but I pretended I didn't know I knew, because Granny still smiled in the same way, even though she didn't have as many teeth

"Come on, Granny," I said, "tell me, tell me "

But Grandmother shook her head and carried on with the knitting, and I held the photograph in my hand looking from it to my grandmother and back again, trying to find points in common between the old lady and the little pig-tailed girl A lemon-coloured butterfly settled on the end of grandmother's knitting needle, and stayed there while the needles clicked away I made a grab at the butterfly, and it flew off in a dipping flight and settled on a sunflower

"I wonder whose hands they were," whispered grandmother, to herself, with her head bowed, and her needles clicking away in the soft warm silence of that summer afternoon

O JERUSALEM

Instead of roads, these days there are merely airports And if we make our own hell here on earth then airport departure lounges are certainly purgatory This occurred to me as I waited for a delayed flight which was to take me for the first time in my life to the land of Israel

I was, thanks to a bargain ticket, to fly first to Amman and then to cross the nearby Allenby Bridge which spans the narrow Jordan river, the border between the two countries

Friends had told me that since the Israel-PLO peace agreement, there was no problem in crossing the border but that in Jordan you had to call it the King Hussein Bridge and not definitely the Allenby Bridge

This did not seem strange After all, the Indo-Pakistan border crossing is known as Attari on one side and Wagha on the other

The aeroplane arrived, we boarded and four hours later, disembarked It was noon and hot I walked up to the knot of Arab drivers outside the main exit "King Hussein Bridge," I said There was no response "Allenby, Jerusalem," I tried Still nothing

They spoke among themselves and I heard the words "Sheikh Hussein" This must surely be the Arabic for King Hussein "Sheikh Hussien!" I said

A taxi driver gestured to me to follow and we set off "Welcome to Amman " said the driver, who soon pulled over and purchased a bottle of mineral water and a can of Pepsi for me

What hospitable people these are, I thought, as we set off again on our brief journey to the border

We sped past the capital, through pale, sun-bleached, stony hills to a barren brown mountainside which dropped steeply in to the haze of the great Rift Valley, down the centre of which flows the Jordan river

As we coasted down the mountainside we passed cars and jeeps standing with their radiators boiling in the desert sun Crossing the sea level mark, we descended to one of the lowest points on earth and turned north

Here there was some greenery — orange trees, and by the road, red-flowering gulmohurs, eucalyptus and even lantana bushes

An hour and a half into the journey I began to feel nervous, and half an hour later I became convinced I was being kidnapped The King Hussein Bridge was never this far away "Where is the bridge?" I importuned the driver

"No English," came the reply as we raced on through the sparsely populated countryside

Just as I had given up hope, I saw a sign in Arabic which included the words, "Sheikh Hussien" We turned left and, passing a security checkpost, drew up at the border

A man carried my luggage up to the passport check, where the official on duty's only concern seemed to be to find out if I had any children I said no "Why no babies?" he continued unpleasantly

I fixed him with a basilisk stare, and by threatening him with the fact that I was a journalist managed to retrieve my passport which he was hanging on to for no good reason

I then joined the few others waiting to cross and climbed into a bus to enter the Promised Land A narrow, green wooden bridge spanned the tiny, reed-banked Jordan The Israeli side was less relaxed, festooned with spirals of barbed wire, a young soldier in a watchtower observing us through binoculars

All the officials in the air-conditioned search room on the Israeli side of the border looked to me as though they should still be in school But then Israel has a very young population — the average age is twenty-six

They did not give me a good first impression of Israel Arrogant and rude, they went through every piece of my luggage — and X-rayed it twice I was carrying two trout-fishing reels for a friend

"This is a forbidden object," cried one boy triumphantly He was no angler but after I had mimed trout-fishing for him, he finally returned the reels to me

Exhausted, I eventually trundled past passport control with my luggage on a squeaky trolley which seemed only to go round in circles and made my way slowly to the sun-baked barrier "Aren't you hot?" asked the young man at the barrier charmlessly "Please open the gate," I replied and took direction for the taxis

A lone taxi stood before me "How much to Jerusalem?" I asked "Two Hunded and fifteen shekels," came the reply

"Why so much?"

"It's 120 kilometres "

The penny began to drop This could not be the Allenby Bridge It was somewhere much more distant But at least I was in the right country I climbed in and we headed south through desert hills interspersed with green oases of drip irrigation The driver knew little English, but understood when I said I had come from India

"India," he mused

"Raj Kapoor, Ichak Dana, Saira Banu, Dilip Kumar," I interjected

"Amitabh Bachchan," he continued, "Many, many film I have seen, great music "

I took out a cassette of Bombay from my luggage in a gesture of friendship and so it was that to the strains of Kucchi Kucchi Rakkamma I first raised mine eyes unto the hills and beheld Jerusalem — with its new housing colonies all in white Jerusalem stone, its highways, multiple traffic lights and greenery

But from my driver's reaction I can safely say that A R Rahman and Mani Ratnam will never replace Raj Kapoor in Israeli hearts

A view of the well from the top through a series of structures

The step-well at Adalaj in Gujarat is still unsurpassed in architectural beauty, romance and tradition, says Bhuwan Mohan

Photographs by the author

The Indian countryside is dotted with ruins of all kinds — tombs of now forgotten chieftains, once glorious temples and palaces of sirkar, minars, mosques, havelis. Gujarat is no exception, but here, there are hydraulic structures of various kinds — cisterns, tanks and wells.

And of these, step-wells, locally known as vavs are unique to the state.

There are, we were informed, about 120 step-wells or vavs spread across the landscape of Gujarat, the oldest such structure being the Rani Vav at Patan, 80 kms from Ahmedabad, dating back to the 11th century A.D.

But, the one constructed in the 15th century in the sleepy village of Adalaj is the most popular among them, possibly because of its proximity to the cities of Ahmedabad and Gandhinagar, the capital of Gujarat.

Known as Adalaj Vav, it is located at a distance of 20 kms from Ahmedabad and five kms from Gandhinagar on the Ahmedabad-Meshana main highway.

A totally unexpected sight awaits as one nears this vav in Adalaj which really is a na vav, literally meaning an "upside-down architecture of a step-well".

Initially, from a distance, it looks like any other ordinary well but as one goes closer to it, it proves to be a feast for the eyes. And, it is the right moment to ready the camera and the sight is such that you do not need to search for the objects to click.

The beauty of this architectural marvel keeps on enhancing as you step into it and start going downwards. Built of sandstones, one can enter into this step-well from three different sides which consist of octagonal (ashtakon) landings with huge carved colonnades and exquisitely carved niches. Its architecture is a fusion of Hindu and Muslim style which shows the influence of the earlier Solanki rulers in this part of the country.

In these carvings, the leafy creepers — typical adornments of Muslim architecture — co-exist with Hindu symbols which include animal motifs: the bird, the horse and the elephant together with navagrahas (nine planets) and images of Goddess Shakti.

Among other carvings on the panels are a king sitting on a stool with two chauri bearers, a scene showing churning of butter milk, musicians accompanying dancing females besides abstract symbols of gods and goddesses. One can also see traces of Bud-

Hindu and Jain influence on some of the pillars and walls.

Like many other ancient structures, the legend behind the origin of the vav is as much interesting as its architectural beauty and is shrouded in mystery and romance. In the past, the area between the present day Mehsana and Adalaj—called Dandai Desh—was ruled by Rana Veer Singh of the Vaghela dynasty.

Around this time, Mohammed Begda, a Muslim ruler of a neighbouring province attacked Dandai Desh and killed Rana Veer Singh. When the victor's eyes fell on Veer Singh's wife, Rani Roopba—an enticing beauty true to her name—he sent a proposal for marriage.

The heartbroken and subjugated but determined queen did not succumb to the pressure but played safe and agreed to the proposal on condition that he complete a five-storeyed water vav as a sign of devotion Begda, hypnotised by the glamorous charm of Rani Roopba, agreed to take on the challenging job

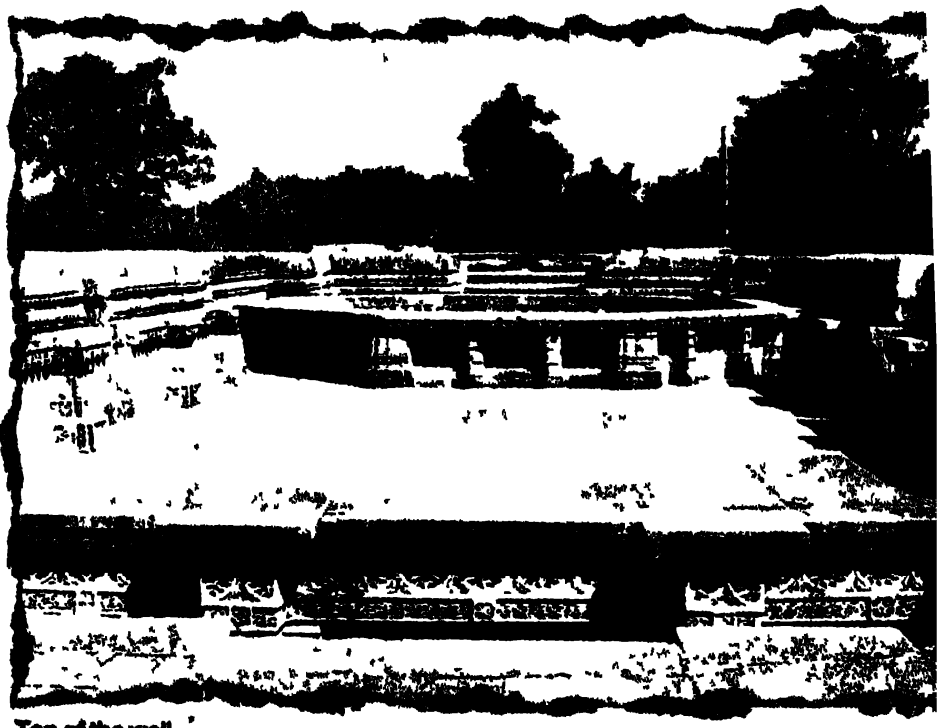
Construction of the 500-year-old step-well had, in fact, begun years ago under Rana Veer Singh, the slain king, but the work had to be abruptly stalled due to unavoidable circumstances.

Begda re-started the project with great enthusiasm and left no stone unturned (literally as well as figuratively) in order to complete the work in a record time so that he did not have to wait long to marry Roopba.

When the five-storeyed exquisite edifice, costing more than five lakh gold coins, was complete but for the dome, the unsuspecting ruler renewed his proposal to Roopba and asked her hand in marriage.

Roopba did not say a word and returned to her palace in grief. Begda took this silence as an affirmation. However, next day she took a final round, inspecting closely the monumental structure and once satisfied, went and stood at the top storey, in the area overlooking the well.

Saying a final prayer, she flung herself into the water and was immediately drowned. Roopba, in a true tradition of ekapativrata (vow of one husband only), preferred to commit suicide than marry a second time. Thus, Rani Roopba's jal samadhi has sanctified the place and the village folks flock around the well, carry its sacred water back and use it for purposes of worship just like the sacred Ganga water.



Overcome with rage and shock at the unexpected turn of events, Mohammed Begda ordered to stop further construction. The dome was, therefore, never built. Fortunately, Begda, did not insist on demolishing the monument—probably because Roopba had cleverly, and with immense farsight, employed Muslim masons to do the construction and decorated it with Islamic motifs.

The ornamentation here is derived from the mosque and funeral-halls of the 15th and 16th century Gujarat sultans. On one of the storeys one comes across a little Hindu shrine, surreptitiously hidden in an obscure corner. This was probably deliberately done to escape the attention of non-believers and vandals.

to reach to the water level when a pulley was already serving the purpose?

To this, several answers may come to mind. Maybe, such a big pulley was not available then and this was the only alternative. Another is that, while one person can draw water using the pulley, here many persons at one time can reach the well and fetch water. And yet, there could be some other answers to this vexed question, but instead of unveiling this mystery, I preferred to immerse myself in the grandiose of its architecture.

Besides this, another niche here houses an ami khumb or a pot that contains the water of life, and a kalpa vriksha or a tree motif made out of a single stone-slab. These sites attract villa-

Top of the well

The main attraction for the visitors is, of course, the pool of water at the lowest level at about 100 feet below the ground. Not too long ago, young men used to show-off diving feats from various heights for the visitors and earn money in return.

But now, all that is no longer allowed, specially ever since the vav became a protected monument under the auspices of the Archaeological Survey of India.

Upon looking straight up one can see the pulley, as used in the conventional wells, that was once, and can still be, used for hauling up water. One question comes to the mind. What was the use of making such gigantic steps gers on religious and auspicious occasions like marriages and sacred thread ceremonies.

The entire edifice is enclosed in an oversized boundary in which trees, plants, and shrubs have been planted. Here, in the vicinity, there are graves of six masons who were instrumental in erecting this step-well. It is believed that when Mohammed Begda asked them if another, a better vav was possible, they had replied in the affirmative.

This proved to be their undoing and they were instantly put to death. And, that is why perhaps, this hydraulic structure, among mynad such structures in Gujarat, stands unrivalled even today reflecting the romance, purity of

(for Mohit)

I have walked these beaches, tried hard, hard to keep the ocean's water
Within the clasp of my palms
Dust and memories, linger And I have mercifully aged Harsh sand grains rub the ugly knots on my hands
Have I learned any? Am I wiser for the sojourn in the sand?
Never a seeker after knowledge, I have buried my toe in sand, pushed the next shaky step into salt water,
weed, grime, and a bit of life

I loved, merely
I never found such a thing, just love
Not pure, never simple But, who knows?
Yes, the stars danced as the winds carried the ocean's wrap
I was witness to the moon raking in the wild, wild harvest
The waves licked the oceans edges on moonless nights,
the slow drudgery of a passionless act
It is better to die than live by habit

The joys are there
A life to live And, love?
The wise man rolls on sand, gathers no moss, no sparks of new knowledge

There is no such pure, or simple, stuff

The Torn Shirt

Loved the colour of that torn shirt
Breath of fresh air, once upon a time
shakens me now, embarasses me
Where have they all gone?
Lost to the birds and the bees, that torn shirt, a skeleton now
How do I escape from its clutches?
Loved the colour of that piece of cloth
straddled on a hanger Memory still azure, like the new suntinted Maruti
I remember morosely the glazed colour of that torn shirt
Cringes now in this twilight hour

Loved really, memorably the colour of that favourite shirt, on display in the hanger Aspect now of my nakedness, my sordidness

So what's cooking?: If you are planning to knock off a few calories from your rich, oily meals this is for you!

Square Automation Private Limited has come up with a steam cooker – Cooklite, claimed as the first of its kind in India.

The cooker is ideal for the health-conscious, calorie-watching segment. Equipped with an imported timer and an automatic shut-off facility, Cooklite has a transparent body made of durable polycarbonate to absorb high temperatures.

Priced at Rs 1,650 in Bombay and Rs 1,750 in other regions, this product may be a quick way to eat light.

Tough ones: News for the sporty types; Phoenix has launched a new range of sports shoes called Tuffs. Tuffs is a cool combination of trendy, imported designs, high quality PV soles and leather/synthetics uppers.

Phoenix, having a 25 per cent share in the sports shoe market in India, plans to target the middle income segment with prices ranging from Rs 350 to Rs 700.

These Better Sight Centres (BSC) would be using the sophisticated Excimer Laser and Corneal Topography System to remove most vision disorders and thus eliminate dependence on glasses or contact lenses.

In Calcutta, Life Line Nursing Home would be housing eastern India's first BSC; by the end of July. Three well-known Calcutta-based opthalmologists, specialised in refractive surgery, will be trained by an American opthalmologist.

The Centre claims to offer a permanent cure for the deficiency and would charge a one-time fee of Rs 9,500 per eye.

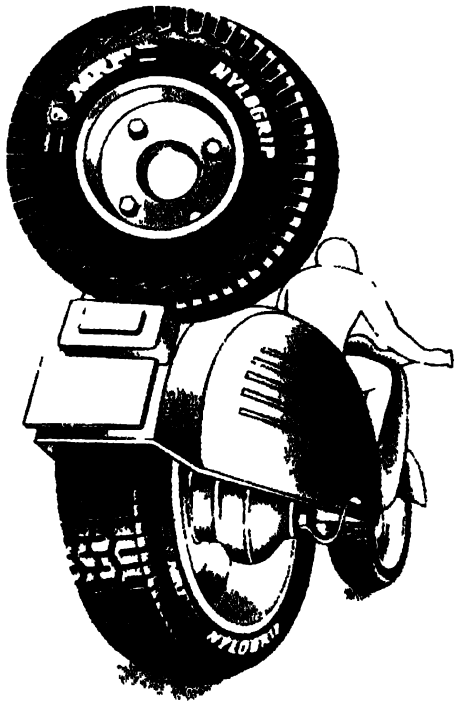
What is your idea of perfect happiness?
To be at peace with oneself
What is your greatest fear?
To be exiled from my country
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
My mother
What do you dislike most in others?
Manipulative behaviour
What do you dislike most in yourself?
Putting the high standards of morality and integrity — which I put on myself — on others
What is your most precious possession?
Possessions can't be precious Relationships are, and the one with my son is the most precious
What objects do you always carry?
A little piece of earth — some soil, a few seeds and beautiful symbols given as gifts by friends.
What makes you most depressed?
The narrowness and petty-mindedness of people who can afford to be more generous and broadminded in their positions.
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
My double chin.
What is your favourite word?
Love
What is your favourite journey?
Within myself
What is your favourite dream?
Of having lived a life in which I did the best I could do for others
What is your nightmare?
To lose my fearlessness
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
The work I do
What is your source of sustenance?
The fact that I have extremely few needs for myself
On what occasions do you lie?
I don't
What is your greatest regret?
None

What is your most precious possession?

Possessions can't be precious. Relationships are, and the one with my son is the most precious



What objects do you always carry?

A little piece of earth — some soil, a few seeds and beautiful symbols given as gifts by friends

What has been your happiest moment?
When I was delivering my son
What brings tears to your eyes?
Extreme joy, an extremely beautiful spring or a tree, the generosity of the poor, like an old woman giving me a glass of water when water is scarce in her home.
How do you relax?
I relax in my work.
What do you envy most in others?
No, I don't feel envy.
How would you like to be remembered?
Not by my public profile, but by those closest to me in terms of what I meant to them.
How would you like to die?
With a sense of satisfaction that I have done all I could for the values I stand for.

AT THE CROSSROADS

Caught between the Church which has had a long sheltering presence, and the RSS, desiring to oust all missionary influence, the tribals of Chhotanagpur are facing an identity crisis and fast losing all links with their heritage. Sona Thakur visited the tribal belt

Photographs by Jagdish Yadav

SCENE IN THE DEEPEST DEPTHS OF THE SAL FORESTS, MILes into the emerald nowhere, an elegant post-modern structure in red brick and black glass looms into vision, the cross atop its spire blazing in the failing light. The sound of the Paternoster floats out on the evening air.

Scene: Miles away, deep in yet another corner of the forest-land is a less ostentatious building. The crude painting of a bow-wielding Ram on the wall proclaims its religious affiliation. The sounds of a school-lesson carry the Ramayana slokas being taught by rote.

Both scenes are replayed and replicated time and again all across the tribal belt of Chhotanagpur. Both buildings seem equally alien to the land, carrying in their alienness the incriminating fingerprints of a crime.

This, then, is the story of that crime; a theft so simple and yet so complete that it pillaged a people's entire culture.

For centuries, the tribals of the Chhotanagpur have lived their lives bound to the ancient rhythms of the red earth and the pouring skies. For centuries, the timbre of their lives changed as little as the texture of the land, which continues to bear the scars of the implosion which hurled it from the sun.

The men and women who walk this land belong to tribes such as the Munda, the Oraon, the Ho, the Birhor and the Asura. They have always lived close to the land, working its soil and worshipping its trees. Their world was telescoped into the little forest clearing of their village, stretching once a week to the bigger village next-door where the haat was held.

Identity in such a milieu was secure. Religion, culture, economy and the social structure, the various protective layers that cocoon the precious kernel of a people's identity, were all fixed to their ancient moorings The treasure trove was intact

But, over the last half-century, each of the tissue layers has been stripped away systematically A succession of alien influences have swarmed this area, overrunning its virgin territory and eroding its valuable traditions

Ironically, the two forces that have most vampirised this area are the propagators of two religions — the Church — in its various avatars as Lutheran, Anglican and Roman Catholic — and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh-led Hindutva brigade

"The Church and the RSS have subsumed us Between them, they will squeeze us out of existence," says Dr Birsa Oraon, a state veterinary department employee who has set up a string of Sarna Samitis to prod the tribals into action

His fears seem well-founded If sociological signposts are to be believed, the vibrancy of the tribals' indigenous identity is fast fading The nature worship cult of the tribals or the Sarna Dharam could well be a religion of the past, with a bare 20 07 per cent of the area's tribals swearing by it in the 1981 census The traditional tribal fetes and festivals go by with not even a tourism-driven celebration to mark them Film songs are fast replacing the lilting folk songs in the collective memory as the oral tradition of the tribals breaks down And as tribal children move into the mainstream of education, fewer of them learn the various tribal tongues

A chance encounter on the road between Khunti and Torpa in Ranchi district encapsulates the tribals' withering roots The sky is gathering its darkest clouds and rumbling its anger As the world darkens swiftly, a small group emerges from the forest by the side of the highway The cool breeze carries the lilting notes of their song as they dance their way to the macadamed strip where they spend a joyous half-hour in an impromptu dance performance

For centuries, the tribals of the Chhotanagpur have lived their lives bound to the ancient rhythms of the red earth and the pouring skies. For centuries, the timbre of their lives changed as little as the texture of the land, which continues to bear the scars of the implosion which hurled it from the sun

It could well have been a scene from a Films' Division documentary or a Republic Day parade, but in actuality it was the ritualised leave-taking ceremony of the Oraon people These men and women from Churki village had come to the highway to see off visitors from a faraway village and were saying goodbye the only way they have known for centuries

Yet, even as the hosts and the guests matched each other in uninhibited leave-taking, one person sat apart

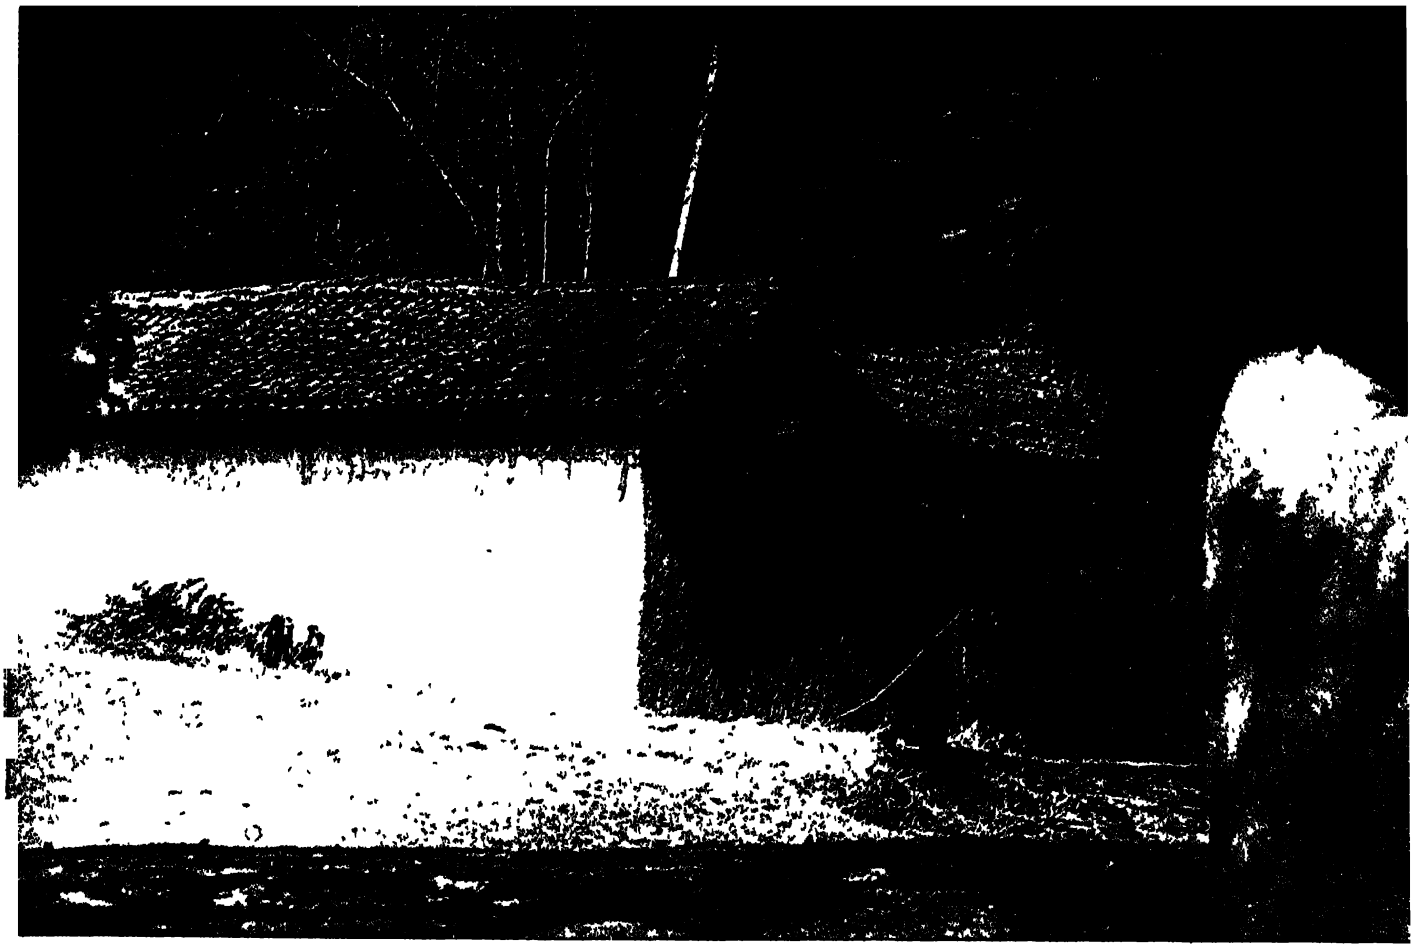
Nineteen-year-old Lawrence Vengra looked distinctly uncomfortable "Him?" scoffed the nagara-player dropping his beat for a second, "he's a Mission child, he doesn't know our songs"

Lawrence could be today's tribal everyman Having been born and brought up in the shadow of the Mission — localese for the collective presence of the Church – he has lost even those vestigial links with his tribal heritage that the generation before him had retained fitfully So, while the rest of the group there that evening — all Christians but all older — sang the songs of their ancestors, Lawrence sat apart and silent

Lawrence's silence is the quiet of a people robbed of its traditional forms of self-expression And the tribals here are only just awakening to the theft Alarmed, they are now trying desperately to once again spin, strand by gossamer strand, that fabric of their traditional identity But, these efforts are few and enfeebled

The Jharkhand movement demanding that tribals be allowed to decide tribal destiny, the Koel Karo agitationists refusing to sever their links with their land, scattered Sarna Samitis trying to resurrect the tribal religion or the Sarna Dharam, and various memoranda to the government flaying the erosion of tribal culture These instances of protest and propaganda might be sporadic, but they are indicators of a frightening identity crisis

How did it come about that the collective identity of a people was so jeopardised? The answer has long roots



"The tribal is too gullible, too innocent and has paid for his naivete by putting his identity on the endangered species' list," says Dr P C Oraon of Ranchi's Tribal Welfare and Research Institute

Beginning with Emperor Shah Alam's firman of 1765 that allowed the East India Company to open up this region, the Chhotanagpur area has been breached by a succession of outsiders Drawn by the immeasurable wealth hidden in the belly of this land, these "diku" — Mundari for "outsiders" — have plundered not so much the natural wealth of the region as its cultural heritage

Seated in his office at the St Xavier's Institute, also in Ranchi, the vice-chairman of the Bihar Minority Commission, Father Bem Ekka, delves into history to trace the beginning of the tribals' alienation from their roots "In my mind, the exact point of departure was the Permanent Settlement of 1793 which not only imposed non-tribals as zamindars but also opened up the way for the missionaries to spread their influence" he says

For a century after they arrived late in the 18th century, the missionaries honed a fine strategy of evangelism with enticement They set up schools and dispensaries, doled out salves for the mind, the body and the soul and

added to the soldiery of Christ

And in a land that was a stranger to all modern facilities, there were many takers for the this-worldly add-ons if not for just the other-worldly philosophy The district gazetteer of Ranchi district records in 1895 that over the previous four years some 40,000 tribals had joined the Church

In fact even today, the allure of the Church is immense Suleiman Topno of Khunti has looked for work as far afield as Patna and failed to find any He has decided on a brighter destiny for his six-year-old nephew "Isko to hum Brother bhejenge Bhookha to nahin marega (I'll make him a priest At least he won't die), ' he says

But this union with the Church was by no means painless Written without words into the holy contract of conversion was the promise that the tribal who took to Christianity would have to tear himself asunder from his roots "I'm a priest but I admit that the Church equated Christianity and salvation with the European way of life and the message undoubtedly was that if you want our help, our facilities, give up your way of living," says Father Ekka ruefully

So, prompted by the Church, the Christian tribals deliberately induced mass amnesia in themselves — traditional rites and rituals were all discarded as pagan, the identification marks of tribal identity, from the language to the tribal top-knot were all discouraged The Christian tribal continued to lug this alien cultural baggage far into the 20th century "Why, I myself have studied Latin in the mission schools but not my own language," says Father Ekka, who is an Oraon from Palkot in Gumla district

With the triumphal passing of Independence came another era of governmental neglect for this region Although it plumbed the depths of the land and pillaged the wealth buried there, the government of Independent India gave the people little in return From hospitals to railways to schools, all milestones of modernism here languished even as the region fuelled the nation's development

Instead, it was the Church that moved in and assumed charge of the public spaces, its influence spreading beyond just those who had converted to its ways It catapulted the region's economy from the barter stage to the modern capitalistic one, it controlled the area's education and medicare network, it dictated voting patterns from the pulpit, and it decreed social mores and manners

As the Church pressed its imprint onto the very face of the land, the number of people in its fold grew Symbols and statistics both told a tale of galloping conversions to Christianity In 1961, 17 34 per cent of Scheduled Tribes in Bihar were Christians By 1981, this figure jumped to 20 07 per cent

Gradually the Mission became omnipresent Even today, the most inaccessible qasba town is serviced by its own church and the smaller villages have outdoor stone altars for the itinerant priests The parishes abound with improbable names like Hannah, Ernestine and Celestine and Tobias, Benedict and Zachariah "Jai Isu" has become the standard greeting in the deepest forest village And, for a clincher, the Ranchi telephone directory has 35 organisations prefixed with a "St" — bizarrely enough, there is even a St Olympus

As the streams of tribals flowing into the innumerable churches dressed in their best increased with each passing Sabbath, the high priests of Hindutva watched with growing consternation This was the Nineties and the one-point programme decreed by Nagpur was a terse command — "Grow"

Nursing visions of overrunning this tribal tract, the RSS*wallahs* set about neutralising the Church's influence Ironically, they used the Mission's

NEW HOPES, NEW HORIZONS

The cost-benefit analysis of outsider presence in Chhotanagpur is not altogether an account written in red.

If the continued presence and proliferation of the Church has debilitated the traditional tribal culture, it has also poured in much in terms of development

Although a part of a state that has become a synonym for backwardness, this slice of Bihar is surprisingly forward faring if the major socio-economic indicators are anything to go by.

had an education on their doorstep.

These parish schools were till Class VII, after which the children moved to the high school in the nearest qasba The colleges were set up in the towns. Not only did this string of schools provide an excellent infrastructure, it also created its own self-sustaining supply of teachers A graduating student was ploughed back to serve as a teacher in the parish school and so on

The outcome of this was a literacy rate that far outstripped that

Schooltime will see rows of scrubbed tribal children, immaculate in their pleated skirts and matching ribbons in their braids, heading earnestly for school Today, there is 90 per cent enrolment in the primary, both government and private, schools of the district

To add to the good news, the female literacy rate here is just as heartening at 37 per cent, again matching the all-India average. The spin-off of this has been the growing gender parity in the dis-

A patient being taken to hospital on the Ranchi-Lohardagga Road

From education to environment protection, from the wage index to women's emancipation, all indices that usually spell development are rising in Ranchi. And the Church has prompted the strides in most of these

With the Church using education as the stepping-stone to evangelism, little "Mission" schools soon mushroomed in every churchyard. And as almost every third village in the district boasted a Church, the people here of the rest of Bihar and equalled the all-India average The literacy rate for Ranchi district is 51 per cent, a phenomenal figure given that the rest of Bihar has managaed to notch up a bare 36.38 per cent.

More than the statistics, it is the appetite for education which the "Mission" has created in this region that is most creditable. Touch any point of this district — from the urban reaches around Ranchi to the furthest Munda village beyond Tamar — for evidence.

trict and the increased participation of women in the district's soci al and economic spheres

The health-care set up was established in the same pyramidical manner as the school system, with the Sacred Heart Hospital at Mandar becoming the referral hospital of the entire region. The sight of a couple of tribal men walking 35 kms with a severely ill patient borne on a charpoy gave silent testi mony to the draw of the Mission aspatals

For a century after they arrived late in the 18th century, the missionaries honed a fine strategy of evangelism with enticement. They set up schools and dispensaries, doled out salves for the mind, the body and the soul and added to the soldiery of Christ

MISSIONARY ZEAL

Tapkara is a spread of spring-green The village at the head of the gully leading down to the Karo river is the fountainhead of the agitation against the Keol-Karo hydel project. It is also a microcosm of the area, with the dynamics behind the anti-dam stir being much the same as those that caused the current identity crisis gripping the tribals

Tapkara falls in the catchment area of the local Mission headquarters at Torpa Barely 2 kms from that qasba town, it is serviced by Torpa's one Church, two schools — St Joseph's for boys and St Teresa's — and one Mahila Vikas Kendra run by the always-heard-of but seldom-seen Sister Karuna Braganza.

The people of Tapkara and other little settlements dotting the road down to the river-bank have been Christians for years now Two generations here have grown up in the sheltering shadow of the Torpa Church Their young have been taught by the missionaries, their illnesses treated by the nuns and their dying absolved by the parish priest

Today, however, the threat of being uprooted from the land of their birth has laid bare the subcutaneous layer of their own culture. Impellings that had been reduced to a faint recollection in the collective memory are now resurfacing

The government's declared intention of appropriating the surrounding area for the project re-illuminated the tribals' traditional link with the earth. More than the matter of fair compensation, the tribals' resistance to the plan is based on their fear of being severed forever from a past that is already own methodology Working overtime the last few years, the Hindutva brigade has established a string of schools, hostels, dispensaries and sundry social service organisations to wean the populace away from the Church and into the saffron spectrum

Working under the umbrella of the Banwasi Kalyan Kendra, the RSS network comprises 1,161 Ekkal Vidyalayas — one-teacher schools in the interior villages — 19 Chhatrawases — residential schools — and countless Saraswati Shishu Mandirs and Vidya Bhartis

In an attempt to Sanskritise the tribal, the syllabus in all these is unstintingly saffron Take the Ekkal Vidyalaya in Gudgudia village of Lohardagga district Twenty-year-old Balkeshwar Oraon is taking his class of 30 through their paces in a building prettified with the signs of the Swastik and the Om The children's day begins with the vandana and ends with the arti, the books Balkeshwar teaches from are published by an RSS offshoot, the Shishu Mandir Prakashan, the Ramayana is a separate subject, the charts on the walls showing the Great Men of India includes no Muslim, and the map from which geography is taught is that of the Akhand Bharat

But, Balkeshwar does more than just catch 'em young for the RSS He also has to spread the good word around the village He displays the end-of-the-year assessment form that he has to fill and return to the BKK – it has separate categories asking that the village be graded for its "Hindutva bhaav jagran" (Hindutva awakening), "Dainik shakha ki sambhavna" (desire for a daily shakha)" and "Arashtriya tatvon par rok" (the checking of anti national elements, viz the Church)

"Our effort is to ensure that the tribal children don't go to Mission schools and that, after staying with us for a couple of years, they should emerge as RSS workers," says Ajay Kumar Singh, the swaggering coordinator of the Ekkal Vidyalayas

And so, today, as the Church continues to spread its sheltering wings and as the RSS tries to out-Mission the Mission, the tribal population of the area is caught between the two pincer movements

What doubles the dangers is the supreme contempt both display for the tribal heritage and way of life If the Church decrees even dress code — the traditional sartorial symbols like tattoos for women and top-knots for men have been frowned out of existence — the RSS functionaries lose no opportunity to pour public derision on the "dhol bajana sanskriti" of the tribals

And, the RSS has come up with the ultimate swamping technique — it is perpetuating the myth that the tribals are nothing but a lost tribe of Hindus Dr Birsa Oraon sputters with indigna-

half-forgotten

Humko to utha dega, kya hamara religion ko yahan se itha sakta hai government? (The government can evict us but how will it evict our religion), asks Prem Chand Guria, who converted to Christainity some 30 years ago He has been converted and educated by the missionaries, but the pull of his forefathers' heritage is today proving too strong.

Insisting on speaking in the pidgin English that is a leftover of his "Mission" education, he spells out his peoples' indignation "No necessity electree, understand?" he enunciates carefully Humko kerasin ka dhibri chalega Par hamara devta log, hamara grandfather log jo yahan gadha hai, unko nahin chhod sakta (We can make do with kerosene lamps but we cannot forsake our gods and our ancestors who lie in this land)

Almost dancing in his agitation, he hurries across the clearing to a cluster of pointed stone slabs These mini-Stonehenges can be seen in every tribal village and are the commemorative stones the people put up to their dead ones "This is my family's hargadi (stonehenges), tell me, how can either Laloo Yadav or Narsingh Rao make me leave these?"

A woman in the crowd that has been trailing in his footsteps speaks up. "The sakhwa (sal) trees under which our ancestors made their Sarna Sthals (the tree-temples of the tribals) grow in this land, how can we leave?"

Ironically enough, the local missionaries are siding with the tribals' agitation against the project and receiving no thanks for it The July 5 protest rally in Torpa was, in fact, attended by the Mission students in uniform and local lore has it that the local parish priest's jeep was seen whizzing around the area, whipping the tribals into protest demonstrations when a delegation of government officials arrived there at the end of June

But, say cynics, their tolerant acceptance of a flock suddenly reverting to "pagan" ways stems from a motive both subtle and sinister. By siding with the tribals in this contest the locals perceive it to be a crusade for their way of life, the Church will insinuate itself further into the people's midst tion as he tells of this invitation he received from the Banwasi Kalyan Kendra to participate in a tribal rally in Gumla district "Speaker after speaker got up to stress how we tribals were "Hanuman ke saput" and so an integral part of Hinduism I was so furious I left the dais," he says still angry over the RSS bid to silently coopt his people

It is to prevent any further dilution and depletion of this sort that his Sarna Samiti is agitating for Constitutional recognition for the Sarna Dharam "Our is the only religion with no idols or priests Hence, our religion, and subsequently our culture, can be easily eroded An entry into the Constitution will protect our identity somewhat," says Dr Oraon

This bit of government action apart, the distant drum-beats of a tribal renaissance can be heard "Enlightened" tribals like the former vice chancellor of the Ranchi University, Dr R P Munda, make a production number of major tribal festivals like Sarhul and make it a point to tread the traditional dances in the street-processions A Regional Languages Department has been set up in Ranchi University to keep alive the various tri

If the Church decrees even the dress code — the traditional sartorial symbols like tattoos for women and top-knots for men have been frowned out of existence — the RSS functionaries lose no opportunity to pour public derision on the 'dhol bajana sanskriti' of the tribals

A well being sanctified according to tribal traditions in Gudgudia, Lohardagga

bal languages An enterprising soul has just captured tribal life on celluloid in a just-released a Mundari film called Preet And, in an ironic travesty of the Hindutva campaign, qasba walls in Chhotanagpur have suddenly sprouted slogans saying "Garv se kaho hum Sarna hain"

The flip side of this nascent nationalism is an animosity towards the aliens The Church by virtue of its long presence is today coming in for a dose of very unChristian feelings The anti-Mission sentiments range from the plausible — charges of land grabbing besides partiality to Christian tribals in admissions to Church-run schools and hospitals — to the implausible tale currently doing the rounds that 63 — the number remains precisely the same in every account — Christian nations met recently in the Vatican and decided to send a Church Sena to overrun Chhotanagpur

Whatever be the worth of these bazaar rumours, the very fact of their currency points to a groundswell against an alien presence that had, hitherto, been accepted as part of the lush landscape They are evidence of a people's superhuman effort to weed out the foreign forces and retrace their own roots ■

MAJOR WILKIE GOES SHOOTING

Major Wilkie and I set off into the foothills on a cold, dew-fresh February morning, while the Siwaliks were still shrouded in mist The Major, wearing an old Army bush-shirt and khaki trousers, carried his 0 12 bore shot gun I carried his walking stick, which I handed to him whenever the going was difficult Ahead of us, sometimes behind us, as the mood took him, ran the Major's gun-dog, Flash, a young spaniel who had been trained to flush out birds for the benefit of his master

The Major was in his early sixties and lived on a pension He had been a good shot in his younger days and his verandah walls were decorated with the mounted heads of gazelles, antelope, wild buffalo and snow leopard, all shot at different times and places during his long sojourn in India

Advancing years, an arthritic arm and the high cost of good whiskey, had all combined to spoil the Major's aim When inviting me to be his house guest for a week, he had promised me a partridge shoot and he wasn't one to break his promises Though I would gladly have foregone the shoot (for I hate early risings), I remembered that the Major had oiled and cleaned his gun the night before and I did not want to disappoint him

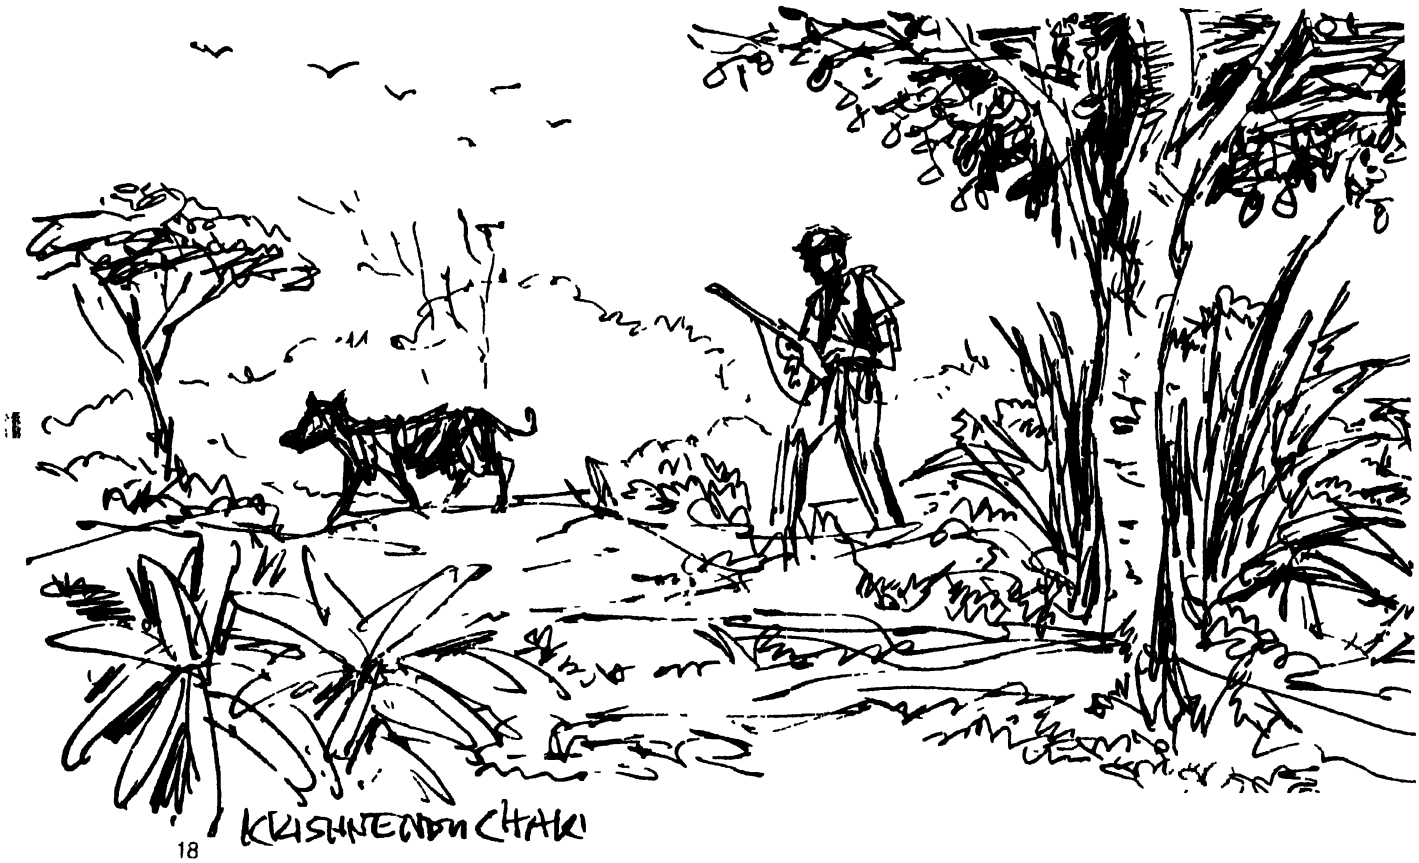
"This is the right sort of country for partridge," he said, as he exchanged his gun for his walking stick in order to surmount a steep bank

"Plenty of scrub and fields not far off That suits 'em nicely But there's not much else, I'm afraid The deer were shot out years ago"

We had not gone far when Flash raised his head and sniffed the wind

"He's scented them," said the Major "Go send them up, boy!"

Flash ran with his nose to the ground and disappeared into a thicket of lantana bushes As he did so, a covey of partridges whirred up from the bushes Major dropped his walking stick, grabbed his gun, raised it to his shoulder and blazed away



Not one of the birds fell They flew low over the bushes, swept around the contour of the hill and then settled down a furlong away

"Bad luck" I said

"Too damned far," said the Major "Out of range"

"Good boy Flash," he said, as the dog came back in high spirits, "We'll get them yet"

Forgetting his stick, Major Wilkie set off across the mustard field, calling Flash to heel whenever the dog showed signs of running too far ahead When we were well into the field, the

Flash certainly knew his job. The birds took to the air again and the Major blasted off another barrel. He missed by yards. The partridges flew swift and low over the field and settled down less than a 100 yards away. They had been shot at by the Major on previous occasions and were secure in the knowledge that he invariably missed

Major allowed the dog to run on

Flash certainly knew his job The birds took to the air again and the Major blasted off another barrel He missed by yards The partridges flew swift and low over the field and settled down less than a 100 yards away They had been shot at by the Major on previous occasions and were secure in the knowledge that he invariably missed

Flash came back, his stumpy tail gyrating with pleasure He did not expect anything wonderful from the Major but he was enjoying himself

"It's these damn cartridges," grumbled the Major, now rather red in the face "They're absolutely no good — the shot just bounces off those birds!"

"Never mind," I said, "Have another go They're not far off"

We advanced further into the mustard field, muddying our boots and trousers, while Flash went tearing through the flowering yellow mustard Up rose the birds Up went Major Wilkie's gun Off went both barrels, one after the other

To the amazement of everyone — Major Wilkie, Flash, the partridge and myself — one of the birds plummeted to the ground

"Good shot Sir!" I cried

"Go and fetch it Flash!" shouted the Major with delight And to me, "Roast partridge for supper, old boy!"

He was as pleased as if he had just shot his first partridge I could not help sharing his enthusiasm

Flash bounded forward He had plenty of experience in flushing out birds, but this was the first time, since graduating from the Sahranpur Kennel Club, that he had been called upon to retrieve one Perhaps that was why his next act was one in keeping with the character of a gun-dog He picked up the bird in his mouth and then, instead of bringing it back to us, made off with the trophy!

"Flash! Come back at once!" cried Major Wilkie

"The silly dog thinks the bird was meant for him"

"Well perhaps he deserves it," I said

"And so do I — deserve it," snapped the Major, adding in a rare moment of frankness "First partridge I've shot for years Ever since this arm started giving me trouble"

We trudged home through the fields, still faintly hoping that Flash would be waiting for us with the bird intact But we were disappointed The dog came home two hours later, looking guilty, with a few partridge feathers stuck to the sides of his mouth

"Well he certainly hasn't wasted any," I observed

The Major was too fond of his dog to think of punishing him But several minutes later, polite civilian formality gave way to some good old army frankness, and several new words were added to my vocabulary

A RELIGIOUS DISNEYLAND

Christian theologians, or historians as they prefer to call themselves nowadays, differ on many points But they are certain that Jesus was crucified in Jerusalem Over the last nearly 2000 years the city has developed its own sacred geography — where Jesus healed the sick, was arrested, condemned to death, and, as Christians believe, resurrected

Different churches have different opinions about the religious place Protestants by and large believe that the Garden Tomb on a hill outside the medieval city walls was where Jesus was buried, while Roman Catholics, Armenians, S rians, Greek Orthodox, Coptic and Ethiopian worshippers gather at the Holy Sepulchre in the old city which has been in existence since Byzantine times

Most of Israel's tourists are religious tourists, the large majority of them Christian They descend in air-conditioned busloads at one site after another clad in unpilgrim-like garb — sunhats, Tee-shirts and shorts, or knickers as they are known in India Everywhere signs request pro per dress, but somehow popular culture cannot be contained and knickers make their way into the most holy places

I joined a number of such religious tourists on the regular Friday walk by Franciscan friars from St Stephen's gate to the Holy Sepulchre down the Via Dolorosa, the road many believe Jesus took to his crucifix ion The narrow lanes were walled and floored with white Jerusalem stone, and very clean, with innumerable tourist shops, and confectioners' selling sweets made with vermicelli, soft cheese and flaky pastry

There were even giant pink jalebis Fresh figs, dates, orange and carrot juice were on sale At some points the market streets were domed and others open to the sky

I was immensely moved by the spiritual power which seemed to fill the Holy Sepulchre A stairway led to the rock which is said to mark the precise site of the crucifixation This part of the Sepulchre is in the hands of the Greek Orthodox church, hung with silver lamps mounted with glass bowls, the walls covered with paintings and mosaics which glitter

Most of Israel's tourists are religious tourists, the large majority of them Christian. They descend in air-conditioned busloads at one site after another clad in unpilgrim-like garb — sunhats, T-shirts and shorts, or knickers as they are known in India

The Franciscans stopped at each of the stages of the cross, chanted and prayed Among them was a monk from Kerala It was a struggle to stop the tourists from blocking the lane Entranced as I was by my surroundings, I was taken aback to see one of the friars attack a bystander who was in his way "You pushed me," shouted the angry young man "Yes, I'll push you," responded the man of God, picking him up by the collar and slamming him against a wall

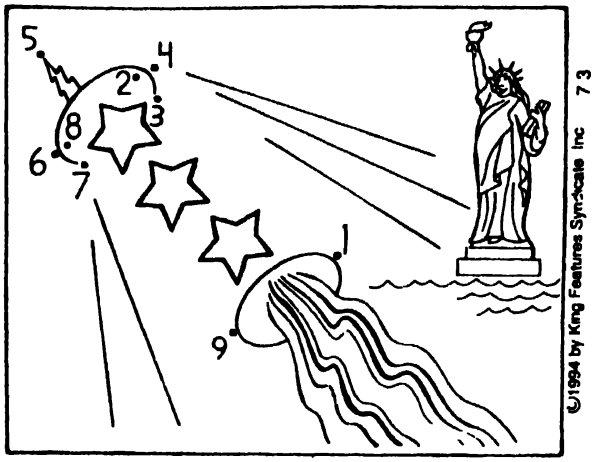
The good citizens of Jerusalem intervened and separated the two parties This behaviour did not seem consistent with a follower of St Francis, the image of non violence But then no one, not even men of God, are perfect

gold in the dim light

The tomb itself is a small building in another part of the Sepulchre It's reminiscent of a garbh griha and stands beneath the Sepulchre's immense dome You have to bend down low to enter the inner chamber of the tomb in which there is room for only three people at a time to kneel and light candles at the simple altar

Not all are impressed as I was, even Christian scholars like the Irish priest and long-time Jerusalem resident, Fr Jerome Murphy O'Connor "One expects the central shrine of Christendom to stand out in majestic isolation," he writes, "but anonymous buildings cling to it like barnacles one hopes for peace, but the ear is assailed by a cacophony of warring chants One desires holiness, only to encounter a jealous possessiveness the six groups of occupants watch one another suspiciously for any infringement of rights The frailty of humanity is nowhere more apparent than here"

The churches in Israel are indeed in trouble Local Christians, many of them Palestinians, are choosing to leave the country and head to the West if they can Congregations dwindle Proselytism is forbidden by law, and many churchmen are drawn into squabbles over the status quo — making sure that their church maintains its control over its portion of the holy sites



Stories abound of fisticuffs between sects money, laundering and smuggling by senior clerics Even if most of these are untrue, there is no doubt that the churchmen of Jerusalem are not working in a unified way to look after the interests of Christians

On a visit to the fifth century monastery and hermitage of St George in the Judean desert not far from the city, I asked one of the seven monks who remains there why there were no longer any Christian hermits "If we were hermits," he replied, "then who would give coffee to tourists?"

I was reminded of the comment by the Archbishop of Canterbury who, on a recent visit to Israel, said he was afraid the Holy Land might be reduced to a religious theme park In a way it already has been

BOATCRAFT AT BALAGARH

Kushal Gangopadhyay focuses on Balagarh, a small town on the bank of the Ganga, which is the only place in West Bengal making boats on a huge scale

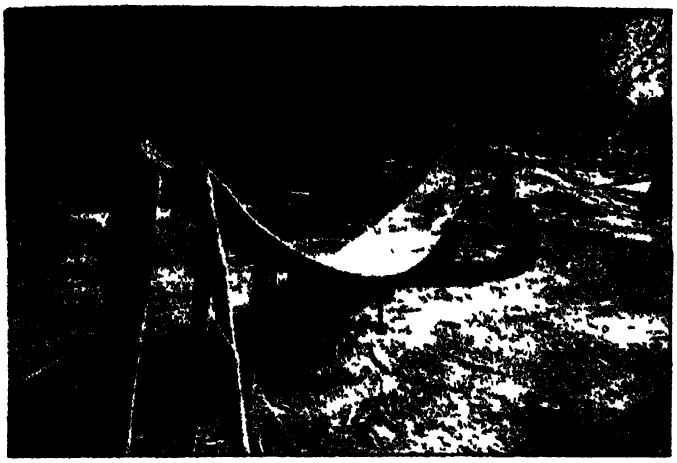
Finished boats



Tucked away in all its pristine beauty and quiet on the banks of the Ganga, in the Hooghly district, is Balagarh A small town famous for its boat-making industry, the only place in West Bengal where boats are made on such a huge scale

Local craftsmen claim the boat industry is about 400 years old Nemai Barik, owner of the only registered boat industry in the state, says that after the fall of the Adi Saptagram Fort in the 17th century, the boat builders shifted their venue to the Sripur Balagarh region

History also provides evidence in support of such claims Abul Fazal in his Ain-i-Akbari says boats and sea-faring vessels were made in Bengal Other records also state that Saista Khan, Governor of Bengal, 1664, ordered for boats from the Hooghly for the Mughal fleet

The town is dotted with workshops, 32 in all, and thousands of labourers are engaged here in building boats every year These are sold throughout West Bengal and also to neighbouring Bihar and Orissa

Boat-making here is a hereditary trade, coming down from one generation

Heat is used to curve the wood planks

Cowdung and tar mixture being applied on the joints to another without any help of modern scientific techniques

The very inception or pattan of boat-making starts with measuring and fixing the first long wood strip with four joints called sithi Wood planks of 6" to 8" width, are used, bent by heat according to the curve of the boat, and are then rivetted by special type of two-way nails, on both sides of the sithi The size of a boat is measured by the number of planks joined on each side

After putting together the basic structure, the side wood pieces, called gochh, are fitted inside the boat with the help of large nails The gaps between the wood planks are filled with cotton threads A mixture of tar and cowdung is pasted over the joints This is left to dry under the sun for a day Then the boat is submerged in the river for two days It is taken out of the water for further tarring and other trivial oddjobs till it is ready for delivery Usually one skilled labourer takes about seven days to finish a boat of about 20' long

In Balagarh normally babla wood is used for making the boats, trees that are grown nearby and are also brought from neighbouring districts

The cost of a 12' and a 20' long boat is Rs 3,000 and Rs 6,000, respectively It soars to a hefty Rs 30,000 for a 50' vessel

The daily wage of the labourers varies from Rs 12 to Rs 40 depending on their skill And this profession has its own disadvantages Like many other labour-intensive industrial units, it engages child labour Ten- to 12-year-old boys from poor families are easily available to work as apprentices They are not paid in cash, but provided with a frugal meal

Sometimes, craftsmen are hired on contract for three to four months to work in other parts of West Bengal In places like Kakdwip, Rasulpur, Sankarpur or Digha, at least one expert boatmaker from Balagarh can be found

Thanks to the growing fishing industry, Balagarh's boat-making trade is now witnessing boom time The craftsmen are busy as never before Fishing activities, like catching lobster spawns in the Sunderban region, has turned out to be a very lucrative business

Fixing the first wood strip called sithi

Last year saw a record sale of more than 4,000 boats But the boatmen are sceptical of this sudden burst of business, atypical of the fishing community, for the vicissitudes in business are related with the ebb and flow of rivers

There will be ups and downs in the business, they believe, as there will be highs and lows in the river

For the people who worship the river such philosophy and fears are only natural Yet life carries on and so does their trade, that of crafting one boat after the other But the old saying, 'The river gives and the river takes away', they can never forget

LOVE IN THE WILD

Dirty Harry Clint Eastwood drops the gun for once and turns romantic in his new film, The Bridges of Madison County, writes Rajlakshmi Bhattacharyya

"He was a graceful hard male animal who did nothing overtly to dominate, yet dominated completely He was a prairie wind you could ride like some temple virgin toward the sweet, compliant fires marking the soft curve of oblivion "

That is the sort of sensuality which runs through The Bridges of Madison County, a romantic bestseller by Robert James Waller, which Clint Eastwood brings to celluloid — donning the mantle of actor, director and producer

He plays Robert Kincaid, the camera (no, not gun) toting photographer on assignment for the National Geographic, sent to Iowa to shoot the covered bridges of Madison County

Losing his way, Kincaid meets Francesca Johnson, an Italian-born Iowa farmer's wife, whose husband is away for four days with their children

Well, if that is not enough to trigger off a passionate affair between Kincaid and Francesca, what is? The two make love a lot, then split again sacrificing love for duty

Meryl Streep (Francesca) was an unusual choice for the star of Sophie's Choice, one she would not have touched 10 years back But given her acting range that is as broad as she wants it to be; Meryl knew what she was doing

In August last year, when Eastwood rang up Streep at her Connecticut home and offered her one of the most sought-after female lead roles in years, she could not hazard a 'no'

A still from The Bridges of Madison County

In doing so, Streep had turned down a last minute offer from Robert Redford, to co-star with him in Crisis in the Hotzone which Redford relinquished soon after her refusal

And as for Clint Eastwood, it seems like a far cry from those dirty Harry days in stetson and spurs or the hardbitten city cop into which he had, for decades, been typecast

The Clint of those days would not have put up with a Robert Kincaid But the 64-year-old actor does not consider him a departure from the usual "cadre of emotionally spare rebels He is a sort of ageing hippie.. ," reveals Clint

Perhaps Clint is right, for when he uses the words 'creative' and 'independent' to describe Kincaid, he is in a way describing himself Clint has always followed his heart and makes movies, by his own admission, to suit himself which just happens to do well at the box-office

So this time round he has made up his mind to do a movie which is marked by a striking absence of crime, guts and gore

"He was very raw ," says Streep, who thinks "he's just reached a point in his life where he doesn't give a damn" At least, for once, Clint, whose profile seems hacked out of granite, enjoys losing control in the old-fashioned story of a man "desperately in love"

He is sick of uttering those smart one-liners and wiping out tons of people which, as he religiously put it in Rolling Stone, is something "for the new guys on the scene"

But it is not just Clint Eastwood who has something of the fictional Kincaid in him Author Robert James Waller seems to have created Kincaid in his own spitting image — tight jeans, white shirt, silver bracelet on right wrist, bohemian streak et al ..

Ever since the filming of The Bridges , Waller's first novel soared the best-seller lists His agents confirm they are coming up $8 5 million worldwide and $5 8 million in the US, a figure which is phenomenal

It puts Waller in league with those select band of best-selling writers who earn enough to turn their fantasies to fact

To keep the emotional fibre central to the movie, Clint has shot the film in sequence, allowing himself and Streep the space to develop their characters naturally

A nine-week shooting stint, the use of original locations and attention to the pace of the novel hold the promise of a different kind of story

The metamorphosis which had begun with Unforgiven for which Clint won an Oscar, seems to have come full circle with The Bridges So no longer is he the dirty, poncho-wearing 'Man With No Name' but the romantic lead in a story of true passion. ■

After the Social Dreaming Conference

I seem to have been in the Dreams of so many
Just as they were in mine

Dreams abound not only in limbo
But also float on the crests of the Crashing surf,
Lightly hover over the shimmering leaves
Of the giant tamarinds
When a mild breeze springs up
On some hot summer afternoon
They also dance among the flaming red
Of the gulmohur when spring rings
The bell for the last cool drink

Dreams in fact are on perpetual
Search for dreamers,
Like thoughts vibrate in search of thinkers.

They are sometimes like Pirandelli's characters in search
Of an author,
At other times they are Like lost lovers in search of soul mates

A dialogue with any dream
Is like learning a bit of What galaxies are all about

What is your idea of perfect happiness?

Contentment and satisfaction. One cannot be happy if one feels that one has a long way to go.

What is your greatest fear?

Eek! Cockroaches. I hate them and despise them to no extent.

Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?

I am not influenced by anybody. Nobody is my influence or my idol. I work on my own.

What do you dislike most in others?

Hypocrisy. I also hate people telling lies. I don't bother about those who backbite, but I hate liars.

What do you dislike most in yourself?

My impatience I am also irritated by trivial matters. I make fun of people, but I fail to realise when I have exceeded my limits

What is your most precious possession?

My books. The Mills & Boon novels. I can read them 24 hours a day. Even during my exams, I used to read in the toilet sitting on the potty.

What objects do you always carry?

My Mills & Boon books again.

What makes you most depressed?

The backbiting and amount of lying that goes on in this world.

What do you dislike most on your appearance?

My paunch. Though I resolve many a time to get rid of it. I am not able to do it as I am very lazy.

What is your favourite word?

Oh shit! Though I try to stop it, it always comes through.

What is your favourite journey?

The steps up my building, because I can go home and sleep.

What is your favourite dream?

That I am freaking out in the arms of my Mills & Boon lover.

What is your nightmare?

Cockroaches. Sometimes I dream that I am in a room all alone and I wake up to find cockroaches all over me.

What or who is the greatest love of your life?

My books. I read any book which I can lay my hands on and feel that it is interesting. But romance is the foreword.

What is your source of sustenance?

If you are not getting bored, my books are again my source of sustenance I read books and think on those lines too.

On what occasions do you lie?

I do not lie. My upbringing has been such that I do not have to lie at all. I used to get thrashed whenever I used to lie as a child. So I have stopped lying from childhood

What do you dislike most on your appearance?

My paunch. Though I resolve many a time to get rid of it. I am not able to do it as I am very lazy

What is your greatest regret?

Nothing. I do not like to cry over spilt milk. Whatever I have done is totally my decision. Yes but I regret having signed Karan Arjun.

What has been your happiest moment?

My whole life has been very happy till date. I have enjoyed every moment of it.

What brings tears to your eyes?

When someone close to me lies and I know it, I feel like crying.

How do you relax?

Sleeping. I love to sleep all day. When I am not sleeping, I am reading.

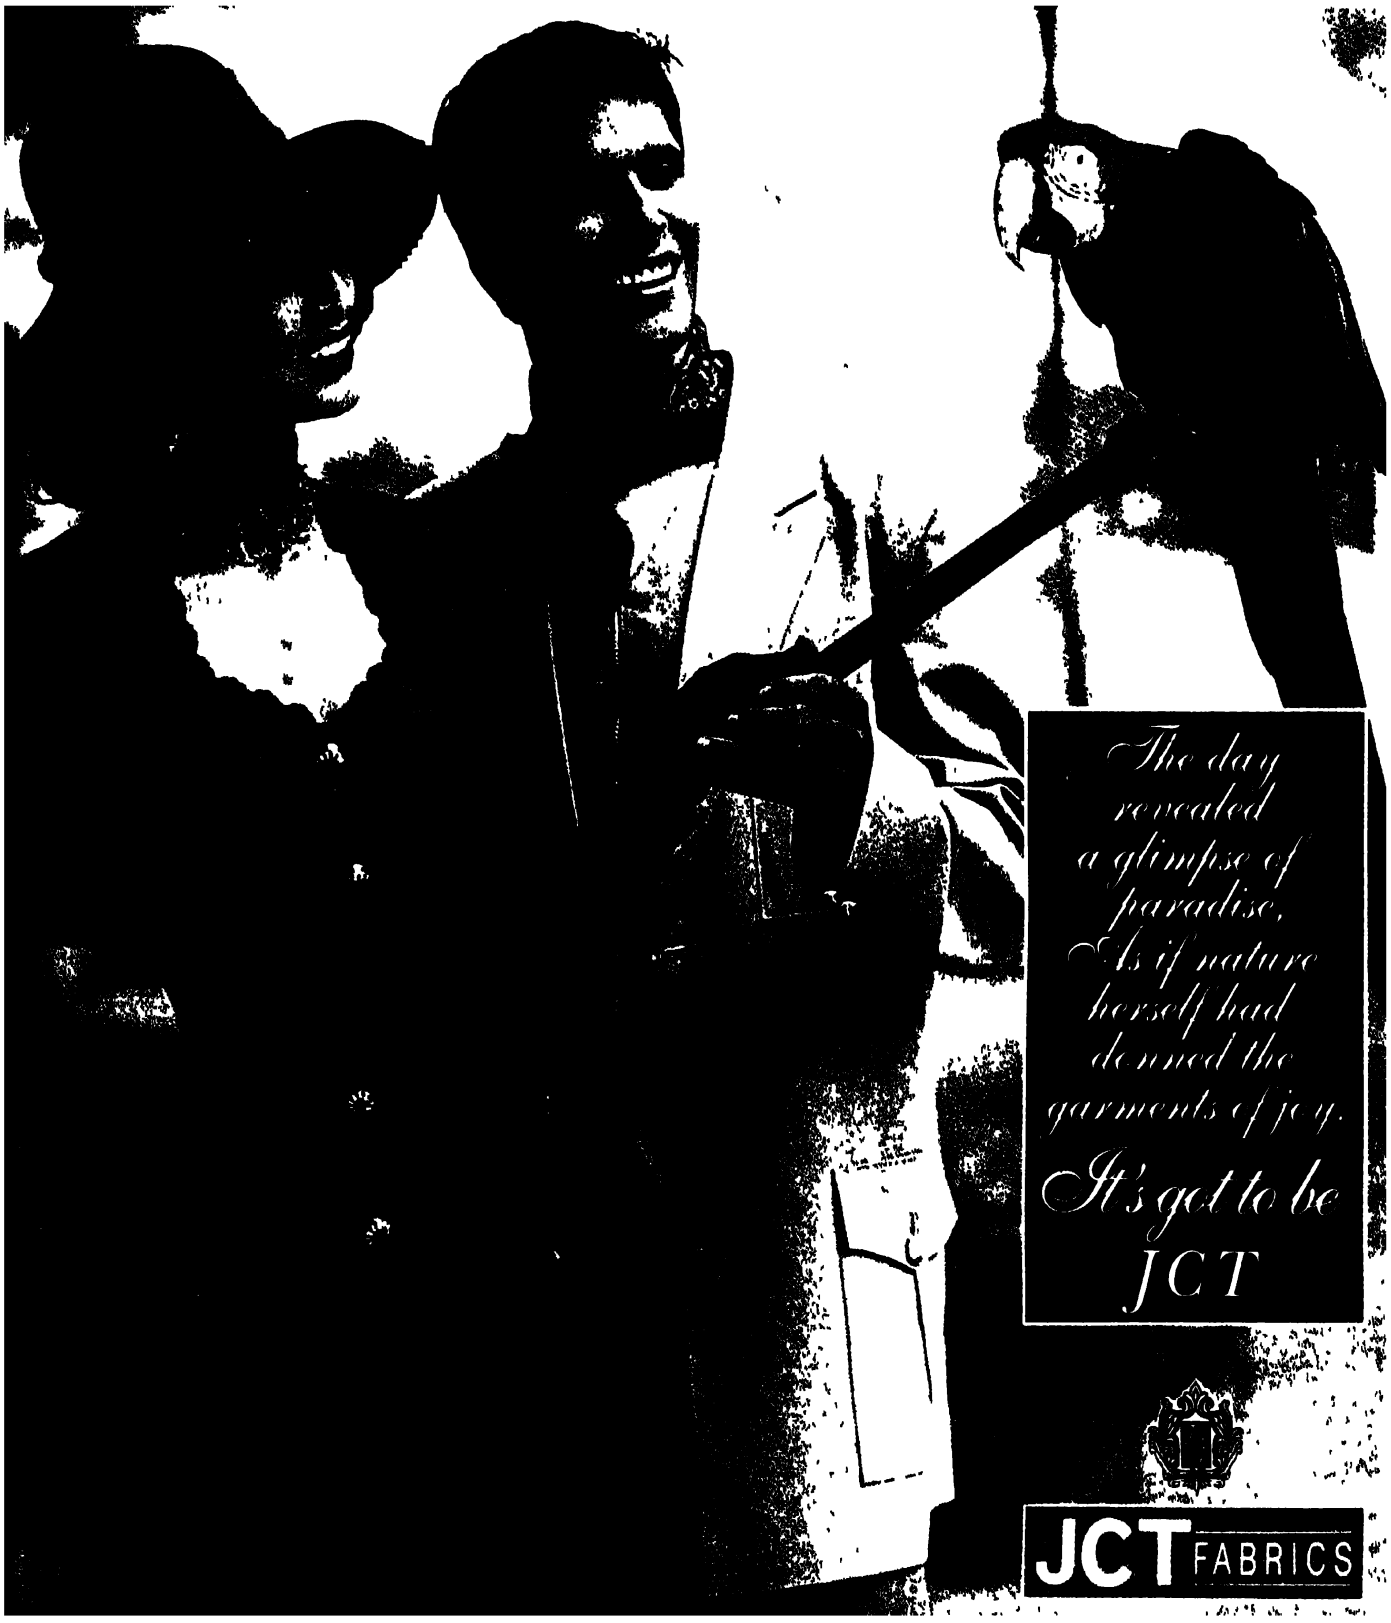
What do you envy most in others?

Their capability of keeping their mouths shut at the right time.

How would you like to be remembered?

As a very nice human being.

How would you like to die?



I want to die in my sleep. I do not want to experience any kind of pain while dying.

POST MORTEM

Lay Off!

■ Please refrain from publishing cover stories on Bollywood scandals ('Crying Wolf', July 16).

These mirch masala items are fit for the film glossies, but not the pages of the Magazine.

Can there be any truth in the accusations that are being traded between Anu Malik and Alisha Chinai? Where is the proof and who will vouch for it?

There was a time when music formed the mainstay of films and stalwarts like S.D Burman and Rai Chand Boral were revered.

Look at the transformation in Bollywood now. One's claim to stardom rests not on his/her creativity or calibre, but ability to stir up a sizzling scandal.

Partha Pratim Modak,
Howrah

■ I feel sad to say that the Magazine is rapidly turning into a gossip glossy. Are you so bankrupt of ideas that you have to focus on Bollywood scandals?

I am also rather surprised at your step-motherly attitude towards the local film industry. You never feature a Bengali star in First Person.

After her Best Actress award for Unishe April, Debasree Roy deserved a place in the First Person page.

Kajal Chatterjee,
Dhanbad

We have always tried. See page 30. — Editor.

Alisha Chinai: A different tune

■ Such a small scandal breaking in tinsel town, where such things are common enough, need not have been highlighted in the Magazine.

Vinay Asawa,
Calcutta

■ The cover story almost wrecked my nerves. Truth can really be more shocking than fiction.

I could not dare to go through Anwar Sagar's lyrics. With tears in my eyes I could only remember Sahir Ludhianvi's memorable lines.

Kabhi khud pe kabhi haalaat pe rona aaya,
Baat nikli to har baat pe rona aaya

B P. Berry,
Calcutta

■ I was taken aback that the Magazine chose to start its cover story with the lyrics· Sexy, sexy, sexy, mujhe log bolen ..

Please don't publish such stories in future.

Pinaki Roy,
Balurghat (W B)

■ No one was surprised by the Chinai-Malik sex scandal In filmland, the couch is still the best path for instant stardom Didn't Pooja Bhatt say sometime back that there were no virgins in the industry?

As in any other industry, Bollywood being a male dominated one, female aspirants often resort to the oldest means to earn name, fame and money

Indu Bhushan Bose,
Jamshedpur

■ Why should sex scandals bother the filmgoers? We care for a few hours of unalloyed fun and entertainment. Who is entangled with whom should be our least concern

For what is Demi Moore being paid $5 million? Obviously to strip and tease Cinegoers will see the film and forget it.

THERE ARE some couples in India who are childless by choice and have no intention to reverse their decision Their decision is made on grounds more individualistic than it appears to others. We spoke to couples in various cities to get their point of view.

IT'S OUR LIFE

If couples now do decide to be childless by choice, they are still a little wary to come out of the closet, as it were. The Magazine searched out some couples who had made a firm choice, who were not medically unfit, who were not too green in age or married years to reverse their decisions shortly. And who could be encouraged to tell us why

WHENEVER THEY STEPPED OUT OF THEIR HOUSE AND WERE spotted by an irrepressibly curious neighbour, the polite conversation that followed would lead to the inevitable question: "Why don't you still have children?"

Their answer would be clipped and simple: "Because we feel this world is not a place fit enough to bring up a child in."

For the bewildered neighbour, that was no answer. But for the young Bengali artist couple, it came out of a conviction born out of their experience and perception of life, a factor which dictated many of their decisions.

And among these was the hard choice that they had taken: of remaining childless

The artist duo's reasoning may have been unique, but they are among the many young couples who have taken similar decisions, though on different grounds.

Over the years, there has been a discernible growth in the tribe of married couples for whom a child is not necessarily the logical conclusion to marriage. They lead happy, productive lives, with no children, and no regrets.

In a sense, they are the children of modern times. Some of them are high achievers, careening at a breakneck pace through the rat race. And some of them are the products of a designer world, their lifestyle representing the acme of a consumerist society — trendy clothes, glitzy cars that give a showroom-display look and a surfeit of the latest electronic gizmos.

Their day may not begin with the changing of diapers, running around with milk bottles or racing against time to put unwilling toddlers onto the school bus. But yes, rush they do, at a frenetic pace, to their demanding jobs through the day and to hectic socialising every evening — again by choice.

Ask them why they have decided against having children and they will give you the most intelligent, convincing answers that would demolish age-old theories on procreation and parenthood.

Self-centred beings?

"What about parents who have children only to pass on their family name, to revitalise their crumbling marriage, to look after them in old age and perform their last rites when they cop it, or just because they are supposed to have them

just as any other couple you see?" they counter

Defying nature's law of procreation? "With the teeming millions around you, see where the adherence to this 'natural instinct' is leading us to Surely you don't believe that women are 'complete' only when they have babies?" they retort

There are some who admit that they are not willing to make the sacrifices that parenthood demands "We see how miserable our friends who have kids are — trying to cope with the endless demands of child-rearing" There are still others who simply say that they need space for themsleves to grow as individuals and so have no place for children in their lives

Psychoanalysts, however, tell you that these couples, also categorised as the DINK (Double Income No Kids) couples, are more often people who are not able to cope with the pressures of modern living "These are high-need individuals whose lives are geared towards achievement — material or mental — who feel that there is no need to complicate their lives further by having a child," says Aruna Broota, a clinical psychologist and reader in the Delhi University

"It also reflects a definite influence of Western values in our milieu," she feels Most of these couples give priority to their needs as individuals So it is 'me' or 'I' as in the West as against 'us' or 'we' in our societal tradition, that takes precedence and impels them to curb this natural instinct

More important the decision to remain childless by choice lies more with the woman for whom it is often a revolt against tradition which gives her a pre-determined role — that of staying at home, excelling in cooking and other house work and opting for a career only if the need arose

"So those among them who are in a position to make a choice by virtue of their education and secure jobs, refuse to fall into the emotional trap of motherhood," says Dr Broota "One of my clients told me she did not want to have children because she was a heavy smoker and was not willing to give it up to have a child"

Often, it is also a revolt by individuals who may have in their childhood been curbed by their parents from chalking out the course of their own lives, from asserting their own identity, and finding their own place in society "So in that sense, it is a sensible revolt," says Broota

Dr Veena Das, professor of sociology, Delhi University, says it is a decision obviously being taken by women who are in a position, by virtue of their economic status, to make such a choice "There was a time when women's careers were supposed to follow their husbands' But as women excelled and became equals in terms of education and in the work place, the pressures mounted for a working couple and translated into pressures at home and the choice of being childless," she says

Besides, work institutions that have no flexibility and work in the strict 10 am to 5 pm regime, compel couples to make what is often a very hard choice "If a working woman with no support-system at home, was allowed to take her career seriously without living with the constant guilt of abandoning her child to a maid all day, such a choice would become unnecessary," Das feels

The total absence of this thing called 'maternal instinct' coupled with the pressures of surviving in a city like Bombay are the most important factors

The first factor, perhaps, is crucial enough to override the second In most cases the decisions were primarily taken by the women and the men fell in line But almost all couples belong to a very elite stratum of society where parents are pretty 'enlightened'.

A significant difference from, say, American societal pressure is the Indian societal pressure Couples in the US are known to have gone through a harrowing time because they had taken a decision, made a choice in a pro-choice era, NOT to have a child New Yorker magazine had carried a cover story on a couple who had to actually pretend that one of them was medically unfit to have a child On the other hand, in India, the predominant pressure is to have a child as soon as possible least one of the two is presumed to be medically unfit! If a choice is proved, then maybe, it is acceptable even if the decision may be accepted with a raised eyebrow or disapproving shake of the head But such Indian couples, it seems, are caught in a cleft either way, neighbours, friends and family look askance

But each couple that dared to speak out, many reluctantly, had its own, rather unique, reasons to have made a choice And to each his own

'Having a child, working and stashing savings in a bank, driving to India Gate...is not my idea of life'

Aapke bachche nahin hain Isi liye aap ke ghar mein itni billian hain (You don't have children That is why there are so many cats in your house) This is the sort of comment Bijoy and Sudha Palit often have to hear from their neighbours

They admit the refrain does reflect their decision to remain childless by choice "Cats, unlike dogs, are less demanding emotionally and more independent They just eat, curl up, yawn and sleep and when you get back home, seem to say, 'So you are back, now give us food' Dogs, like children, would sulk and sulk if they did not get their bit of affection besides food," says Sudha

Sudha, a trade representative with the New Zealand Embassy and Bijoy, sales manager for the Bangladesh Airline, Biman, are into their fifth year of marriage and say they are too immersed in their careers to want, and to be able to properly look after, a child "I cannot be a parent who would dump the child with a maid all day long and go to work," says Bijoy

But more than that, the two hold that not having a child is a choice guided by the need to have space to grow The two married late because they were both immersed in their work — Sudha was doing music at the Sangeet Research Academy in Calcutta and Bijoy was working his way up in the hotel industry

As they switched jobs after marriage and moved to Delhi, their desire to grow as individuals strengthened with Sudha, 39, joining an MBA course and Bijoy, 42, taking up a new line Today, when they are not at work, the two are busy with their hobbies Sudha looks after her cats and listens to music at home and Bijoy enjoys cooking and meeting friends

"Our lives are so fulfilling that we just do not feel the need for a child," says Sudha, who admits that of the two, she is the one who has been more emphatic about not having one "I am a home bird I would rather unwind myself at home cleaning up corners or pottering around No kids running around, no changing nappies and diapers and rushing to creches and yelling at the spouse over the brats, for me," says she

There is, seemingly, no peer pressure either Bijoy, who otherwise loves children, says they don't have to keep up with the Joneses "Getting married, having a child, working and stashing savings in a bank, driving to India Gate and having food and playing shatranj is not my idea of life," says he

The two point out that there has been no parental pressure either While Bijoy's parents are no more, Sudha's have been understanding and non-interfering "If I were in a traditional set-up living as a housewife in a joint family, I might have succumbed to pressures and gone in for a child," Sudha admits

Anyhow, tired of convincing and explaining why they do not have children to all those who make it their prime concern to probe the issue, Bijoy says they have finally found the simple and easy way out "Earlier when we would tell them the real reason, people would look at us as if we were conky Now we simply say we are trying earnestly, but just can't and they are all sympathy and concern!" says he

'Most may get a kick out of motherhood, but I do not'

She is a filmmaker working for a leading television company and he is the chief photographer in a leading ad agency in New Delhi The two have just stepped into their thirties and with five years of marriage behind them, feel that there is still too much to be done in life

There is the urge to do still better professionally There is more of travelling and photography, a passion which the two share, to be done and more and more films, another common interest, to be watched But kids? No, never!

Why not? "Simply because we don't feel the need for a child," say Saloni and Rohit Chawla "We don't want to have kids just because we are expected to do so — like everyone else who falls in love, gets married, has a child and 'settles' down A child is not something you have because you are supposed to, but only if and because you want to," asserts Saloni

The two admit that they have never really sat down to discuss the issue "The pace of our life has been such – we have to travel three to four months a year and have odd working hours that we have never really taken out time to talk about it," says Rohit What is understood, they add, is the fact that parenthood is definitely not on the cards

"It is like one person who likes coffee because he gets a kick out of it while another does not So the same way, most may get a kick out of motherhood, but I do not," Saloni stresses

The two, however, point out that it is not their racy lifestylethat has prompted them to remain childless And Saloni seeks to stress that she, for one, does not feel 'empty' or 'incomplete'

"That is because I am a complete individual and lead my life to the fullest"

Nor does Saloni think that theirs is a self-centered attitude. On the contrary, she maintains, parents who try to realise their own dreams and re-live their childhood through their children are selfish. "They force their children to achieve what they themselves could not," reasons Saloni.

Further, she adds, the desire to possess and be the sole claimant of another human life is also a form of ego "But that is not to say that people need not have children All that I have to say is please procreate, have babies, feed them, clothe them and look after them in every way — and I shall watch!"

Rohit, who is just 30 and claims is already planning retirement at 35, says he loves kids and can be great with them as long as they are somebody else's! And, tongue firmly in cheek, he describes those who have children as "cattle class"

Neither believes that a child is a bond that keeps a marriage going. Rohit says he and Saloni have a strong bond by way of their common interests and their confidence in each other and would not need a child to provide that Saloni, echoing the view, adds that if a relationship is not working out, it would not work out in any case, kids or no kids

But the point they together make is that over and above their personal choice, they feel the world is populated enough and doesn't need another child — certainly not theirs!

'I would have constantly lived with the guilt of not paying enough attention to my child'

Being a noted dancer, the choice to remain childless was guided by the concern for a career and the need to maintain an hour-glass figure That would be the normal assessment

But for the leading Kuchipudi and Bharata Natyam exponent, Swapna Sundari, and her low profile IAS husband, Anshu Prakash (he declined to speak), that was certainly not the reason why they decided to opt out of parenthood

"In my family, I am the one who is supposed to have strong maternal instincts If the child had happened, I would have been most happy," says the danseuse, who at one time had also sworn to stay single (Eight years ago, she married Anshu whom she met during one of her dance performances)

"Initially, I did try to withhold it (having a child) for a few years But then I found that a lot of problems had come up which would have meant that to have a child, I would have had to go through some operations and take three or four years of bed rest," she explains

While the difficulties were more from her side, they both decided against going in for such a traumatic and demanding childbirth "For us it was a choice of a different kind," she says

She also admits that being in the prime of her life, she was so entrenched in her deeply satisfying career that bearing a child would have drained

too much out of her physically and psychologically

"But we are not unhappy because we do not have a child," she adds She believes that this is primarily so because of the nature of their work which draws a lot out of them and leaves them with little time to miss the "crawling, creeping, cuddly creatures" around the house

Besides Kuchipudi and Bharata Natyam, Swapna Sundari is also into research, video documentation, writing and teaching and singing (devotional songs) Her husband, on the other hand, has his work with the Delhi Administration which keeps him out of the home for 10 to 12 hours a day

Then, there is the socialising and a good amount of travelling thrown in which leaves them with little time for themselves, too

"The way I see it, if I had a child, I would not have been able to do all these things And if I had done so still, I would have constantly lived with the guilt of not paying enough attention to my child," she says "I admire women who have given up their careers to look after their children and even housewives who devote all their life to their children"

When she was single, Swapna Sundari was quite hung up on adopting a child "But once I got involved with so much work, I shed the idea as I can't think of leaving the child in someone else's care all day"

Most of her maternal instincts get an outlet through her little nephew, Chico, who spends most his time after school and weekends and holidays with her

'Kids today are not having any fun. Everyone is fighting for space'

Keya Sarkar and Raghavan Putran set out on their life together in Calcutta, nurturing no revolutionary ideas about parenthood

Like most new couples, they saw it as something that would come in good time Then came the career move to Bombay, the city with its dehumanising pace of life

Today, Keya is determined not to have a child For her, the decision came after months of soul-searching Observing neurotic parents racing around town, trying to raise model children while giving their best to their jobs, her inference was unshakeable She could not — and would not — cope with the demands of motherhood

"If I was in Calcutta I may have fallen into motherhood, but this city made me think," says Keya, who as vice-president at Kotak Mahindra, is your typical dedicated, 8 30 am-9 pm workaholic executive

"How desperate was I for a child to go through all this? I would see colleagues anxiously ring up children at home to see if they were all right If I had a child who had a fall it would take me an hour and a half to reach home Can I take the tension?"

The answer to all this, Keya found, was a resounding no And to really settle the issue, there was the fact that she did not really harbour any strong maternal instincts "It does not come to me naturally to kiss or cuddle kids, so it was not such a big sacrifice really There should be some joy in motherhood," says Keya

The decision to remain childless was largely Keya's, and though Raghavan does empathise with her he does not hold any strong views on the subject "It's cool by me both ways I have no compulsion to have a child," says Ragahvan who works with the National Stock Exchange "It is not an issue with me"

Raghavan agrees wholeheartedly with Keya's theory about the anxiety-ridden child rearing that most modern parents do "Look at working parents and the guilt they suffer," he says "They are hard pressed for time so they either neglect home or office — overdo it at one end But it is a question of organising life with support from both sides of the family"

Keya also traces her decision as a reaction to the idyllic, fun-filled childhood she had Then the entire family had devoted time to keeping the children happy and secure "There was a retinue of servants looking after us and lots of love and care from relatives all around Kids today are not having any fun Everyone is fighting for space and every day is a struggle," she reflects

Keya recalls that except for asking her to be sure about her decision and gently telling her that she might regret it later, her parents did not make any effort to emotionally armtwist her

"A lot is made about societal pressure, but I firmly explained my logic to anyone who asked I was not ostracised or anything," she says "Some said I was being selfish But selfish to whom? To an unborn child?"

'You have to have some responsibility to the earth. I don't understand how educated people can...go ahead and have one, two, three children'

Anita Datta had a glorious, pampered childhood in Calcutta A maid each to look after the children at home, a working mother who made it a point to be available and hordes of adoring relatives providing a cosy emotional back-up

Marriage followed with Anand, a senior executive in a leading ad firm The duo moved to Bombay with no firm ideas about parenthood But here is where the story took on an individual colour. For, Anita quit her job at an ad agency to do what she really loves to do — looking after stray animals

Though she was not caught in an energy-draining profession, the duo was determined to remain childless.

"All the routine reasons for which couples go in for children don't apply in our case," explains Anand For Anita, the animal instinct to have a child is a strange sensation She adds: "I don't have this great urge to mother a child And all others factors outweigh the need for a child"

The kind of family backgrounds to which the two belong ensured that there was no emotional nagging. She comes from a progressive Brahmo family and her decision was respected "My mother did nag a bit, but that was it," Anita recalls

Anand loves children, but he says that his wife's decision was "perfectly all right" "It doesn't bother me, So long as you know what you are getting into, it's okay"

Both agree that rearing children is a tension-filled experience which they are not willing to get into "The very thought of attending a PTA meeting is so scary," quips Anita "Children demand a different kind of commitment altogether Even if you are half unsure about having children you should not go in for parenthood"

On his part, Anand traces much of the widespread obsession with children to a socio-psychological reason "It comes of a need to propagate yourself, continue after death, so to speak I've given some thought to the concept of death and found that this whole idea is ridiculous Imagine breeding a caretaker"

Being an intense socially-conscious couple, the two are also worried about larger factors associated with bringing a child into the world Population, for one Environment, for another

Says Anita "You have to have some responsibility to the earth I don't understand how educated people can cry themselves hoarse about population explosion and then go ahead and have one, two, three children Population explosion does not only happen in slums"

She is also disturbed about current notions of bringing up children "It worries me Look at the TV they watch, the toys they play with I don't identify with it"

(The original names have been changed on insistence of anonymity by the couple.)

'I don't particularly like children though I make a good aunt or godparent'

For Anjum Rajavali and Gouri Dange, the decision to remain childless was a not painless one It came after a tumultuous period of trying out various options But today the couple, who work in the programming department of the fledgling Business India Television (BITV), are quite clear they will not have children of their own

The two got married 11 years ago, with no clear notions about parenthood Without really giving any serious thought to the matter they both felt that they wanted children In fact, for six months or so the couple did try for a child But at the end of that phase, their attitude to parenting gradually crystallised

"Gouri told me that on greater thinking she felt that she does not want children and I was ambivalent about wanting them," recalls Anjum "So we took an effective decision to remain childless"

Gouri herself says that she never ever felt the urge to bear children "I don't particularly like children though I make a good aunt or godparent I have lots of happy nephews and nieces and two dogs who are like children to us When they were pups

WHAT THEY ARE MISSING

Latika Katt: No nothing. There is so much to do that at times I feel like escaping from home to be with myself. Besides, I love living alone and being by myself.

Balbir Katt: Yes, at times, when I receive a loving letter from my students, I really miss having a child who is exclusively your own and on whom you could have showered all your love and affection Someone, whom you would want to give all your time, even if you were up to your neck with work and were wanting to skip office to be with Swapna Sundari: The presence of a child can be a cause of pausing and reflecting when there are differences and sore points in a relationship Often among career people, a child evokes a basic feeling of bonding. Also, till a certain age, a child is a bundle of surprises and unfolds various facets of its growth which help you to develop a certain kind of closeness and makes you less selfish.

I do miss some of these things, perhaps, because I have strong maternal instincts. But then we manage to satisfy this through my little nephew Chico, who spends most of his time and holidays with us in our house.

Sudha Palit: We are so full of so many things and so busy that we don't really miss the pitter patter of feet around the house Besides we fulfill our need for love and affection through our pets which are not at all demanding.

Bijoy Palit: I don't think that if you don't have children of your own you miss something. I am very fond of my nieces and nephews and they of me. Besides, all this belief of having your own kith and kin so that you may have a proper kriya karam is absolutely baseless.

Rohit and Saloni Chawla: We have so much do to by way of our common interests—photography, travelling and watching films—that there is little time to sit and think what one is missing. We don't think that one gives love to and draws it from one's own flesh and blood

Shabana Azmi: I think interacting with humans is more important than whether or not it is your own kith and kin Frankly, my heart bleeds more for the poor and needy than for my own family Besides, my very close friends' children are very fond of me. To them, I am the Shabana Masi whom they will come running to whenever their parents refuse to relent to their demands.

Anita and Anand Dutta (not their real names):

There are so many people who are opting out of parenthood that today you have to be unusual to want a child

Keya Sarkar and Raghavan Putran:

I see the despair of parents around me and the values with which children are growing up and I have no regrets In today's world it's a bolder decision to have children than to decide against it When we see how children are turning out today we tell ourselves'Thank God'.

Chitra and R.Visweswaran:

Maybe, we miss them But there has never been a shortage of kids in this house. It's an open house for our relatives' children. Most of our students arrive here when they get married and become mothers. Then we have children of our carpenter, tailor and the servant maids, who have a free run here.

Pinkie Virani: I have never actively wondered if I'm missing out on anything.

THE INHERITORS

Latika Katt: Part of my art works and material wealth to my nieces (brother's daughters) Sita and Nita who I am very close to. We also want to open an art centre at the Benaras Ganga Ghat. So the rest of it would go into that.

Balbir Katt: Some of it to my nieces and nephews, to art centres and to Santiniketan where I have studied.

Swapna Sundari: Anshu and I don't have much to will away. We may use some of it for our old age and will what is left to our nieces and nephews and donate some to voluntary organisations

Saloni and Rohit Chawla: We will spend it all in our lifetime. If some is still left, there are so many people in one's life to pass it on to.

Sudha Palit: I would like to spend most of it on ourselves in our old age. Then there are also many organisations such as the spastics society or orphanages to which I would like to make some donations.

Bijoy Palit: I don't think that one has to bequeath one's wealth to one's own child. Most parents, but not all parents, will their savings to their children. Life is such that just ten days before you die, you may meet a person to whom you would like to give everything away.

Shabana Azmi: To my step children Zoya and Farhan.

Anjum Rajavali and Gauri Dange: I would not like all the idea of the odds and ends I have worked hard for and accumulated over the years not going to someone needy, but I have broadbased my desire to leave it all to someone. Maybe I'll leave it to needy children, good institutions.

Anand and Anita Dutta (not their real names): There are several charitable causes in which we passionately believe and nieces and nephews we adore to whom we could bequeath our possessions

Chitra Visweswaran: Except for pledging our eyes to the eye bank, we have not thought about it. Now that the question has come let me see...

First I'd like to create an endowment that would give scholarships for young talented dancers Then there shall be a trust for the handicapped since my only brother had suffered from a brain injury Then there is the dance school which has to go on even after me and of course provide for relatives I only hope there will be enough left the way things are going.

R. Visweswaran: Whatever to our legacy, it'll have to do something with the arts

Pinkie Virani: I have nothing much to leave behind Except some LIC policies and a little bit of jewellery. I'll leave all to my younger sister (22) Shankar wants to leave the little property he has to his nephew.

we even left them in a 'creche'!"

Anjum and Gouri's decision did not really bring upset parents and relatives nagging to the door As it is they had done something out of ordinary by entering into wedlock out of their communities "So we were already an oddity and we had this rarified air of intellectualism around us which kept people and their comments away," quips Anjum "Our parents may have weakly raised the matter with us, but it didn't count"

As for peer pressure the twosome pointed out to an interesting fact—at most social gatherings they go to, couples as parents are rare Most of their peers are childless

But the 11 years have not passed untroubled A few years ago the couple decided to adopt Gouri's niece who came from a troubled home The child stayed with them for a short while, but four months ago she returned to her mother who by then had walked out of her marriage

The child's departure did leave a void in their lives, but it did not make them revise their opinions

"It was an ideal situation for us," Anjum says recalling his days of guardianship with the child "It was nice to have someone to care for, otherwise we were getting to be like bachelors But having gone through it, it has only strengthened our view that we don't want children of our own"

'I don't like children. I don't like dogs either'

Bangalore-based Pinkie Virani and Bombay-based Shankar Aiyar are both journalists (Pinkie is freelancing now and Shankar is with the Indian Express) and both are 40-minus They have been married for four years now, but to remain childless was not a choice dictated by kilometre distance When they began seeing each other eight years before marriage, they had made their choice not only of marrying each other, but also of not having a child

"I don't like children," says Pinkie bluntly "I don't like dogs either" Distance is only an additional reason She had moved to Bangalore from Bombay in the belief that a media boom was about to happen in that city, "a boom that never happened" Now, they both travel a lot and "there isn't enough time for each other, leave alone for children"

She feels that "too much protection and sacrifice" is required in the raising of children and is afraid of the "what if we don't succeed" factor

Shankar is the only heir apparent, and his family might possibly be thinking of the generation ahead But that has not helped change Pinkie's mind "If my father-in-law has a problem, that's his problem, not mine," she says "After seeing my friends' children, and the niggling details of rearing a child, I don't think I want to go in for a child ever"

Children, she feels, "are too binding" and "I couldn't be bothered if my father-in-law needs to dangle a child on his knees"

'Children are a product of love and security and if you have not got them yourself, how can you give it to your child?'

In a typical Hindi film scene when the doctor asks the father-to-be to choose between his critical wife and the unborn child, it is always the former the man opts for

The example cited by the noted scupltor Balbir Katt, in a sense, exemplifies the choice that Balbir himself had made with his equally famous sculptor wife Latika, although for different reasons

If one believes that in a marriage, it is the strong willed woman who holds the decision to have or not to have a child, then Latika more than fits the bill

As a determined woman who was brought up in a man's world and learnt to cope with them, feels like them and at the same time questions their domination over women, Latika had decided long before marriage that she would never have kids of her own or be tied down to a man

It was a perspective that came from her education in Doon School, where there were only 12 other girls, and then in BHU, Baroda University and the State School of Art, London, where there were hardly any women sculpture students

Also, Latika says, she found that her works too were her creation and demanded as much of her love and affection as a child would

So Balbir, who maintains that he would love to have a child, went along with his wife whom he loved more than the entity which had not yet entered their life "If you match professionally, then you do not miss one entity of your composite life," he reasons

"I love children but am able to transform that affection into the sculptures created by my wife because they are from her domain and are imbued with her love and affection," he adds

For Latika, the choice was much more than an act of simple defiance It was a rebellion against her in-laws who treated her badly when she was not working and whom she regrets "not sending to jail" for the way they treated her when Balbir was away in London on an assignment

It was also a rebellion against Balbir, "who lost all right on me when he never even enquired about my state when I was doing my masters in Baroda and had no money to pay fees after my father had passed away and slept hungry every night for three months

"Children are a product of love and security and if you have not got them yourself, how can you give it to your child?" she asks

So she made it clear to Balbir that he would not have any children from her and that he could marry again if he wanted

But contrary to the conclusion one would draw, their marriage did not sour with such stands And even though they live separately — Balbir, in Varanasi, where he is the dean of the fine arts department, and Latika in Delhi where she teaches sculpture in the Jamia Milia Islamia University "We are more of friends and have a perfect artist-to-artist understanding If I have any professional problem he will rush by the next flight and so would I for him," says Latika

Balbir reasons that a child is not always a bonding factor in a marriage and their marriage is just the right example "Yes, for those who get bored of a relationship, it certainly acts as a revitaliser But we have enough of our own stubborn stands and our understanding to keep us going!" says he

'We could selflessly dedicate ourselves to art'

The well-known Bharata Natyam dancer, Chitra Visweswaran, and her singer-husband R. Visweswaran from Madras took the decision just two years after marriage She was 23 and he, 30 She was already on the top rung of Bharata Natyam dancers while he provided the musical support for her performances and was committed to notching up a career for himself in music

Having thrown themselves to "the mercy of madness of art," the couple arrived at the conscious decision not to have a child of their own Chitra explains, "What I am today is due to the enormous sacrifice made by my parents and the time they devoted to me A child would need lots of time from at least one of the parents It's not just how much time a parent spends with their child that matters, but the quality of time spent by both or one of them "With both me and Viswesh deciding to be full-time artistes, we would have been such poor parents. Once we chalked out our respective careers, we had to sacrifice something for that — and it was parenthood

"In the Indian context, unless the parents become the prime initiators in a child's life it would be impossible to inculcate Indian values and sensibilities in such a child After having breathed Indian art and music, our lives would be self-defeating to see a child devoid of such traditional values," explains Visweswaran who gave up a lucrative career as a chartered accountant to enter the highly ephemeral world of music

The result of their sacrifices is obvious — while Chitra is one of the three ultimate' Bharata Natyam performers and a highly acclaimed dance teacher through her institution, Chidambaram, Visweswaran gives courses in vocal music and santoor

The couple was confident that the absence of parental anxieties which would have otherwise distracted them, enabled them to immerse themselves fully into the field of arts, with regular tours in India and abroad "We could be white-collared vagabonds," jokes Visweswaran

Chitra refutes the suggestion that they were selfish in denying themselves an heir apparent "In fact, it made us so free that we could selflessly dedicate ourselves to art, giving so much to others, specially our students "

The couple had passingly considered adoption at one stage, but gave it up "Sage Bharatha shared his Natyashastra with 100 sishyaputhras So why couldn't we as well? Our disciples virtually became our children," says Chitra "Maybe if I were not a teacher and no students to care for I might have considered adoption," she adds

"In fact, after seeing Chitra perform Krishna Leela, specially the Balakrishna, many fans have come up and said adoringly that she must be a very good mother to evoke Vutsalya rasa with so much empathy "I think the two of us are parents at heart Sometime when we go out we resemble Kuchela's family, with about 20 kids following us as if we were pied pipers," observes Visweswaran

On a couple of occasions Chitra confessed being hurt by a student or two Would a similar situation have arisen if she had had her own child, she says, "But I realised that every child does hurt his or her parents at some point, and you only hurt those whom you love."

'I would have worried myself to death over the kind of mother I would make'

As a fiery social activist who has fought several battles for those in need in reel, and real, life, she could not take her own quest to its logical end With time, actress Shabana Azmi attuned herself to her situation and realised that life was as good without it

For noted film writer and lyricist Javed Akhtar, it was a second marriage The two children — a daughter and a son—he had from the first, fulfilled his parental instincts So the choice became more of a decision that mattered to, and was taken by, Shabana (Javed, after evading calls for over a week, declined to speak on the issue)

"I was keen to have a child But when I found there was a medical problem with me, I decided to let it be I was not prepared to go through all those medical checkups and then go through the heartbreak of not being able to have one," says Shabana.

And not having children of her own has not left Shabana anguished because it was the actress herself who took the decision not to try any further for a child "My relationship with Javed is more important and fulfilling than having a child," she adds

"Besides, I have two, ready-made children—Zoya (22) and Farhan (21) —from Javed's first marriage They were barely 9 or 10 when their parents divorced So I got to know them at an age when they were very receptive Till today, we have long discussions on human rights, communalism and what have you and I can see ideas dropping into their bright argumentative heads."

Coming to think of it, Shabana says she feels that had she been a mother, she would have been an anxious, neurotic one like her own mother "I would have worried myself to death over the kind of mother I would make and feel guilty about not spending enough time with my child "

As chairperson of Nivara Hak, an organisation that fights for the rights of slum dwellers, and MIJWA, the society for children and women's welfare in UP, her crusade against communalism, her ceaseless travel for seminars and lectures besides her first passion, acting in theatre and films, leave her with little time to rue over such things

She laughed off the argument that a childless woman is 'incomplete' She described the belief as nothing but a socially and psychologically imposed norm that the society conditions a woman into following. "Even Elizabeth Badentener argues in her book, The Myths of Motherhood, that motherhood is more a socially imposed phenomenon than a natural instinct," she maintains

August 13: Mercury square Jupiter will make you hasty and rude, says Ganesha and that could be a fatal flaw. Keep a hawk's eye on finances and balancesheets.

August 14: Moon trine Jupiter. It would be stupid and counter productive to rest on your laurels. Get down to the nitty-gritty, examine all possibilities and then take action.

August 15: Moon trine Sun. This is a powerful trine and does signify that you have already achieved a great deal of power and pelf. To continue to progress, be friendly, amenable, and very humble. Otherwise you have one big fall.

August 16: You have the potential to advance and will be more or less a free agent, as there are no strong planetary placings. In other words, it is strictly up to you.

August 17: Saturn sextile Neptune. You can go far, very far with this powerful and puissant positioning. For one, your future could be secured, to use a typically Indian expression.

August 18: Moon's last quarter; this particular phase of the moon favours expansion, having and appreciating the comforts in life. You will spearhead a movement.

August 19: Moon square Mercury. This placing means more haste, less speed. Think twice before committing, be it a personal promise, business contract or an appointment letter.

THE SPINSTER SISTERS

I took Miss Mackenzie an offering of a tin of Malabar sardines and so lessened the sharpness of her rebuke

"Another doctor's visit, is it?" she said, looking reproachfully at me over her spectacles "I might have been dead all this time"

Miss Mackenzie, at 85, did not show the least signs of dying She was the oldest resident of the hill-station She lived in a small cottage half way up the hill The cottage, like Longfellow's village of Attri, gave one the impression of having tried to get to the top of the hill and failed half way up It was hidden from the road by oaks and maples

"I have been away," I explained "I had to go to Delhi for a fortnight I hope you've been all right?"

I wasn't a relative of Miss Mackenzie's, nor a very old friend, but she had the knack of making people feel responsible for her

"I can't compl: n The weather's been good, and the padre sent me some eggs"

She set great store by what was given to her in the way of food Her pension of Rs 40 a month only permitted her a diet of dal and rice, but the thoughtfulness of people who knew her and the occasional gift parcel from England, lent variety to her diet and frequently gave her a topic of conversation

"I am glad you have some eggs, "I said, 'They're Rs 4 a dozen now"

"Yes, I know And there was a time when they were only six annas a dozen"

"About 30 years ago, I suppose"

"No 25 I remember, May Taylor's eggs were always the best She lived in Fairville — the old house, the Raja's estate"

Did she have a poultry farm?"

"No just her own hens Very ordinary hens, too Not white Leghorns or Rhode Islands Reds — but they gave lovely eggs She knew how to keep her birds healthy May Taylor was a friend of mine. She didn't supply eggs to just anybody, you know"

"Oh, naturally not Miss Taylor's dead now, I suppose"

"Oh yes, quite dead, her sister saw to that"

"Oh!" I sensed a story, "how did that happen?"

"Well it was a bit of a mystery really May and Charlotte never really got on with each other, and it's a wonder they agreed to live together Even as children, they used to fight But Charlotte was always the spoilt one — prettier, you see May, when I knew her was 35, a good woman, if you know what I mean She saw to the house and saw to the meals and she went to church like most respectable people Everyone loved her But Charlotte was moody and bad-tempered She kept to herself — always had done, since her parents died And she was a little too fond of the bottle"

"Neither of them was married?"

"No, I suppose that's why they lived together Though I'd rather live alone myself than put up with someone disagreeable Still, they were sisters Charlotte has been a gay young thing once, very popular with the soldiers at the convalescent home She refused several offers of marriage and then, when she thought it time to accept someone, there were no more offers She was almost 30 by then That's when she started drinking — heavily, I mean Gin and brandy, mostly It was cheap in those days Gin, I think was Rs 2 a bottle"

"What fun! I was born a generation too late"

"And a good thing too Or you'd probably have ended up as Charlotte did"

"Did she get delirium tremens?"

"She did nothing of the sort Charlotte had a strong constitution"

"And so have you Miss Mackenzie,

'Well it was a bit of a mystery really. May and Charlotte never really got on with each other, and it's a wonder they agreed to live together. Even as children, they used to fight. But Charlotte was always the spoilt one — prettier, you see. May, when I knew her was 35, a good woman, if you know what I mean. She saw to the house and saw to the meals... Everyone loved her '

if you don't mind my saying so"

"I take a drop when I can afford it" She gave me a meaningful look "Or when I'm offered"

"Did you sometimes have a drink with Miss Taylor?"

"I did not! I wouldn't have been seen in her company All over the place she was, when she was drunk Lost her powers of discrimination She even took up with a barber! And then she fell down a khud one evening and broke her ankle"

"Lucky it wasn't her head"

"No, it wasn't her own head she broke, more's the pity, but her sister May's — the poor sweet thing"

"She broke her sister's head did she?" I was intrigued "Why, did May find out about the barber?"

"Nobody knows what it was, but it may well have been something like that Anyway, they had a terrible quarrel one night Charlotte was drunk and May as usual was admonishing her"

"Fatal," I said "Never admonish a drunk"

Miss Mackenzie ignored me and carried on

"She said something about the vengeance of God falling on Charlotte's head But it was May's head that was rent asunder Charlotte flew into a sudden rage She was given to these outbursts even when she was sober, and brought something heavy down on May's skull Charlotte never said what it was It couldn't have been a bottle, unless she swept up the pieces afterwards It must have been a heavy vase or a poker Anyway, it was something heavy — what writers sometimes call a blunt instrument"

When Charlotte saw what she had done, she went out of her mind They found her two days later, wandering about near some ruins, babbling a lot of nonsense about how she might have married a long time ago if May hadn't clung to her"

"Was she charged with murder?"

"No, it was all hushed up Charlotte was sent to an asylum in Ranchi We never heard of her again May was buried here If you visit the old cemetery you'll find her grave on the second tier, third from the left"

"I'll look it up sometime It must have been an awful shock for those who knew the sisters"

"Yes, I was quite upset about it too I was very fond of May. And then of course, the chickens were sold and I had to buy my eggs elsewhere and they were never so good. Still, those were the days, the good old days — when eggs were six annas a dozen and gin only Rs 2 a bottle"

WALKING ON FIRE

Being out in the hot winds of June is itself close to fire walking But June has been the month to tread over real embers too This is because the first month of the Muslim calender, Moharram, has moved with the lunar cycle to summer and therefore so has the anniversary of the martyrdom of the Prophet's grandson, Iman Husain, in the desert of Karbala

This year the crowds coming to drink sherbet provided free in old Lucknow in memory of those who died in the desert, were parched themselves

If any centre of Shia culture survives in the subcontinent it is Lucknow That's why the President of Iran chose to visit the city He witessed another special characteristic of Lucknow's Shias — independence of mind While one group welcomed him, another boycotted his visit in protest against Iran's censure of more bloody types of mourning or matam

Aag ka matam, fire-walking, does not draw blood but it is as extreme a test of the devout Shia as cutting open one's back with knife-edged chains It is held at night

I remember the first time I witnessed it very clearly I reached Lucknow's Shah Najaf Imambara, with its wide white-washed dome in the late evening A fire, looking like a huge funeral pyre, was burning in the centre of its grounds Women and children were gathering on the steps, taking advantage of the freedom from kitchen and home that Moharram gives, to make acquaintances One of them led me by the hand into the imambara where the atmosphere was completely other worldly

There was only a little light, and that was reflected in the handi, chandeliers, candelabra and mirrors within Incense filled the air A woman stood before a tazia softly reciting a lament in the purest of voices, her right hand gently beating her breast

Others moved past silently in the shadows Behind the tazias and against the walls hung magnificent standards It seemed as though the spirits of a ghostly army were standing, waiting

The woman leading me made offerings of a few coins and showed me the mirrors which cured paralysis if gazed into regularly Nothing miraculous seemed impossible to her, as for the 10 days of Moharram, her life was transformed and translated into a different level of existence

Everything was different from everyday life Clothes were of mourning, but they were new clothes Food was simple, and ornaments and jewellry shunned Each house was cleaned, and it's imambara decorated with tazias, alams and rich cloth

Each person's own sorrows were sublimated in the sorrow for the death of the martyrs The alleys were full of the sound of cassette recordings of the laments and eligies Morning to evening passed in majlis hearing poetry and sermons inspiring waves of grief and tears The emotion inspired by these 10 days was so powerful, so overwhelming, that it seemed a miracle in itself to withstand it and only natural that in faith you could walk on fire

The crowds grew as the fire burned lower, and the embers were raked level with long sticks Water was repeatedly poured over them from an earthen ware pot, and then they were fanned until they glowed again A grey sand path was made at each end of the strip of embers When a hippy-like white man arrived and sat down by them, women tittered at his appearance

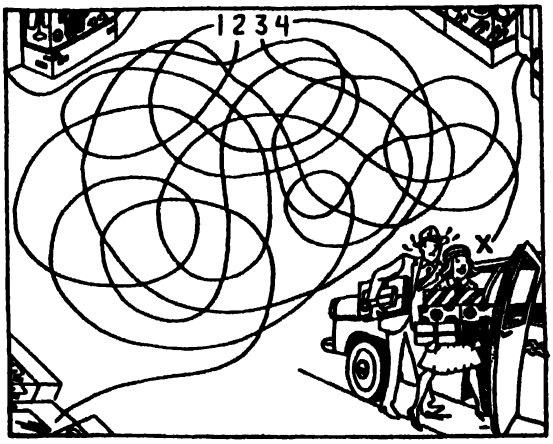
A column of men and boys formed in the darkness bearing black biers symbolising those of the martyrs These were ordinary people, fulfilling vows for wishes granted, among them were young boys All those who were to fire-walk had green strips of cloth tied round their heads

The procession circumambulated the great imambara, the men in lines reciting laments or nauhas, the rhythm marked by the hollow sound of hands beating chests

When the procession had completed its course, the first dasta, or group, moved to one end of the fiery path Each one carried a standard or a tray of smouldering incense Other standards dipped and rose again over the embers and faster and louder came the cries of "Ya Husain! Ya Husain"!

Suddenly the first man stepped on to the embers and walked forward in obvious discomfort Two men walked parallel to him on either side ready to help Shakily he managed to cross One by one, the others followed But their ordeal was not over Each one returned to walk the embers twice more

Much to everyone's surprise, the hippy whom the women had found so comical led the second dasta, walking over with complete equanimity "See," they said, revising their opinion, "What strength the name of Imam Husain produces!" News of the European, who people said was a Sunni convert calling himself Badshah Khan, spread through the crowd He returned to lead the third dasta which included two small boys not more than 11 years old They ran across as fast as their legs would carry them



I had evidence later though that faith alone was not enough to preserve you from fire I attended another fire-walking enthusiastically prepared by the lads of the small town of Mustafabad

Not able to find enough wood, they substituted coal which burned unevenly and long No one carefully raked the embers, or dampened them with water When they walked across, flames played at their feet and each one was burnt But even they managed to cross and the next day, in immense pain with their feet bandaged, I saw them hobbling along in the procession of the Tenth of Moharram

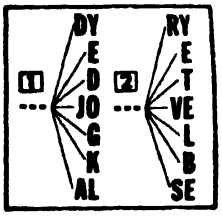
EVEN-STEPHEN COIN BOX

OUR friend Stephen above is peering at a square composed of 36 coins, six in each row He's been challenged by a friend to remove six of the coins and still have an even number remain in each horizontal, vertical and corner-to-corner diagonal row

That is to say, rows may contain two, four, or six coins

Can you help poor Stephen work this out?

Devise a square containing 36 coins if you like, or simply try crossing out coins with a pencil

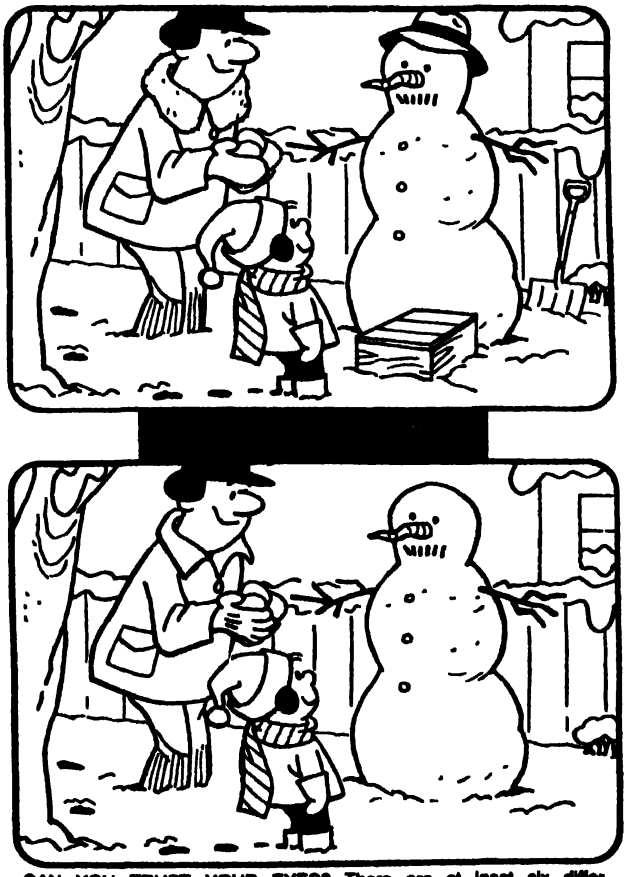


One way is to keep top three horizontal rows intact Remove last two coins of fourth row cplus 4 and 5 of fifth row and 4 and 6 of sixth row

END RUNS! Challenge Find a three-letter word that complies with letter endings shown to form seven longer words in each instance below In No 1, for example, try the word "can" It produces candy and cane, but bogs down with the addition of d In No 2, try the word 'tar' It serves to produce tarry, tare and tart, but that's all

Can you find out a three-letter word to run the gamut in each?

No fair peeking below



Ban and cur will comply respectively , Other answers may be possible

LIKE SO! All four of these words — defog, worst, canopy, studio — have the letter o in common Can you find another more intricate similarity that they share?

All four contain three consecutive letters of the alphabet.

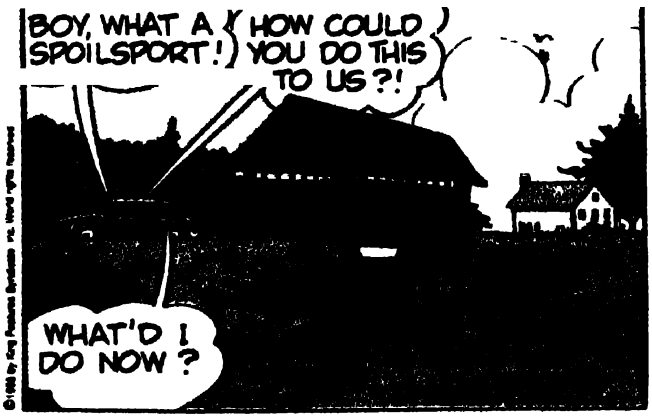
I CAN'T BELIEVE YOU'RE UP ALREADY!
NOTHING TO IT WHEN YOU REALLY TRY



WOW! LOOK AT THE TIME! I'VE NEVER BEEN SO EARLY
I'M SO PROUD OF YOU, HONEY

I'M SICK AND TIRED OF DAGWOOD MAKING US LATE ALL THE TIME!
I AGREE, IT'S TIME FOR A SHOWDOWN!

I SAY WE REALLY GIVE IT TO HIM THIS MORNING!
YEAH, LET'S TEACH HIM A LESSON HE'LL NEVER FORGET!

MORNING... LOVELY DAY, ISN'T IT?

WHAT THE...?!
YOU'RE NOT SUPPOSED TO BE HERE YET!

BOY, WHAT A SPOILSPORT!
HOW COULD YOU DO THIS TO US?!
WHAT'D I DO NOW?

BODY, AFTER ALL..

Two weeks from now Sir Donald Bradman will celebrate his 87th birthday. But this time there won't be Harold Larwood to remember him.
Gautam Bhattacharya recalls his meeting with the legendary bodyline bowler some time back*

Two Halden Street, Kensington Park, Adelaide, will experience yet another normal day on the 27th of this month Except for the fact that son John Bredsen (note the change of surname), a lecturer in Adelaide University, and his wife will hand over the customary bouquet The grandson and the daughter will help their grandpa to cut the cake and finally the family physician will join them all for a private dinner at the Bradman household The same celebration has been followed for years

And yet there will be an exception

While Sir Donald Bradman sits down to celebrate his 87th birthday, one man will be missed badly on this side of the planet His name Harold Larwood

Do not think Larwood will be missed because he was used to sending lavish birthady greetings from Sydney, and with all due respect to Sir Don, also take his recent comments with a pinch of salt

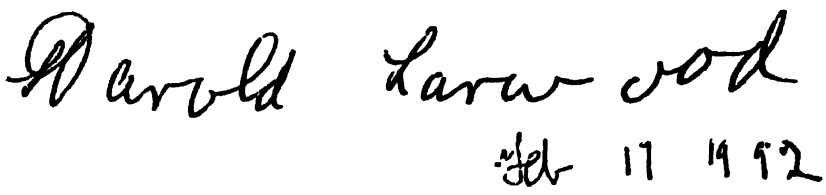
As a tribute to Larwood, Bradman said there was no animosity between them, whatever had happened in that series was all because of Douglas Jardine

On the contrary, even time supposedly the greatest healer, failed to heal their respective wounds There was absolutely no contact between them for the past 20 years or so The last time the duo had met was as far back as in 1977

Both had journeyed to Melbourne for the historical Centenary Test between England and Australia and, again, there was 'bodyline' At the end of the official dinner, Bradman was requested to make a speech which he did with great aplomb The house gave him a standing ovation

Only one man did not budge an inch No points for guessing who

And yet Bradman is going to miss Larwood because he is Bradman to people for various reasons One of the major reasons is that he could tackle somebody of the calibre of a Larwood That is precisely why hatred and rivalry betwen the two was so deep



If you walk into the famous Bradman Museum at Bowral, about 200 kms from Sydney, you will see oil paintings, bats and souvenirs of Sir Don all around If you are lucky enough to see the Bradman video cassette being played, you will also get to hear his comments on bodyline bowling "Were you a little apprehensive that the bodlyline series had reduced your average to 56 and a repeat could happen?"

"Oh, no," Don assured the interviewer "I always knew such a thing was not going to last forever " A tinge of sarcasm in his voice is unmistakable

All the rooms are filled with big pictures, the authority for the final selection of pictures resting with Bradman, I was told by the curator One found

Harold Larwood with his wife

When asked for an autograph, Larwood was painstakingly guided by his wife as he was blind

all the legends hanging out there: W.G Grace, Ranjitsinhji, Gary Sobers, Victor Trumper, the Chappell brothers, Dennis Lillee, only two personalities remain notable in their absence Douglas Jardine and Harold Larwood

One mentioned this to Larwood over the phone "Not a single picture of mine?" he was completely taken aback, but then broke into a hearty laugh "Don't worry, my picture will be there within a few months "

How could he be that sure? "After all, the pictures are coming from Adelaide by ship It has to take some time, my dear," he replied The emotional scar was again visible

Larwood hated Bradman as much as he loved him When this correspondent visited his Leonard Avenue flat a few days prior to the World Cup, the owner had laid down a precondition He would not answer a single question on bodyline He also refused to be photographed alongside a picture of Bradman

"Jack Hobbs was the greatest of them all," Larwood informed, and added, "On all types of wickets there has never been a greater player " Larwood had already lost his eyesight by then and there was no question of even turning to the television set

So I hastened to ask if he had seen the likes of Viv Richards or the Chappell brothers to make an 'all-time' observation? "Oh, I had a lot of hopes in Viv But when I watched him, my God, I was terribly disappointed He took so many chances on any kind of wicket, I would have always had a 50-50 chance against Viv Mind you, Don never gave a chance "

What about a Greg Chappell or a Sunil Gavaskar? "Chappell made lots of runs, but he simply wasn't in the same street Gavaskar was slightly better, but in my book, he won't qualify This man used to wear a helmet "

What Gavaskar had used was a skullcap and not a helmet, I tried to reason out with him I also told him the skullcap came only towards the later stage of his career But my host was insistent

Who was the bravest of them all? The old man immediately went inside and returned with a piece of paper which, after great difficulty, appeared as a telegram It read 'Well bowled, Harold Congratulations Archie'

The sender, I was told, died only 60 years ago And since then, this has been preserved. "Do you know Archie Jackson died three weeks after sending the telegram? From his death-

Gautam Bhattacharya

bed, he was congratulating me for my performance in the bodyline series "

Now Larwood's voice seemed choked with emotion."Archie was a man He got 164 against me Never ran away from the fast stuff unlike a few who ran away and grumbled Easily, Archie was the bravest of them all Next in line would be Stan McCabe '

Where does that leave Bradman, I wondered According to Larwood, Don was neither the greatest nor the bravest Wasn't he being too unkind on this man? And can't resist the temptation of getting a likely derogatory quote on the batting genius of Don

So, I tell him how the modern English media are trying to erode Bradman's statistical superiority Their reasoning was that four fast bowlers, defensive field placing and acrobatic fitness standards would have relegated Bradman to the status of an above-average

"Who says that?" asks Larwood softly British cricket correspondents, I reiterate Suddenly the old man flares up "Thank God, my eyes have gone I have been spared the agony of reading this garbage "

He walked in with his personal album, and completely surprised me Three-fourths of it are occupied by pictures of Bradman Bradman batting, Bradman standing alone, Bradman and Larwood walking out together

Could I take a picture of his holding any of those pictures? "No," he rasped

And then, minutes later, completely contradicted himself by saying, "Bradman was easily the greatest of them all " Very apologetically I pointed out that had he not already picked Jack Hobbs? "Yeah, but Don was Don Extremely good eyesight he had. For him the good length ball never existed And he never got tired. You talked about Viv Richards. I can assure you Don was 10 times a better batsman "

Now my misery seemed further compounded Had the man turned senile? Meanwhile, Larwood began discussing the 1932-33 series, every minute detail as if it had only happened yesterday and then concluded, "The teleserial, Bodyline, was complete hogwash They showed me bowling in grounds which had trees in the background What the hell I was a coalminer Where did I get such grounds? Thank God, they didn't have a fan running in the background," remarked Larwood ruefully

Then he got up, showed me other pictures of the bodyline series, the ball that was used and other mementos For a blind man of 89 he seemed extremely sharp and agile I imagined how much sharper he must have been 60 years earlier

I got a glimpse of his wife and one of the four daughters and they seemed in touch But Larwood did not know a Graham Gooch was captaining England in the World Cup that was to commence a few days from then He did not know a certain Richard Hadlee existed and had something to do with cricket Worse, as a Sydney resident of the last four decades, he had little idea that the Sydney Hall had been done away with

Did he think Bradman would have succeeded in one day cricket? "Don wouldn't have touched this," Larwood looked quite certain "Don't forget this is ladies' cricket Bradman was a real man. How could he play with ladies?"

By now one was convinced Larwood had been the greatest Don worshipper And these two must have been the greatest antagonists ever to meet on the cricketing field

But the more important question loomed large Did Harold Larwood stop living since the bodyline series?

Otherwise how does one explain this complete disregard for the present and yet unfiltered passion for something that had happened only 60 years ago?

You might not find the answer to this But, yes, you could still manage a one-line obit for Harold Larwood Here was a cricketer ■

A Lampoon on Calcutta

Calcutta is a picturesque city especially when caught in a triangle of traffic
or a procession for a just cause!

time is a football
stuck in the mud.

taxis purr trucks howl
buses honk
and two or four-lettered words round off the music

the half-moon comes closer hanging from the overhead wires
of painted trams

Calcutta has a heart of pure gold some say—
I too believe the silent heart of some glorious wreck of the old

The Corpse Bearer

The funeral ground is far away.
Like a beast of burden,
the corpse bearer walks ahead,
step by step.
Countless corpses on his shoulders enmeshed as though in a cobweb, their spindly legs and hands hanging in strands, asleep on his shoulders
a long long time.

Once in a while they come alive stretching their limbs, to look around for light and air, their subdued murmurs swimming about in the wind.

And many questions, one after another, suddenly come rushing in like waves of the sea

Yet, the man who can answer is a lifeless tree lying motionless, without look or voice,
because he himself is a living corpse and corpse bearers:
His funeral ground is far away.

Remembrance

As I lie down, stretching my acting limbs
A memory drops into my lap
And pops open like a nut Scattering yesterday around me whiffs of laughter reach me
Through the mists of decades gone by Fragments of joy sink into my heart digging out embers of fires long extinguished
Soft fingers entwine mine
Life seeps into my veins again
The sky above changes hues
as my memory engulfs me Teasing, scorching, whipping up emotions forgotten long ago
I reach out to feel it, then suddenly like the touch-me-not,
it withdraws and yesterday
once again loses its way
And I get up to move with the present
Till another day, another crossroad when my past and I shall trick the present once again.

VIDEOS

The Postman: A simple love story etched on the screen with a painter's brush The movie unwinds a tale about an uneducated postman (Massimo Troisi) who falls in love with the most beautiful woman in town and woos her with words

A wellknown Chilean poet is exiled to this tiny island off the southern coast of Italy The postman befriends the poet who participates (reluctantly at first) in the bandy of words to win her over

A charming movie which flows smoothly and manages to meander around the mawkish elements Even when the postman asks the poet, "What's a metaphor?" and other such questions

Troisi exudes a natural glow and melts into his role, fluttering hands, mumbled words without any particular mannerisms Incidentally, he died on the last day of filming

Unfortunately Troisi's performance is marred by a maudlin, almost pathetic denouement that shatters the quiet emotions built up till then

MUSIC

Play On! The latest four-volume set of tarana recitals from Music Today is something anyone would give his right ear to possess.

The best thing about this classical music set is that it can be enjoyed even by the mid-brow listener; it's not ivory tower music even while being ivory tower.

Rajan and Sajan Mishra have selected taranas in Raga Hamsadhwani and the rare Raga Bhairav. Padma Talwalkar picks on stage concert items ending with Raga Lalit. Veena Sahasrabuddhe goes for varied moods and Ulhas Kashalkar tries to exploit the clarity and precision of ragas and rhythmic patterns.

Bound to light up your life. Music Today, Rs 260.

BOOKS

Little Girls in Pretty Boxes
A heart-rending tale of little girls who are rigorously trained to become top gymnasts and figure skaters

The author, Joan Ryan discovers "legal abuse In the dark troughs along the road to the Olympics lay the bodies of the girls who stumbled on the way, broken by the work, pressure, and humiliation"

The reader encounters a series of characters, real-life, yet straight out of the Dickensian world; ambitious parents, tyrant coaches, greedy guides, indifferent officials of the US Gymnastics Federation, who love the glitter of gold medals, but care a fig for the young athletes who slog to earn them

In their earnest effort to please, the girls strain themselves to the utmost, starving to stay slim and performing while injured The book tends to be repetitive, but narrates a shameful story which needs to be told

POSTMORTEM

Our Best Shot?

■ What an amazing discovery — this 'scorpion' from sylvan Sikkim ('Little Brother', July 23)! His life is really a fairytale of a village lad rising to the crest because of sheer hard-work, perseverance and talent.

Football in India is still a very amateurish sport and against this backdrop whoever displays a few sparks becomes a 'hero'. Baichung Bhutia may really have the skill for international tournaments. But his talent needs to be honed

With the available infrastructure — poor training, lack of funds, and not forgetting petty politics — how far can this lad go?

Manohar Mandal,
Nabadwip (W B)

■ There are many talented footballers in West Bengal unrecognised for lack of government attention.

If well coached some of them can rise to the top and even compete with international footballers.

Mustafa Attarwala,
Calcutta

■ In the history of Calcutta soccer no footballer to date has earned the popularity of Baichung. East Bengal is lucky to have picked up such a talented striker.

B.N. Bose,
Calcutta

Dipankar Choudhury

Baichung Bhutia: Little brother, big spread

■ In almost every sphere — science, music, literature, the fine arts and films — Indians have performed brilliantly abroad. But we are yet to produce a footballer of international repute.

If Sikkim, with its small population, could produce a Baichung, why can't West Bengal with its teeming millions?

Reba Bose,
Jamshedpur

■ Indian soccer is really in a sorry state. If international clubs are wooing this young talent from India, then he should immediately be sent abroad.

Panchanana Baskey,
Baripada (Orissa)

■ According to a recent report, India occupies the 113th position among the 179 soccer-playing nations in the world. Isn't it a disgrace for a country with 900 million people?

We have a Union sports minister and every state boasts of a sports department. We also have a prestigious body like the Sports Authority of India Yet, not one state has been able to produce a footballer of world class

Manoranjan Das,
Jamshedpur

■ The Magazine said that Baichung was the second footballer after Chima Okerie to make it to commercials. That is not true Jamshed Nassiri and the veteran Chuni Goswami have also been seen in commercials, and much before Baichung

Somnath Paul,
Bankura (W.B.)

■ It is not only Surojit Sengupta and Baichung who have received invitations from clubs abroad. Chuni Goswami, the all-time favourite of Mohun Bagan, had received a grand offer from a first division club in London in the mid-Sixties.

And so did Krishanu Dey, who was strongly wooed by a Saudi Arabia club.

KHAN SAHEB

Meet the new Imran Khan whose influence on the Pakistani masses indicates that he is an idea whose time has got to come. Soon. Lokendra Pratap Sahi analyses the mood in Pakistan in this exclusive to the Magazine

Photographs by the author

The future face of Pakistan?

Holding forth

IF IMRAN KHAN HAS PROMISED A 2:30 PM APPOINTMENT at the Shaukat Khanum Memorial Cancer Hospital and Research Centre — for that is where he prefers 'tackling' everything — chances are that his glistening Nissan Patrol or the upmarket Toyota Land Cruiser will only be visible closer to 4:30 pm.

Not because of a traffic snarl in Lahore (though the hospital is some 25 minutes from the city centre), but probably because some sifarish-seekers buttonholed him outside his Zaman Park residence.

And, if the ubiquitous leather folder (not one of the designer ones) is not exactly bulging when Imran gets off the Land Cruiser/Patrol, chances are that it actually will by the time he has hopped, stepped and jumped (yes, the cementing there is not yet complete) the 50-odd metres from the car park to the hospital's marketing wing where he holds durbar.

No prizes for guessing how the folder balloons, as the moment Imran turns off ignition he invariably is besieged by either job-hunters or parents wanting a recommendation for their child's admission in one school or the other.

Everyone, of course, has come with petition ready, confident that 'Khan Saheb,' who gives a reasonably patient hearing, will not disappoint. But very often, he does, pleading, "Naukri kahan?"

And once Imran is in office, he takes time to settle down, for every now and then there is either a call or fax which requires his personal attention. Even though the telephones are rumoured to be tapped, that has not stopped Deputy Commissioners, who wield enormous power, from personally calling up. Third ear, be damned.

That, for you, is the Imran Khan of 1995. He quotes not from the laws of cricket, a sport where he has left an indelible mark, but from the Koran. And, while one-time teammate Zakir Khan proudly proclaims Imran is "Pakistan's uncrowned king," for many others he is the messiah, visible in flesh and blood.

There also are quite a few who only have unkind words (for instance, cricketer-turned-politician-turned-governmental advisor Sarfraz Nawaz), but their credibility ranks a good half-a-dozen notches below Imran's At the very least, that is

Imran continues to insist that he would be a complete misfit in the current political set-up and that, singlehandedly, it would be impossible for him to effect any change But there already is a growing demand that he formally announce his arrival as the 'third force' in Pakistani politics

For just how long he can resist that pressure is the proverbial million-rupee question In the past, though, Imran has spurned overtures from the late General Zia-ul-Haq and former caretaker Prime Minister Moeen Qureshi, widely respected as Pakistan's best administrator The latter's offer had come as recently as mid-1993 Only, Imran's priority then was the hospital And now

Perhaps, the most revealing observation, during a recent visit to Pakistan, came from the operations manager of a Lahore hotel Requesting anonymity, he declared "It would be fair to conclude that the people of Pakistan want a change They've had enough of Benazir Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif and others of their tribe Aap yakin karen, awaam tang aa gayee hai

"They're looking for somebody with a clean image and Imran definitely fits the bill For Imran, the journey from cricketing hero to social crusader has been smooth, and I don't anticipate any problems of acceptability as a politician "

Already, Imran's following is formidable, thanks in no small measure to the hospital, the successful completion of which has given him a status that is everyone's envy

Indeed, for the masses, Imran's outstanding achievements on the cricket field seemingly take second billing The hospital, in the still-developing Johar Town locality, is what counts

At best, politicians merely lay foundation stones for hospitals. They promise so much, but deliver, well .. With Imran, it has been very different A sportsman has presented his country with a facility which can favourably compare with specialist cancer establishments worldwide

The bottomline is that Imran not only promised, but has delivered as well And that has sent his credibility zooming

Mind you, even before the hospital was inaugurated (last December), hundreds of women had enough faith to happily part with gold bangles and ear-rings during one of Imran's fund-raising drives "In him we trust," was (and is) a fairly common sentiment

Not too long ago, Sarfraz alleged that the supermarket chain (Pace Pakistan Limited) which Imran is promoting was really being built with money siphoned from funds raised for the hospital

At first glance, the charge is devastating Only, no one believes Sarfraz Rather, as one gentleman who has spent many winters and summers in Lahore reasoned, "It's no big deal even if some money has been channeled elsewhere "

"Dekhen ji, humko Imran pe bharosa hai Even if that allegation is true, what's so remarkable about it? Imran promised a hospital and it's there for everybody to see It's functional and the poor don't even have to pay So what, if some money has been diverted to another project? Even that chain (of supermarkets) will benefit Pakistanis Un paison se usne apna ghar to nahin banaya " the gentleman opined

Interestingly, even a federal government bureaucrat who spoke to The Telegraph Magazine, acknowledged that Imran's clean reputation on money matters would give him a head-start over both Prime Minister Bhutto and Sharif, the Opposition supremo should he take the plunge

' Imran could have made a tidy packet (from the hospital) Instead, he is seen as being thoroughly scrupulous, which is saying quite a lot," the bureaucrat maintained

He quotes not from the laws of cricket, a sport where he has left an indelible mark, but from the Koran. And, while one-time teammate Zakir Khan proudly proclaims Imran is 'Pakistan's uncrowned king,' for many others he is the messiah, visible in flesh and blood

Jemima and Imran enter the hospital portals

But would Imran's entry into politics please the bureaucrats anchored in Islamabad? Our friend's response would have done any foreign service mandarin proud "Let's say that the kickbacks' taking lobby will more than just frown while the honest guys will, I suppose, be pretty pleased "

Remarked yet another former teammate, legendary leg spinner Abdul Qadir "I personally feel Imran should announce his entry sooner rather than later And when he does, I'll be the first to join him "

He added, twirling his fingers as if readying to unleash a lethal leg break. "The mood is for a change and in Imran, there's a ready alternative.

"Imran's not only someone who has seen the world, something that's necessary if you're to take an unblinkered view of things, but is also committed to the people Testimony to that is the hospital In fact, I've been asking him to enter politics for some years now Imran ko khud nahin pata hai ki log usko kitna chahte hain"

Qadir is probably right, for despite a specific appeal (out of concern for Karachi being in flames) that no supporters welcome him and Jemima on their touching down on home soil for the first time after nikaah, thousands besieged Lahore International Airport to accord a truly emotional reception

And if that was not enough, hundreds had Imran's portrait prominently embossed on Pakistan's green-and-white national flag That unprecedented act by itself conveyed much As also the spontaneous, almost hysterical, chanting of "Wazir-e-Azam Imran Khan," punctuated by the subcontinent's very own and traditional zindabads It was all extremely heady

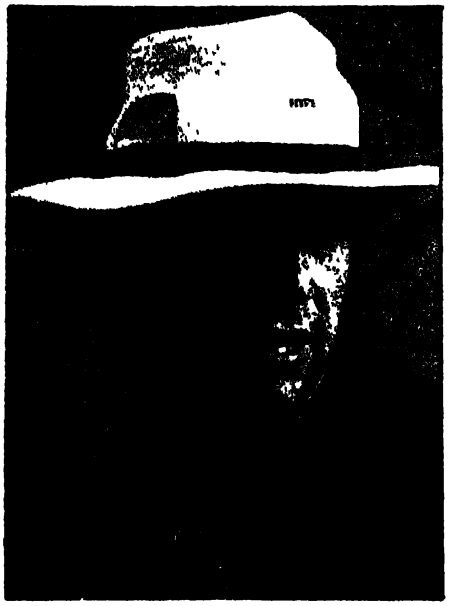
The overwhelming welcome appears to have further upset the Imran-baiters' calculations Not only did the post-nikaah anti-Imran wave not gain ground (despite a stinging campaign in a section of the print medium), Jemima's salwar-kameez-dupatta appearance proved a blockbuster Coming via Saudi Arabia, after performing Umra, was a big plus, too

Even if that allegation [of misappropriation of funds] is true, what's so remarkable about it? Imran promised a hospital and it's there for everybody to see. It's functional and the poor don't even have to pay. So what, if some money has been diverted to another project?

That Jemima, who has converted to Islam, is an instant hit was confirmed when she and Imran made their maiden public appearance, at the hospital For a change, the horde of lensmen focused on Mrs Khan (addressed as "bhabhi" by Imran's associates) as she stiletto-ed around the hospital, dupatta in place and speaking in whispers

Imran who, by the way, is absolutely smitten by Jemima, did not mind being 'ignored', for if Jemima continues to get a good press, it will be a somewhat unexpected advantage And just to eliminate the possibility of any 'misunderstanding' or misrepresentation of comments, Mrs Khan is declining interviews At least, for now

The hospital and the man before it



While on mis-representation, Imran needs to watch out himself Despite categorically asserting (at a bustling media conference in Lahore) that joining politics "purely as a reaction" to the government's attitude "wouldn't make sense," a leading English daily still front-paged a headline which said exactly the opposite So

Imran may also have to tone down his Brown Saheb bashing, specially when criticising the discarding of the salwar-suit in favour of Western clothes Incidentally, for the past couple of years, Imran has himself taken to the salwar-suit in a big way.

At that same media conference, Imran was cornered by some scribes who argued that jeans and T-shirts were not only more economical, they had bigger utility value Clearly, they were not too impressed by Imran's call for "Be Pakistani, wear Pakistani "

Imran, of course, is in no hurry to call off his assault on the Brown Sahebs "What's my marriage (to an English lady) got to do with that?" was his biting (and furious) response to a 'planted' query that afternoon

The glitterati may not endorse all his views, but the commoner is bound to applaud Imran, a shrewd reader of men and minds, knows that only too well

The Western look, now being toned down

And now that the hospital has taken off, Imran is busying himself with yet another populist step the National Education Movement, which will be headed by a former United Nations Development Programme functionary

Again, Imran can only come closer to the people (particularly in rural Pakistan) who will matter should he shrug off his reluctance to join politics That Pasban, the energetic youth wing of the Jam'at-i-Islami, will once more lend a helping hand is significant

What emerges is that Imran has picked his social agenda astutely Actually, so deplorable has been the politicians' track record that Imran only stands to gain He already is Pakistan's No 1 crowd-puller

Now, how quickly will he take a shot at the No 1 job? That is the teaser of the times ■

'The mood is for a change and in Imran, there's a ready alternative,' says Abdul Qadir. 'Imran's not only someone who has seen the world, something that's necessary if you're to take an unblinkered view of things, but is also committed to the people.... Imran ko khud nahin pata hai ki log usko kitna chahte hain'

FOCUS

SIR JAMES, WE PRESUME?

Will the real Goldsmith stand up, please?

He now professes to have a heart of gold, deploring the materialism of our vicious economic world The man in question is the all too revered Sir James Goldsmith, better known on the subcontinent as Jemima's father

Surprise of surprises, the European billionaire seems hellbent on casting aside his earlier corporate raider image to one who is a thinker — committed to the cause of raising a storm over the blind consumerism in which we, the commoners, are haplessly steeped One wonders if it was not his son-in-laws's zealous missions which may have contributed to the entrepreneur's sudden change of heart

Not many people, as James saw it, have the luxury to do what they think is right But that is exactly what Jimmy, as he is called by those closest to him, did from the start Like all the raiders in the Eighties, he loved to scoff at corporate bureaucrats and broke into scornful anger when people had the temerity to suggest that corporate raiding was something less than God's handiwork

In fact, delivering what seemed like sermons from the pulpits about why they were wrong and he was right was a favourite hobby of Jimmy's

And he did these with a good deal of ostentation as in everything else in his life His wives and affairs were scattered all over the globe as were the number of children he had sired

Escape was narrow when he liquidated his stocks just before the crash of 1987 A not-so-serious raid later in the late Eighties, Jimmy bowed out of sight

But he came back, choosing this time to prey upon people's mind, suffering probably the delusions of the superich that wealth confers wisdom

So it was with Henry Ford who thought his profound anti-Semitism was "an insight right into the heart of things" — just as his assemblyline — the production technique that made such cars possible had been

A not too uncommon instance would be Ross Perot whose business empire, was built from scratch Perot employed people by the thousands and changed the face of an industry simply on the basis of his ideas But the real problem came when he decided to run for President The magnate was robbed of his magnetism and overnight adjudged a political crank

In a bid to defend his hostile takeover manoeuvres, raiders like Goldsmith developed a hubristic approach in assessing corporate America But he is not the only one in his family who has an inflated ego His older brother, Edward, was fast becoming England's most reputed environmentalist For Teddy Goldsmith is one of those doomsayers who feels Apocalypse is just round the corner

Jimmy in his more halcyon days had summarily dismissed his brother's car-

pings as too primitive to merit serious thought "The secret," he once said, "is to create ambitions the whole time," to "go forward because you have no choice "

He had always opposed nuclear power though, and in 1990, when the last of the corporate raiders had bid adieu (thanks largely to the decline of Michael Milken) Goldsmith, who by then had grown weary of his business interests, turned ironically, to his brother's worldview

It is The Trap which lays down Goldsmith's elaborate cosmic view The book is a series of question and answers to softball questions put forward by an almost servile French journalist And Goldsmith seems contented to do what he has always liked best — be pompously dogmatic

One finds it almost impossible to go through The Trap and not infer that its author is all for going back to old times which is better than looking ahead, and that a more primordial society is a better society But what one would certainly not miss is the oracular tone of the moral deliverer

Some of Goldsmith's opinions on GATT are downright absurd and his call for a more primitive way of life — living off the land, governing communally and learning to live with out the use of consumer goods can hardly make sense when it comes from someone who has 200 Mexicans tending the food at his villa

He, however, has a point when he expresses concern over nuclear power, but even then, sounds highly eccentric

When he ventures to make these moral utterances one gets the insistent urge to collar the man and ask whether he is not being a hypocrite after all For he who once thrived on exploiting the economy, is talking about how best to redeem it Since Goldsmith has had his share in the systematic destruction of the economy through hostile incursions, how strange that he should rue the loss of community

Does he have the right to make us guilty of our sins when he has never bothered to address his own? The corporate jungle is ruthless after all, but what of those who perpetrated this process of ruthlessness?

People like Goldsmith have a lot to atone for before making it their business to lecture the world It was surely time for him to be penitent?

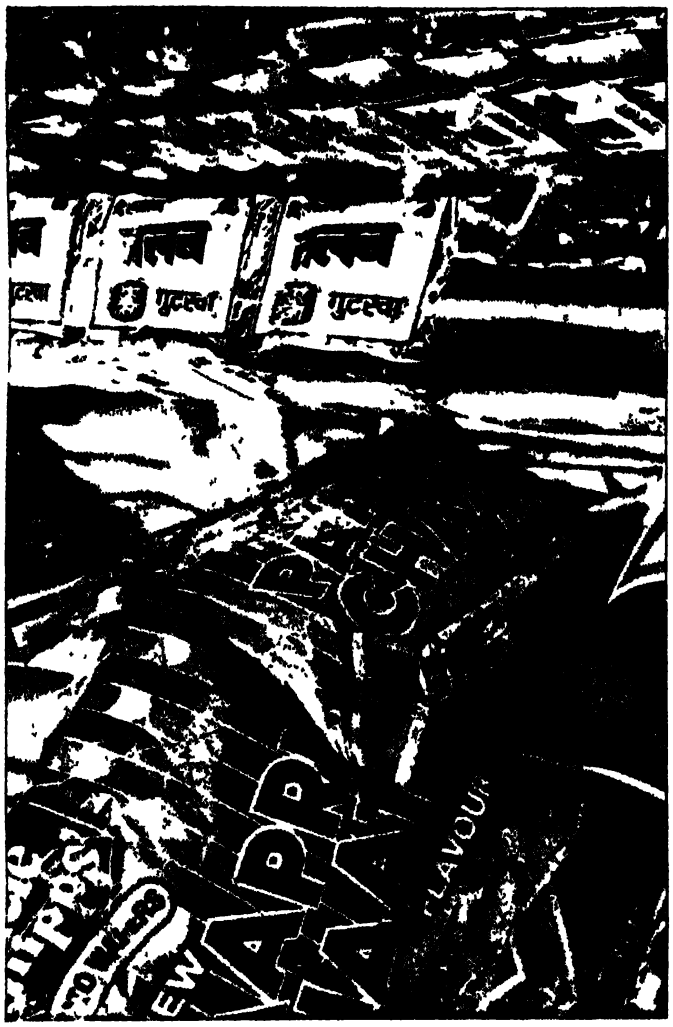
Let us launch an offensive against plastic packaging



Living in a Plastic Age (your cover story, 'The Plastic Hood', June 25) is not a reassuring thought for many The more we woo plastic, use plastic and live plastic, the greater is the possibility of an environmental disaster Just ponder over the following perils of plastic usage

Plastic is not recyclable Generally, the plastic packaging material finds its way into landfilling through urban waste route As plastic is biodegradable, this toxic landfilling triggers the process of irreversible degradation of the soil It is estimated that about one million tonnes of plastic waste per annum will be generated in India

The plastic lobby, while defending the use of plastic, generally argues that per capita consumption of plastic in India is much less than the developed countries Our country is densely populated Instead of viewing the per capita consumption, it would be prudent to give a serious look into the quantity of toxic waste generated per hectare of agricultural and forest land available in our country The overview would only prove the dangerous consequences looming large on the fertile land due to rampant dumping of plastic packaging material

The other major important factor for discouraging the use of plastic as packaging material is widespread counterfeiting and adulteration of the packaged products

Plastic packages can be easily tampered with Many cases of contamination have come to the fore, but only after causing misery to our citizens There have been cases of contaminated edible oil in HDPE Jar, presence of spurious oil and liquor in plastic pouches and substandard milk Plastic is not tamperproof because of its easy re-'sealability' It is important to note that on the other hand, glass or metal packaging is not that easy to be tampered with

The other disadvantage of plastic packaging is the health hazard Certain findings, as stated in the article, confirmed that many widely used plastic resins are carcinogenic, but they continue to be used in India for packing processed or semi-processed snacks like bhujia, papad and chips There seems to be a lack of awareness against the use of such carcinogenic material for food packaging

Recently lubricating oil companies have switched over the marketing of their lubricating oil from metal containers to plastic containers, on the plea that there is a consumers' demand for these containers

An investigation has revealed that used plastic containers of the oil are popular among the rural population for storing potable water It is important to note that a used lubricant container of plastic cannot be totally cleansed of its contents Traces of lubricating oil (hydro-carbon) are found on the inner walls of these containers, which contaminates the stored water

It is ironical that while the vast rural population in India is ignorant about this health hazard, the major oil companies are least concerned about its consequences It is important that the oil companies should be compelled to print a warning on the body of the plastic containers that its usage for storing any edible product is harmful to health

It has been rightly pointed out in the article that some use of plastic is inevitable, and desirable, specially for consumer durables, furniture, disposable syringes

Therefore, it is all the more important that non-essential use of plastics, as in the case of packaging, must be minimised to check the growth of plastic waste

It would not be inappropriate to mention that the plastic lobby in this country has a powerful political influence and they always try to influence the government's decision for petty gains A concerted and coordinated effort should be made to counter this powerful lobby by an 'awareness campaign' towards the hazard of plastic packaging material

Laughing WATER

BY JAYABRATO CHATTERJEE

Extracted from Last Train to Innocence by Jayabrato Chatterjee, Penguin Books (India), Rs 125

With a spontaneous whoop and a skip Roy crossed the threshold and slunk into his chair He sat down gingerly, not sure if the hard wood would take kindly to his abused bottom so soon The class released waves of sympathy signals a quick smile, a saucy wink, a new rubber tossed at his desk even as the torrid poem was recited by one section, a bubble-gum displayed slyly for sharing later, a sharpener in the shape of a miniature globe passed to the hero through a series of surreptitious hands

"Serves you right, Roy!" admonished Miss Barucha "I hope this'll put a stop to your monkeying for a while You need to pull up your socks and pay attention to lessons instead of making Mamen Mamen your lawful lord and master His are hardly the correct footsteps to follow Sweet meat, my friend, will have sour sauce and pleasures, while they flatter, sting as well! Now sit still if you can and open your Reader to page fifty-six Sissy Anand, are you dreaming?"

"No Ma'am," exclaims Sissy, making her eyes as big as possible and pretending to be hurt He resented the attention the class showered on Roy

"Then repeat the verse we've just read "

Prithvi Singh, Roy's immediate neighbour, hid behind the frayed pages of his brown-paper covered Reader, pulling it right over his chimpanzee face He whispered, "I'll lend you my katty at Short Break and share tuck Promise!"

Roy grinned and squeezed his best friend's inky fingers He felt a lot better already

"Stop jabbering, Singh, before I throw you out of class!" Miss Barucha's sharp eyes hadn't missed the welcome

Sissy Anand dragged back his chair and rose daintily from its depths Locking his fingers across his chest, he began reciting in his effeminate voice

Thus the youthful Hiwatha
Said within himself and pondered,
Much perplexed by various feelings
Restless, longing, hoping, fearing,
Dreaming still of Minnehaha
Of the lovely laughing water
In the land of the Dacotahs

Roy moved forward and leaned on his desk with his elbows, cheeks sunk firmly in his palms

Minididi!

Laughing water of the baori near

Scandal Point, tucked way up on a jutting plateau by the northern end of the saal woods where undulating hills ultimately began their treacherous climb to Mussoorie. Bugga often said a pair of spotted deer came to the pool on moon-washed nights, shaking their slender antlers at stretching shadows, to quench their eternal thirst for turning into human lovers they once were, before Ruth Zacharia transformed them in her dark dungeon into quaking heerans. Gopal driver hipped his back playfully with a sheesham twig and told him to stop pulling long yarns. Otherwise he'd go ask the foul-mouthed Jhagaria-mem to turn Bagga into a grunting pig.

When Baba came to Rajpur from his journeys across turbulent seas, he sometimes went for walks near the baori where he saw wild fowls flounce and fly low, their brown wings fanned out. Usually, they glided over the cinnamon-coloured terraced slopes where villagers grew dense yellow mustard and golden wheat in winter. There couldn't have been uglier birds with red-rimmed eyes and squat, jaundiced beaks. But they made good parents and protected their chicks who travelled with them.

Roy once discovered two exquisite Birds of Paradise, swishing their long ribbon tails and frisking on the slender branches of jacarandas that surrounded the well-spring and burst into bloom in surprising abundance every March. He had picked them out by sheer chance one dawn when he drove there with Gopal Driver. They were just a teeny-weeny bit bigger than the common thrush, with sharp and curved beaks. Their white wings were speckled with black strokes and their tails rippled and caught the glint of golden sun-rays as they frolicked in clusters of purple flowers. If they were ever disturbed, they flew into the dark saal woods, never to reveal where they built their nests. Laldida said their souls were immortal and those who happened to see them on earth were extremely lucky indeed.

He had tried telling Minididi in a hundred different ways that his heart belonged to her alone, if she'd please stop mocking him in front of Michael Cameron or pulling his cheeks till they hurt in front of Badibua. But she only laughed and tossed back her braids as she exclaimed, "Ishan, you're such a cute baby!"

When Minididi was a toddler, her Mummyji had lost her mind. Badibua, who brought her up, was an awful tyrant. She was a formidable fixture in the house like the tiger skins spread on the drawing room floor or the huge oil-paintings of ancestors on the foyer wall or the stuffy Victorian furniture scattered all over the house, smelling of moth-balls and madness.

Dressed in immaculate white saris, hair scraped back into a tight knot and with a chandan spot on her enormous forehead, Badibua usually sat on a reed-mat through the better part of the morning in front of her mischievous Nandgopal. This was her strategic location from where she kept a hawk's eye on the house. Nandgopal grinned and watched her devious wiles, standing on an ornate silver base laden with flower petals. He was hardly two feet tall, but he insisted on crossing his feet cockily, swinging the jaunty peacock feather in his crown and playing a silver flute. And he knew all the tricks Badibua was plotting, as his merry eyes looked at her through the heavy incense haze.

Badibua always told beads with her eyes half-closed. She begged Nandgopal to release her from sins and asked for his infinite mercy and goodness. But even as she prayed, not for a moment did she spare the minions.

"Harey Krishna, harey Krishna. Where's that son-of-a-pig Dhanram? Has the haraami brought in the milk? Krishna-Krishna, harey-harey. Did anyone see how much water that ullu mixed? Or have you all gone blind. Harey ram, harey Ram. Arrey, where have all you dunces disappeared? Is it your mother's funeral today? Why don't you swines answer? Ram-Ram, harey-harey!"

As the days went by, Mummyji's daily post-lunch tantrums grew worse. Minididi couldn't care less and Badibua did little to help. In fact, Mummyji became hopelessly agitated if Badibua went anywhere near her room. She detested the sour old crone with such ferocity that even Mali Ayah couldn't control her. Breaking away from the ayah's iron grip, she lurched forth with maniac zest in an attempt to grab her sister-in-law's throat. And when she failed, she tore her clothes in imbecile frustration.

Badibua was never pleased with anything or anybody and she had mastered the knack of making other people's lives miserable. She had wasted no time meddling in Mummyji's affairs when she came home as a bride, decked in heavy Benares silks and with henna hieroglyphs prettily pattered on her hands and feet Badibua hated sharing her brother, Raibahadur Chamanlal Once she returned from her in-laws garbed in white and with her bangles smashed, irrevocably widowed within seven months of her lavish wedding, she became paranoid and possessive about him She resented her bhabi and her black tongue never stopped wagging

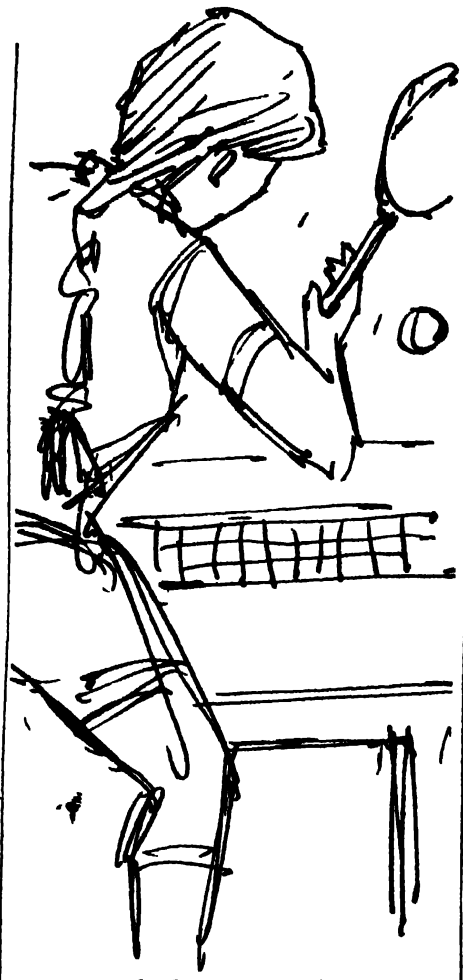
Mummyji had brought tons of gold seven heavy necklaces, 24 bangles and four heavy kadas, a pair of bajubandhs, umpteen ear-rings, solid diamond chhallas and even gold kaliras But she was neither beautiful nor educated

In the early days, Badibua had engaged the stodgy and passive Mummyji in devious games of rummy and tried to retrieve information about what she did with her anglicised brother behind locked doors But when Mummyji beat her at the card game, an ! gave her explicit details about lusty fellatio sessions, accompanied by boisterous laughter, Badibua's parsimonious heart panicked She summarily put an end to the taash sequence and started poisoning the Raibahadur's ears

The rift was inevitable

******



Badibua was suspicious of even Minididi's friends She didn't like her going to movies or mixing with boys And if her niece rebelled, she's shout, "What's the world coming to! This is surely Kalyug! A chit-of-a-girl and she wants to have her own opinions! Hai-hai! Hai-hai!"

Minididi tried to pacify her and said, "Times are changing, Badibua, why don't you understand? And what can I do if Raj Kapoor makes my heart go pitter-patter!"

Badibua stomped into Papaji's study and complained bitterly

In school Minididi was usually quiet, coming into her own when table tennis tournaments were on That's when she suddenly flamed and flowered From an obedient nunny, she transformed into a nimble footed leopardess, thrashing the small ping pong ball across the net with terrific anger It seemed as if she were getting her own back at Badibua Lips pursed, eyes intent, and her two thick braids flying that was Roy's mental snapshot of Minididi playing table tennis

She was district champion and it made Papaji extremely proud In fact, he made sure all the cups and medals she won were regularly polished and prominently displayed in the drawing room No guest could pass the array without Raibahadur Chamanlal holding forth on his only child's tremendous talent Badibua snorted and twisted her lips She's rather have Minididi learn to embroider, knit and cook than get into vulgar shorts and smash plastic balls around But this was one occasion when Papaji paid Badibua little heed The sports authorities hailed his decision and made him Chief Guest, fawning over his brown sahib grandeur

If only he knew what the servants in the locality said about him!

"He's a fraud and that Badibua's a man-eater!" was Janak Thakur's assessment

"He's a weakling!" was Gopal Driver's short and sweet comment

"Saala! b. came shorter and sweeter when it was pronounced by the garlic-smelling and evil Bholelal

Only Maili Ayah knew why Raibahadur Chamanlal's wife went insane and she opened her heart to Kanchiama alone, on their way back from Ramlila

"Can you imagine, Kanchi, he hammered her to insanity! Just because she couldn't mix with the mems and do haa-haa hoo-hoo with their sahibs at the club, he abused and hit her when he came home drunk and that Badibua told him nasty, cooked up stories! Mummyji's a simple soul, Kanchi, I've served her from the day she stepped into the Raibahadur's home but, poor creature, she couldn't read English books and magazines and go tai tai tai with those mem logs And Badibua? Even now she sucks up to her brother's friends because she knows a smattering of the foreign tongue She sucks up to a lot of other things as well!" and dropping her voice in a dramatic whisper, Maili Ayah giggled and continued, "That old, horny witch actually lusts for the Raibahadur! Once I saw her in the library fiddling with his erect lingam! Tobah-tobah! Mummyji wasn't given a moment's peace! Naturally, she took to smoking opium that went to her head!"

Badibua was the bane of Minididi's life but she fell for Roy's charming manners after he brought her Nandgopal a huge bunch of gulmohars stolen from Miss French's garden Placing her index finger on her cheek, she looked at him indulgently and smiled and said, "Take her for walk with you, beta Mini's Senior Cambridge exams are over and she's sitting and twiddling her thumbs Wasting time and getting fat! Make her walk all the way to the baori It will keep her out of mischief If you were ten years older, I'd happily get you married to her That would solve all our problems!"

Roy blushed a beetroot red and hoped against hope that by some miracle of Nandgopal's this fervent wish of Badibua's would come true But that would never happen Minididi had already given her heart away

******

Miss Barucha banged the duster on the teacher's desk and raised a little cloud to command attention

"You, Prithvi Singh, read!"

Prithvi rose to the occasion like a warrior and his neighbour turned the pages of his Reader to find the verse just discussed Fussy Farida tossed back her bobbed curls, frowning, not in the least pleased with Roy who was unable to settle down after the licking that morning She'd have to watch him closely once Short Break was over.

Prithvi read in a brusque monotone:

From the sky the sun benignant
Looked upon them through the branches,
Saying to them, 'O my children,
Love is sunshine, hate is shadow,
Life is checkered shade and sunshine,
Rule by love, O Hiawatha!'

And Roy wondered why love was so cruel ■

March 21—April 20

Two trends operate simultaneously, says Ganesha Buying, selling, wining, dining, entertaining and get-togethers being one Focus on job, and work for the next 20 days being the other Children and studies also play a major role in your life A week when you will have to move fast

December 21—January 19

The moon s last quarter favours unions, partnerships, journeys, including pilgrimages and long-distance connections The loans and funds,trend of the last week,also persist now, therefore there is positive hope for you You do interface with people and get to know your preferences

Aquarius

January 20—February 18

Ganesha says love has you by the throat, money starts to trickle in and it could pour too, your friends work for you and your loved ones prove true Proposal, an offer of marriage comes to the eligible Over the next 23 days loans and funds will be easily available if you are angling for it

February 19—March 20

Attachments and emotional links vie for top priority with hard work and headway, causing a certain tension, but for that very reason making the week mighty exciting There is also a danger of separation or a parting, so play your cards accordingly

BIRTHDAYS

August 20: Moon-sun sextile, Ganesha says, offers avenues of work and play, [illegible]

August 21: Sun-Venus conjunction gives you dramatic flair, a fondness for living it up and more importantly the means to do so.

August 22: Moon-sextile Mercury gives you the innate ability to draw crowds, so please do away with shyness and inhibition. Travel poses hazards.

August 23: Moon-Saturn trine suggests victory after opposition; it would be best to chip away at the obstacles rather than meet them head-on.

August 24: Moon trine Jupiter is a sure-fire indication of success. Matters about children, education, journeys, workplace and engagement are favoured.

August 25: The moon-Pluto square indicates that expert advice must be taken in taking long-term decisions. Get your priorities right.

August 26: The new moon gives you a chance to start afresh and this time you will definitely do better. The trick is to build a strong base.

FLIGHTS OF FANCY

O'Henry, master of the short story, once said that it would be impossible to knock on any door and say to the first person who appeared, "Fly! All has been discovered!" and not get a story

It seemed unlikely that there would be many people with dreadful secrets in the small hill-station where I live but as I had run out of ideas for stories, I decided to take the advice of the master and plucked up enough courage to approach the door of one of the houses at the other end of the hill-station, where I am not known I'm not sure if I expected the occupant to grow pale and tremble with fear when I announced the magic words, but the outcome was certainly interesting

I knocked vigorously on the door and when it opened cried, "Fly! All has been discovered!"

"A fly, am I?" said the impressive, ample-bosomed woman in her 40s "And what may I ask are you?"

"I don't mean you," I said apologetically, "I mean fly "

"That's what I thought you meant "

"No, I mean fly, all has been discovered "

"You're selling something to catch flies?"

"No, I was just trying to test "

"Well, you can't test the stuff here young man We don't have flies anyway "

And the door was banged in my face I felt like the salesman who had neglected to read his Dale Carnegie or Napolean Hill, but not to be discouraged, I went to the next house and knocked on the door It was opened by a little girl who was sucking a large lollipop

"Fly!" I said hopefully, "All has been discovered!"

"Who told you?" she asked "Never mind who told me," I said, "But they all know "

"I only took one "

"Ah!"

'A fly, am I?' said the impressive, ample-bosomed woman in her 40s. 'And what may I ask are you?' 'I don't mean you,' I said apologetically, 'I mean fly.' 'That's what I thought you meant.' 'No, I mean fly, all has been discovered'

'Fly!' I said hopefully, 'All has been discovered!'
'Who told you?' she asked.
'Never mind who told me,' I said,
'But they all know.'
'I only took one.'
'Ah!'
'What use are lollipops if they are just going to lie in a cupboard?'

"What use are lollipops if they are ust going to lie in a cupboard?"

"None at all," I said, "I am fully in agreement with you Lollipops have ust one purpose and you are helping o fulfil it Furthermore, if it was not or little girls like you, the thousands of people who make lollipops would ave no jobs and nothing at all to eat"

And on that Keynesian note, made ny departure

At the third house, I was set upon by large dog of indeterminate breed nd beat a hasty retreat The fourth ouse was deserted

I knocked at the door of the fifth ouse and as the door opened, whispe- d mysteriously, "Fly! All has been iscovered!"

An old lady, a veteran from the days f the British Raj, cupped her hand to er ear and leaned forward, "I'm orry, my dear, but I don't hear very well What was it you said?"

"I said fly! All has been discovered!"

"You'll have to speak louder dear"

"Fly!" I shouted, "All has been discovered!"

"Oh, Mrs Fry No, she hasn't come back yet Did you say her shawl had been recovered?"

"That's right," I said wearily, "I'll bring it back someday"

To get to the next house, I had to pass through an orchard of apple trees I had not gone far when I saw a man on the steps, shouting and brandishing a stick A youth came running through the trees, apples falling from his pockets He must have mistaken me for another poacher because, as he ran past me, he thrust several apples into my hands and cried, "Fly! All has been discovered!"

As the owner of the orchard was now close on our heels, I fled

WILDE, YEATS AND GUINNESS STOUT

For all the modern inconveniences of the cities, my heart lies in the wild and green places of the world So I leapt at the chance to cross the sea to the Irish county of Donegal whose craggy coast faces the northern Atlantic

The ferry we chose crossed from Stranraer on the Scottish coast to Larne in northern Ireland To catch it we drove north through England, up a motorway clogged by roadworks — as motorways often are — to the small town of Congleton Here we B&B-ed (bed and breakfasted) in a farm belonging to the Hollinsheads who took in guests to supplement their income from home-cured bacon and bee-keeping

Mr Hollinshead was proud of his bees He fed us honey and told us that every year he imported queen bees from New Zealand and mail-ordered them all over England

England is longer than it looks and so we set off early the next morning, passing the Lake District to our left and crossing the Scottish border close to Gretna to where, in former days, young English lovers eloped to wed

We were well in time for the ferry and had plenty of opportunity to complain about the exorbitant fares Stena Sealink, a privatised arm of British Rail, was asking The gulls followed the ferry out to sea and I tossed sausages to them for the pleasure of seeing them hovering over us to catch them

We landed at Larne and drove off It was early evening but this was summer and it wouldn't get dark until well into what should be night What made northern Ireland different was that suddenly there were no B&B signs No one came here for a holiday

The town of Dungiven in particular testified to the damage caused by the many years of 'troubles' between Catholic Republicans and Protestant Unionists The police station was designed to withstand militant attacks It consisted of walls of yellow armour plating, with a look-out post whose windows were covered with thick metal bars One in every three shops in the high street had windows broken and doors boarded up

A group of skinheaded youths idled on a pavement We drove on past lamp posts painted in the colours of the Irish Republic's tricolour and signposts to the town of Londonderry where the 'London' had been obliterated by black paint

It was getting late Beyond the city of Londonderry, we passed an unmanned, electronically monitored border crossing and were in another country where B&Bs miraculously reappeared

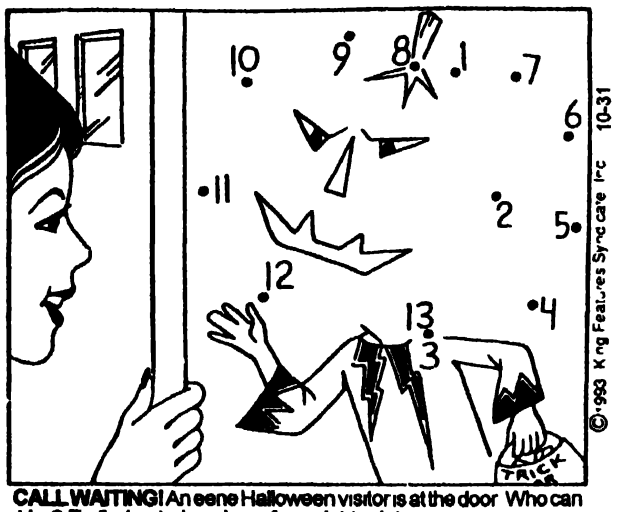
The next morning we arrived in the tiny village of Downings, on a narrow peninsula jutting into the Atlantic There is no green more deeply brilliant than that of the rolling hills of Ireland Innumerable purple orchids dot the bogs The fragrant sheep-grazed pastures are full of uncounted tiny flowers and the hedgerows of wild roses, honeysuckle and deep red fuchsia The tall crags above the shore are deep grey, and the sea gin-clear and intensely blue

The wind is so strong you can lean into it and not fall, and so cold that in our little modern cottage we kept a peat fire burning

The centre of social life is the pub, because alcoholic beverage, particularly Guinness stout, is not abhorred but revelled in We based ourselves in the Downings Bar, whose walls were decorated with portraits of the great Irish literary men like Wilde, Yeats and Joyce, and of sepia photographs of the village in the days of sail when women salted herrings and packed them tight into wooden barrels

In one corner sat the older people, who spoke mainly in the Gaelic language By half past nine the place would fill up with younger locals and tourists, many of them Catholics from Ulster, and every night there was a regular party going on, with young children running all over the place At about 11 the live music started, and we could never stay awake long enough to see closing time

There I met a school teacher from Newry in Northern Island, who told me how if they wanted the children to play soccer — considered an English and therefore hated game — they had to do so in secret Only Gaelic games were allowed in school But he also said how much more relaxed life had been since the peace process started and, although he suspected that both Sinn Fein and the Unionists were looking for the opportunity to appear martyrs, the common man wanted peace



He rose to get in another round Wrapped in the comfortable pub atmosphere in a land where people love to lie in bed until late in the morning, the enmities between Irishmen seemed distant But even in idyllic Donegal they were not, as was shown by the posters stuck to wayside trees and reading "Peace Through British Withdrawl"

HEART TO HEART

Remember the Hot Shot girl? Although never in the league of top models, Rhea Pillai was on the upswing. And now she is in focus as Sunjay Dutt's steadfast girlfriend who has been with him 'through thick and thin' despite her own failing health

Rhea Pillai khataak-ed her way into modelling with the Hot Shot ad in 1983. It was a time when the Madhu Sapres and the Sheetal Mallars, with their tall, sultry, international looks, would never have fitted into the Indian stereotype of beauty

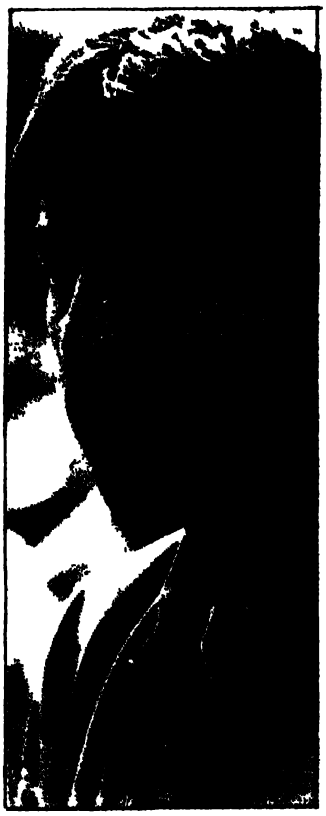
But Rhea, with her soft, pretty, very Indian face clicked perfectly despite her not-so-impressive height

Until a few months ago, Rhea's life was as uneventful as a model's can get. Brought up for the most part in Bombay, she did her schooling in Ooty and later graduated in economics from St Xavier's College before following in the footsteps of cousin Sabita Dhanranjgir (remember the Cuticura girl and beauty contestant?) to become a model

She has since been in several prestigious campaigns, including Lakme, Bombay Dyeing, Moody Blues, Tips and Toes, and more recently, Officer's Choice and Nycil talc where she pirouettes her way gracefully into the male model's heart

But despite these campaigns and 12 long years in the profession, Rhea has never been a top-of-the-rung model and her most famous face to date has been that of jailed star Sunjay Dutt's girlfriend

Recently, she was in focus also because she had to be hospitalised following a heart ailment and her famous star-boyfriend was allowed to visit her for a princely four hours



Rhea's supportive role in the Sunjay episode has won her the sympathy and admiration of those in her profession and outside While filmstar Madhuri Dixit, with whom Sunjay was going steady before he was put behind bars on the charge of possessing an unlicensed AK-57, calculatedly disowned him after his arrest

Rhea, whom he is said to have met at lawyer Ram Jethmalani's office, after his arrest for the first time and subsequent release, has "stood by me like a rock, through thick and thin," in the filmstar's own words.

She has indeed. After Sunjay's visit, she described the day as "the happiest and the saddest in the past one year I wanted to run to him and hug him and tell him it was over but I could not run as my heart hurts in more ways than one " she said

She has been recuperating at the home of Kajal Anand, a close friend and one of Sunjay's lawyers, at Churchgate in Bombay

She plans to continue with her career in modelling once she is well again, but "everything is in a limbo for her right now," says Kajal Anand.

Rashbehari Das

One of the reasons why Rhea has not really made a splash in the profession is, perhaps, her lack of ambition "It often happens that there is a lull in the career of a model and then suddenly there's work again," exlains model Queenie Singh, a close friend of Rhea's for the past five years

But she also has no interests apart from modelling unlike other models who sagely make time for other business interests as modelling cannot be a lifelong profession. "She did plan on opening a restaurant once but it didn't materialise," says Kajal

Rhea herself is not talking The lawyer-friend explains "She is not speaking to the press right now; not even for profiles "

But close friends insist that this behaviour is nothing new nor a fallout of the Sunjay episode. "Rhea is a very private person by nature," reveals model coordinator Sangeeta Chopra who has done a few shows with her "She's very good professionally, very no-nonsense and very beautiful, but she is not very tall and hence does not do too many shows. In fact, she has been more of a friend than a professional in the past seven years that I have known her "

Fellow models, too, are uncharacteristically complimentary when it comes to Rhea. Top model Meghana Reddy, who has done a few shows with her, describes her as a "very sweet and helpful person, a doll."

Queenie, who is one of Rhea's close friends and who has known her for at least five years, says quite matter-of-factly: "She has no negative traits; she wouldn't be my friend otherwise "

Bubbles and Balloons

When I strolled through
The tall, talking trees of Versailles,
Saw through their vibrant hair

The glint of the Hall of Mirrors,
Looking through the looking glass
At the clinking iron, the broken porcelain
Quaking at the sudden onslaught,
Could almost see the tremble of
The treaty of truce to end the endless
Ravage and resurgence of Fascism

I could have well looked back
To laugh at the Irony of the Imperial
As much the same way as I had Tossed an useless coin at
The defunct Mahal at Agra
With reams of history, realms of gory glory —

In the past had demolished
The Bastille and now the Kremlin,
Berlin and other enclaves and citadels
Of brilliance going to nought
I stop to ask myself of Swaraj,
Of Hindutva, righteousness, recalcitrance:

Was I right in smiling at Versailles bursting with the Euphoria of bubbles and balloons?

The Song of the S.U.L.F.A.

I was born from the drops of martyrs' blood that splashed across the valleys in '81.
Nurtured by your emotions
I grew my roots into you
I came out from the forests and told you I'd free you
Yes, I was made into what I am, by your hopes.

Once when I was a child
you encouraged me,
you made me a hero
I said that I'd give you all that you fought for and died for.

Now he who rules me —
the Spider sits in his throne on the hill
He directs me
from the middle of his web.
Him the Saviour
The Almighty

Blame Him
the one who sacrificed his own brother to rule you today
He merely used me
to build his deadly web
The diseased one
The dirty one.

A Steely Silence Fills the Air

A steely silence fills the air
Big steel locks gag shops
The roads are deathly quiet,
Only flies dare buzz over a garbage pile
And men in steel helmets,
Stalk the streets with steel barrelled guns
On streets once bustling with life,
Life, life, life .
Now,
A deathly steely silence fills the air

A little hand pulls me by the night-suit,
The little lips move
'Why are the streets so empty?'
'Why.. why can't I go out to play?'
'Why is the toffee shop closed?'
'Why do those people have guns?'
Because it is a curfew, I reply.
'What is a carfeed?'
Not carfeed . curfew,
Curfew is like a bandh.
'What is a bandh?'
A bandh is like a curfew.
'Why is there a bandh or a carfeed?'
Not carfeed. .curfew!
Well, people can't live with each other.
'Why can't people live with each other?'
Because...because they will not live with each other.
'Why?'
Because.. well. .uh. .

A steely silence fills the air

Judge Dredd. It is fun to watch Sly Stallone in action again! After his pathetic attempt at comedy (remember him desperately trying to be cute and funny in Stop! Or My Mom Will Shoot?), he is back with a vengeance The stupendous success of Cliffhanger and Demolition Man leaves him with no choice but to revert to the action onslaught

He pops up straight out of a cartoon strip (the film is an adaptation of the comic-book series) and looks great in his robocop-like getup In a putrid world of evil and crime, where the judge serves as policeman jury, and executioner all packed into one, Stallone fights corruption among the judges in Mega-City One, armed with a ton of explosives.

Pert and glib with Schwarzenegger-like one-liners, Sly steals the show and wins the game, of course. Also co-starring Armand Assante, Diane Lane, and Max von Sydow. Directed by Danny Cannon.

FASHION

Dressing down. That seems to be the key word in the corporate fashion circles now. Corporate climbers in the monotony of stripes, checks, dour looking plains, standardised ties and uncomfortable suits have often felt the need to break free from this bondage.

With Madura Garments-Allen Solly introducing the concept of Friday Dressing in India the corporate dress dilemma seems to have ended The concept is fast gaining currency with the urban, style-conscious work force in India, too

The Friday Dressing concept first emerged from California's Silicon Valley and drifted through corporate America In its initial form, it was merely a way of dressing down on Fridays — the weekend for the five-day American week But now it has become a fashion statement of sorts throughout the week in companies like IBM, Microsoft, Chase Manhattan, General Motors and American Express

The HRD at major companies world over have realised that breaking the monotonous company dress code is an important factor in enhancing individual performance And what can be better than (see picture) a washed cotton shirt (Rs 595), soft-finish cotton trousers (Rs 565) and Chamoise silk tie (Rs 595) to start with?

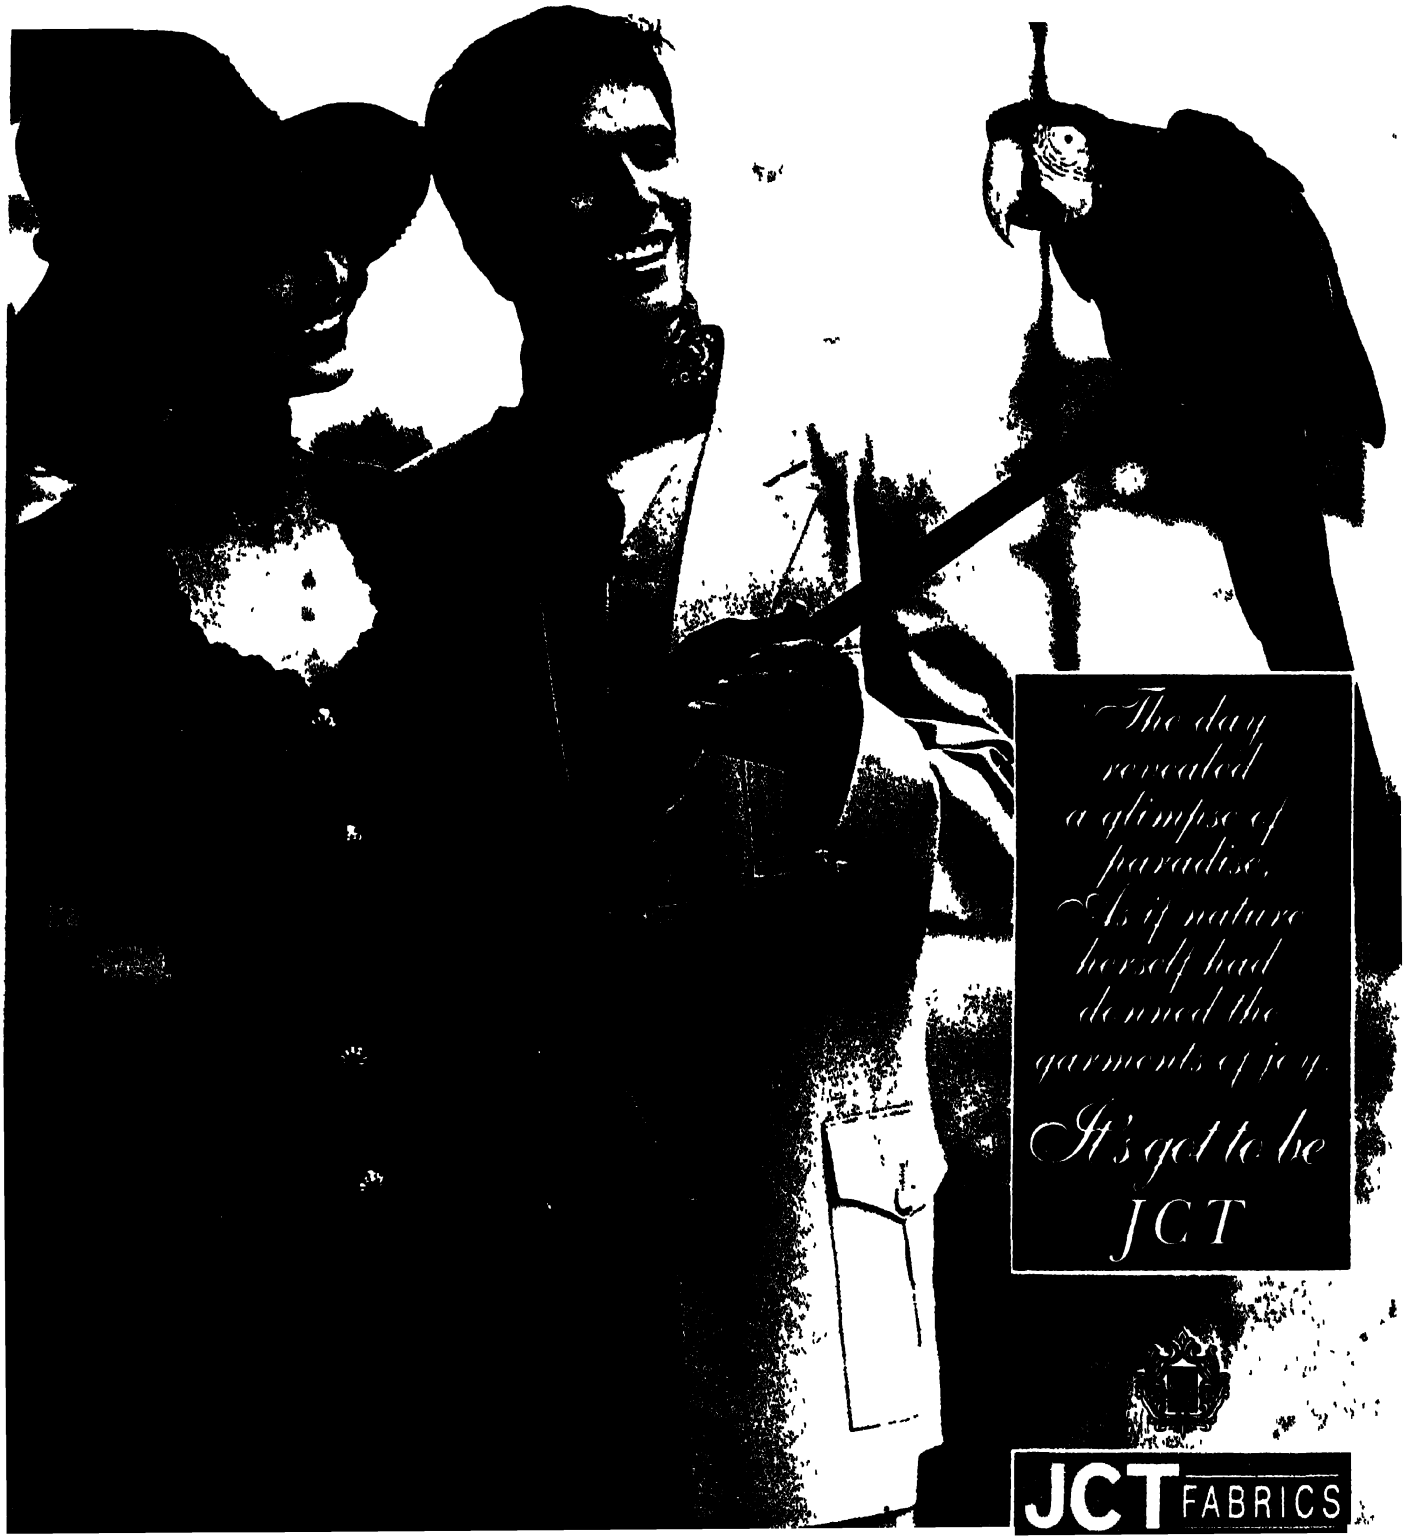
What is your idea of perfect happiness?
To see the communal forces defeated.
What is your greatest fear?
I am not afraid of anything.
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
There have been too many influences. But Ram Mohan Lohia was the strongest of them all.
What do you dislike most in others?
Falsehood. Even people at the top indulge in this, and this creates trouble.
What is your most precious possession?
People's love.
What objects do you always carry?
Water bottles only.
What makes you most depressed?
Poor people's faltering steps as a result of weakness and atrocities committed on them.
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
Too many things. I cannot go into details.
What is your favourite word?
I choose the words as the occasions arise.
What is your favourite journey?
Driving deep into rural areas. It's always a refreshing journey.
What is your nightmare?
To see communal forces succeeding in their design. However, this is not possible now.
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
It is difficult to say.
What is your source of sustenance?
People's power which carries me through, all the time.
On what occasions do you lie?

What objects do you always carry?

Water bottles only

What is your favourite journey?

Driving deep into rural areas. It's always a refreshing journey



I never lie despite the fact that I suffered because of that.
What is your greatest regret?
That in my 28-year political career I found political parties are bereft of principles and a consistent ideology.
What has been your happiest moment?
Meeting old friends.
What brings tears to your eyes?
I always try to hold back tears. But on rare occasions they do come out.
How do you relax?
By sleeping.
What do you envy most in others?
Nothing.
How would you like to be remembered?
As a man who consolidated poor, people's power and rendered service to society.
How would you like to die?
I have never given it a thought because death is so unpredictable.

COVER STORY

THE tingle FACTOR

Is he British? Is he Indian? He is Anish Kapoor! Suman Buchar profiles the Bombay-born, London-based sculptor who stands like a superman in contemporary modern art, but is yet to gain recognition in the country of his birth

THE SCULPTOR, ANISH KAPOOR, WAS ASKED IN A RECent interview: "How do you react to critics who say your use of pigmentation is quintessentially Indian?"

His reaction was a succinct: "Bollocks!"

But this is the question that Bombay-born Kapoor has been repeatedly asked — is he British or is he Indian?

There is a consensus, however, that he is one of the most gifted artists working in Britain.

His reply is: "If what comes out of my hands is Indian, well, so be it. And if it isn't, well, it isn't."

He adds: "In the end, to an educated kind of cultural understanding it really is not the point. The point is, how is my engagement with the work."

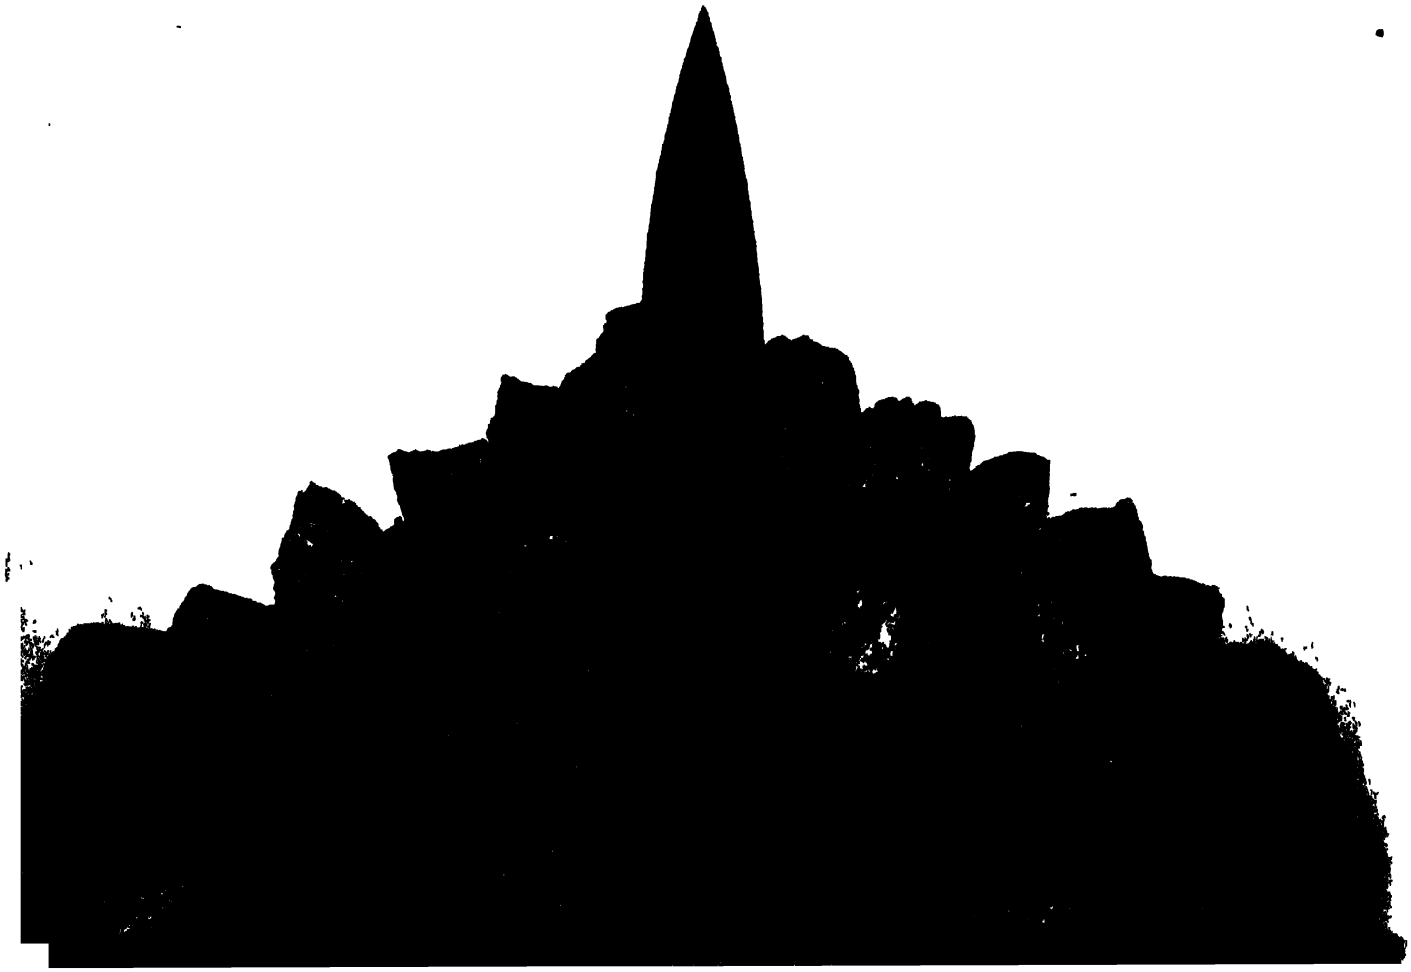
Kapoor has been one of the big names in British sculpture ever since he represented Britain at the Venice Biennale in 1990. This forum began in 1895 and is now regarded as the most important regular world event in contemporary art. Kapoor established his reputation at the top of the tree by winning the 1991 Turner Prize which is awarded annually to the best British artist under 50. It was worth £20,000.

"Kapoor had no real competitors," declared The Daily Telegraph's art correspondent, Richard Dorment. "He is in a different league from the other candidates. His is an art of much more intellectual substance and moral weight."

Describing the untitled winning entry, the critic wrote: "Kapoor has hewn a great bulbous vessel out of pinkish grey sandstone, excavated at the centre so that the exterior is a shell, then dyed the interior with deep and fathomless blue."

Kapoor, 41, was born of an Indian father and an Iraqi-Jewish mother. He grew up in Dehradun where his father worked as a hydrographer. At 17, he went to Israel to study electronics, but gave this up after six months and spent two years in a kibbutz.

"They gave me a studio and I painted lots of horrible quasi-surrealist paintings," he recalls.



In 1973 he decided to go to London to train as an artist and has lived in Britain ever since. He attended the Hornsey College of Art for four years where he trained within the modernist tradition of art. This was followed by a two-year spell at the Chelsea School of Art.

He taught next at Wolverhampton Polytechnic and then became artist in residence at the Walker Art Gallery,

Untitled, 1995 (gourds, acrylic medium and pigment)

Black Fire, 1990 (fibreglass, pigment and anthracite)

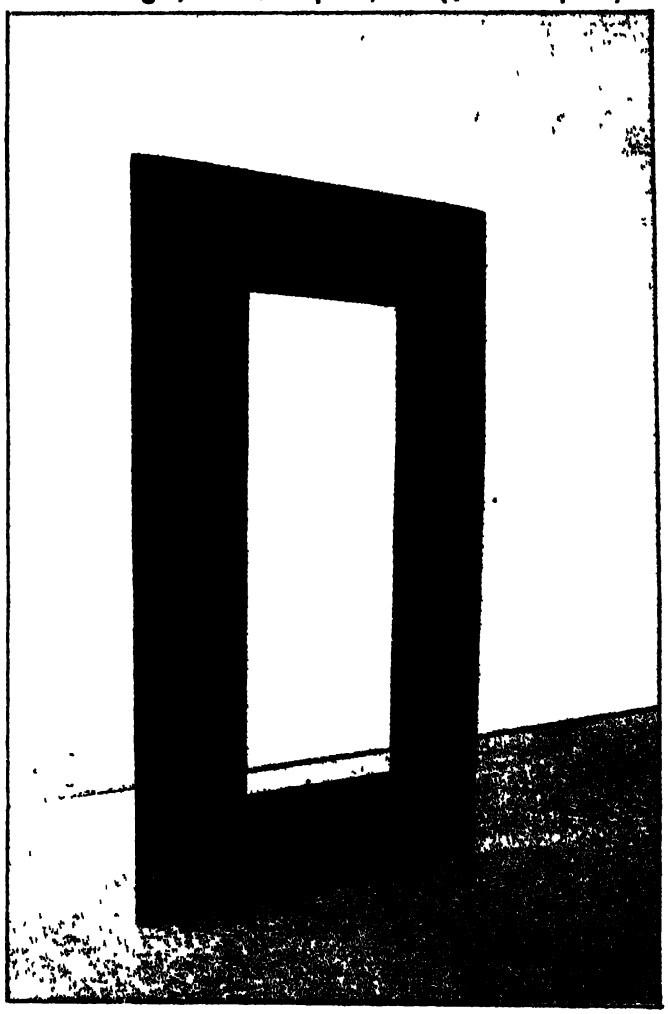
Liverpool. He has been working in London since 1982.

In 1981 he came to the attention of Nicholas Logsdail who founded the Lisson Gallery, a nurturing ground for contemporary artists. Logsdail was impressed with Kapoor "It was clear to me from the first encounter that there was a big idea to his work It managed to unify Eastern religious, spiritually based ideas with Western modernism in a way that didn't give you an awkward feeling in the pit of your stomach There was something right about how he solved these problems "

Oblivion, 1994 (sandstone)

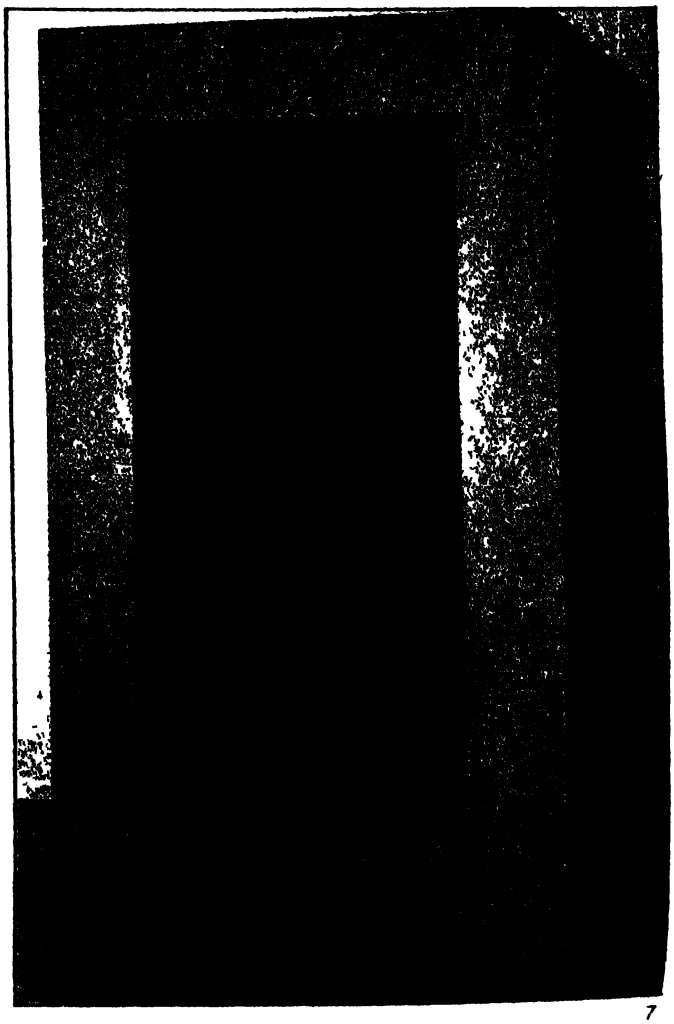
Kapoor made his debut in 1982 at the Venice Biennale with other young artists under the banner of 'New British Sculpture' He has been prolific since then and his work has been shown, either as one-man or group exhibitions, in London, New York, Tokyo, Paris, Amsterdam, Athens, Sao Paolo, Chicago, Helsinki, Frankfurt, Stockholm, Toronto, Madrid and other Western cities But he has not exhibited in India

Although he is seen as a young artist who has only been around since 1982, he has made an impact Today, his sculptures fetch anything between £2,000 and £150,000

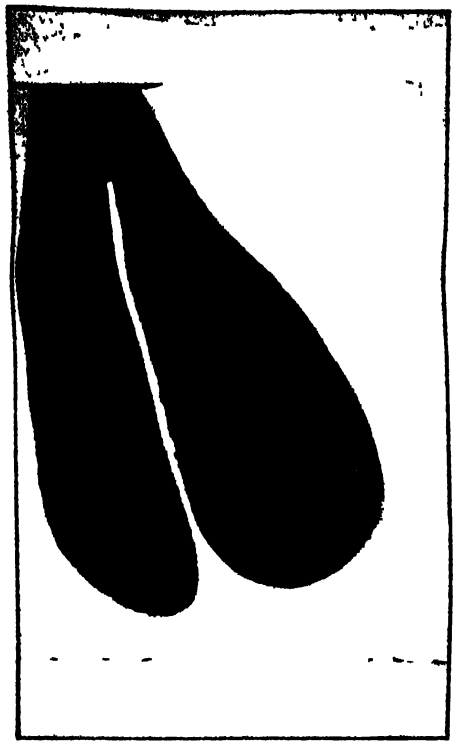


He has also sporadically produced drawings Cheyenne WestPhall, the deputy director of contemporary art at Sotheby's in London, says the auction house has sold Kapoor's water colours for between £800 and £1,500

Critics say that if he wants to be recognised in India, he has to exhibit in the country of his birth At his studio in Camberwell, south London, which is spacious enough to accommodate giant pieces of stone, he is currently creating new work for exhibitions later this year in Japan, Brazil and Italy



Kapoor has confounded the arts establishment which sees him as a British artist, but has to cope with the fact that he is neither White nor British-born His own view is "I am Indian, but to see everything in terms of nationality is limiting I don't see myself as an Indian artist, nor do I see myself as a British artist I am an artist who works in Britain The work has to be looked at from as wide a base as possible "



He has been reluctant to be grouped with other Third World artists "I inhabit the space I inhabit I have always resisted taking part in shows that are to do with the 'Third' whatever What I am interested in is in what art can do and what I can do as an artist. That may be politically naive, but that just states things in a slightly different way and leaves more questions unanswered than it does provide answers "

Untitled, 1992 (wood, fibreglass and pigment)

Untitled, 1989 (ink and pencil on paper)

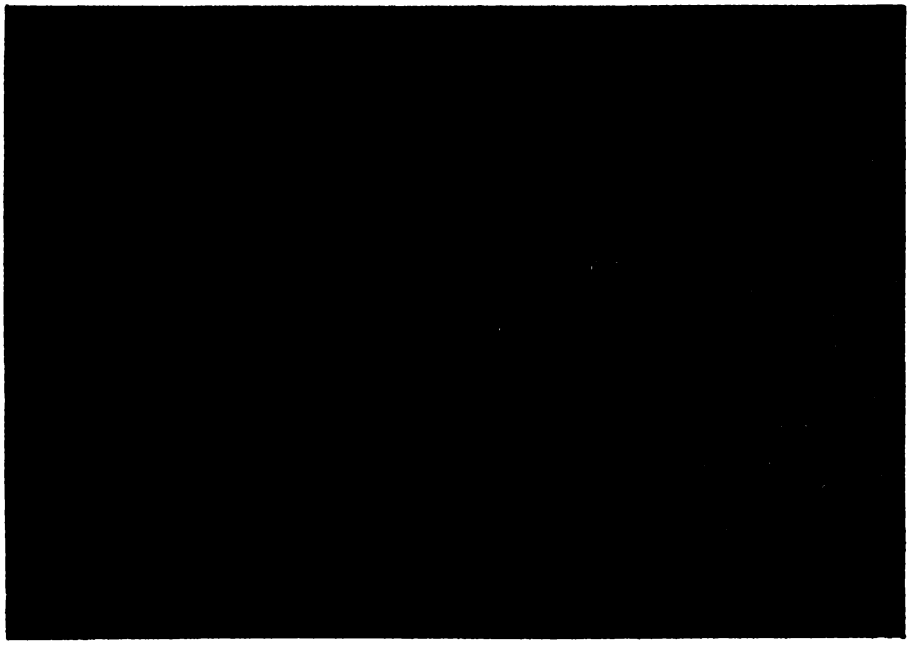
However, anyone who looks at his art cannot fail to be struck by the Indian influences For example, Richard Dorment has noted "He works with pure powdered pigments associated in my mind with those solid neat conical piles in Indian street markets for use as dyes and as cosmetics "

Dorment also added "Kapoor is a Western artist India or Indianness is not his subject and yet his exotic sculpted mounds and pyramids are full of disturbing allusions to sexuality and cruelty which echo those found in the Hindu visual tradition It is this that makes his art look like no one else's Intense colours have become Kapoor's trademark "



In Kapoor's work, red symbolises the sign of the body, blood, birth, death and life Yellow is the passionate and expressive element of red White is for purity and chastity And finally, blue represents the spiritual and transcendental element He appreciates that in Hindu iconography, the bodies of Kali and Krishna are blue, and Shiva's throat turns blue when he drinks poison to save the world

The two most important influences in his work are Indian philosophy and psychoanalysis He is preoccupied with communion with the Sublime "What I am trying to do is to make a picture of the interior — the interior of me " He goes on "I am interested in what a contemporary attitude can be towards the Sublime I am interested in art that has a relationship with the body which is direct and passionate That is why I think over the years I have worked towards phenomenological presences that are tactile in terms of their emotional sense and immediate "

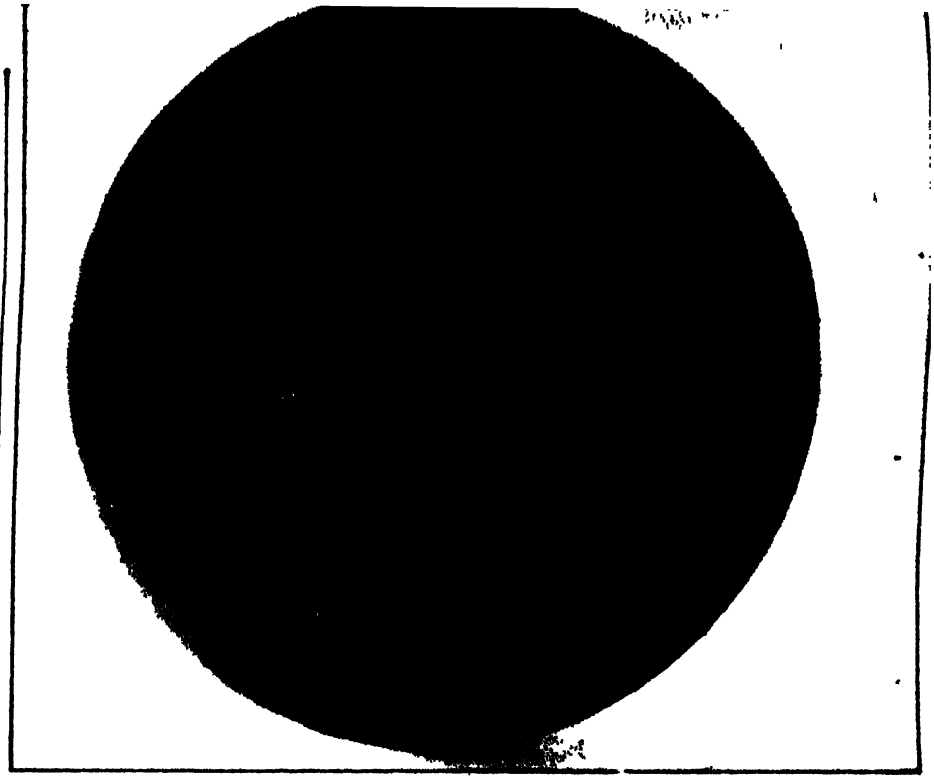
Untitled, 1989 (gouache and pigment on paper)

On the face of it, his sculptures look like large blocks of rock with holes drilled into them or semi-circular shapes in deep colours.... Says Nima Poovaya-Smith, keeper of arts at Bradford Arts Museums and Libraries: 'There is a sense of something exciting happening. I know what the tingle factor means'



The recurring motifs in his work are void, mountain, vessel, tree, fire and water

He admits that he is driven by the desire to be in touch with the feminine aspect of his character "Much of the imagery I have been involved with is feminine As an artist I understand that the creative part of my being is feminine The earlier powder works — White Sand, Red Millet, Many Flowers and To Reflect an Intimate Part of the Red — are concerned with the origin of the feminine It is as if I was discovering the feminine in myself. I have acknowledged this as a reality, and that allows me to deal with other things. I find that quite a freedom."

His representative at the Lisson Gallery, Pilar Corrias, says: "Anish approaches very difficult subjects which have been looked over and over again in the history of art — the idea of spirituality, sublime and the feminine It is hard for an artist to avoid cliches when you are approaching a subject that has been used so much But he has found a completely new way of working "

On the face of it, his sculptures look like large blocks of rock with holes drilled into them or semi-circular shapes in deep colours Nima Poovaya-Smith, keeper of arts at Bradford Arts Museums and Libraries, has one of Kapoor's paintings in her collection and would commission him if she

Why is that people are willing to pay hundreds of thousands of pounds for sculpture?

David Vallance, managing director of the Morris Singer Foundry, the oldest in Britain, provides a philosophical explanation. He says, "Sculptures symbolise the ideals of nations. The aspirations to heroism, the denunciation of war, the tribute to suffering, the memories of tragedies that must not be repeated and the hope for peace that must become the unifying link between communities throughout the world."

But pure art is today allied with the needs of capitalism. Anish Kapoor, for example, works to very large scale. He creates pieces of art which are then shipped for exhibition in galleries or museums simply because he is a big name. But he is also commissioned by clients and in recent years they have included the Hayward Arts Projects Trustees and the Lisson Movement in [illegible]

In the past couple of decades, pieces of sculpture have been acquired by local authorities, big companies and a few private collectors. One of the best places to judge how the sculpture market is performing is the Foundry in Basingstoke, Hampshire, 50 miles from London. When the Foundry is busy, it means the sculptors have plenty of work.

Vallance says, "The Eighties was the boom time. It's quiet now because of the recession."

Today the driving force in the market are the big companies which commission works of art for their corporate headquarters. Companies which have ordered sculptures include Reebok, the sports group, McDonald's, the fast food chain, British Airways, P&O, the shipping line, and the Koyal Bank of Scotland.

Usually, the client briefs the sculptor on what is required. Small scale models are produced and cleared before the final version is made. Vallance explains, "Where architects can design a building, a complex, even city, it is the presence of the sculpture within the confines of that edifice that links its style and statement to the people who inhabit it. The sculpture is the finishing touch, the artistic feature that humanises the surrounding."

A sense of history clings to the Morris Singer Foundry which was founded in 1848 and where the majority of statues of any consequence of display in Britain have been passed. The great sculptors — Jacob Epstein, Barbara Hepworth and Henry Moore — had their bronzes cast at the Foundry.

Boadicea which is positioned outside the houses of Parliament emerged from the Foundry as did Lady Godiva which is now in the Coventry.

One of the most recent pieces cast was a giant statue of Sir Isaac Newton executed by Sir Eduardo Paolozzi for the British Library in London. The Foundry recently completed an unusual commission — a statue of Buddha for a meditation centre in Cumbria

"One of the most satisfying aspects of sculpture," Vallance emphasises, "is that people can touch it."

could afford the expense

"His work is beautiful," she says "There is a sense of something exciting happening I know what the tingle factor means"

She finds "a primordial visual truth in his shapes" "They are very contemplative objects which allude to the arcane mysteries of life You need to pause and think when you look at his work"

Poovaya-Smith was instrumental in persuading Leeds University to confer a honorary degree on Kapoor for his contribution to the arts "He brought a level of colour and texture into sculpture"

His work has been acquired by more than 20 major museums and galleries all over the world — from the Tate, London, to the Museum of Modern Art, New York, the Art Galle-

HIS ART, THEIR VIEW

What do Indian sculptors think of Anish Kapoor?

M.F. Husain: He is a good sculptor and no matter where he works — in which country — he will always remain one.

But it is not true that he commands the highest price among Indian artists. I can't say who does, but so far as Anish Kapoor is concerned, he does not command the highest price.

But price again is no criterion to judge him because 99 per cent of the art that gets sold today is non-art. All I can say is that Kapoor is a good artist.

Chintamoni Kar: Truly speaking, I am not familiar with his works I know very little about him. I have heard that he has earned great name and fame abroad. But I did not have the good fortune to view any of his creations.

Only once, I remember, I saw a picture of one of his sculptures showing a pyramid-like structure with lots of red colour dripping from it That's all. So, I really would not be in a position to talk about him.

Frankly speaking, I belong to the last century and I don't wish to make an inroad into this century. Perhaps, I sound like Henry Moore with whom I often had long discussions on a whole gamut of subjects. But I do not understand many things of this century. I am too aged. Why do you ask me about Anish Kapoor? Contemporary modern men of arts would be in a better position to talk about him

Manu Parekh: The moment I hear Anish's name, it creates a very positive reaction in my mind because at a very young age, he has created a niche for himself in the international market. That is very encouraging for us all

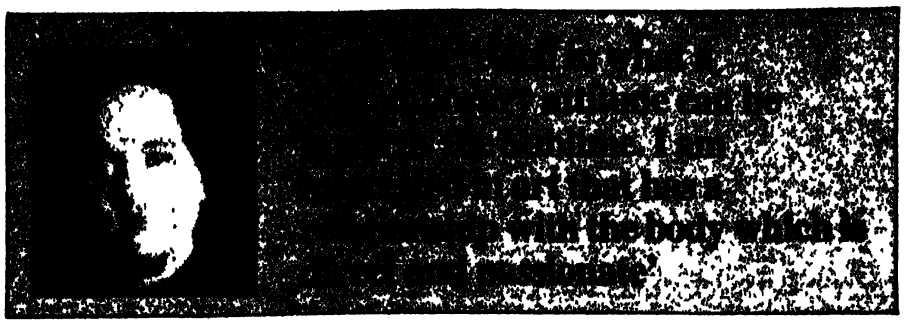
I think it is time now for Indian artists and sculptors to establish an identity on the international scene.

What is commendable about him is that he has handled and merged both his international sensibility and his love for his roots very intelligently.

This, to my mind, is the secret of his success. Also, there is a lot of freedom of language, material, conceptual thinking and emotional reaction to one's work these days. Anish, I feel, has used this freedom very powerfully

Rimzon: Anish is basically an Indian who has been associated with the new generation of the British art scene. So, while his contemporaries like Tony Cragg, Will Woodrow and Anthony Gromely, have used found objects (reject material) in their works, Anish has used rangoli powder to create a psychedelic effect in his works.

In fact, one can experience metaphysics in his works because of the effect he is able to create with these powder pigments. He has used this colour pigment to give a spiritual language to his works and create tantrik images that evoke tremendous feelings and experience.



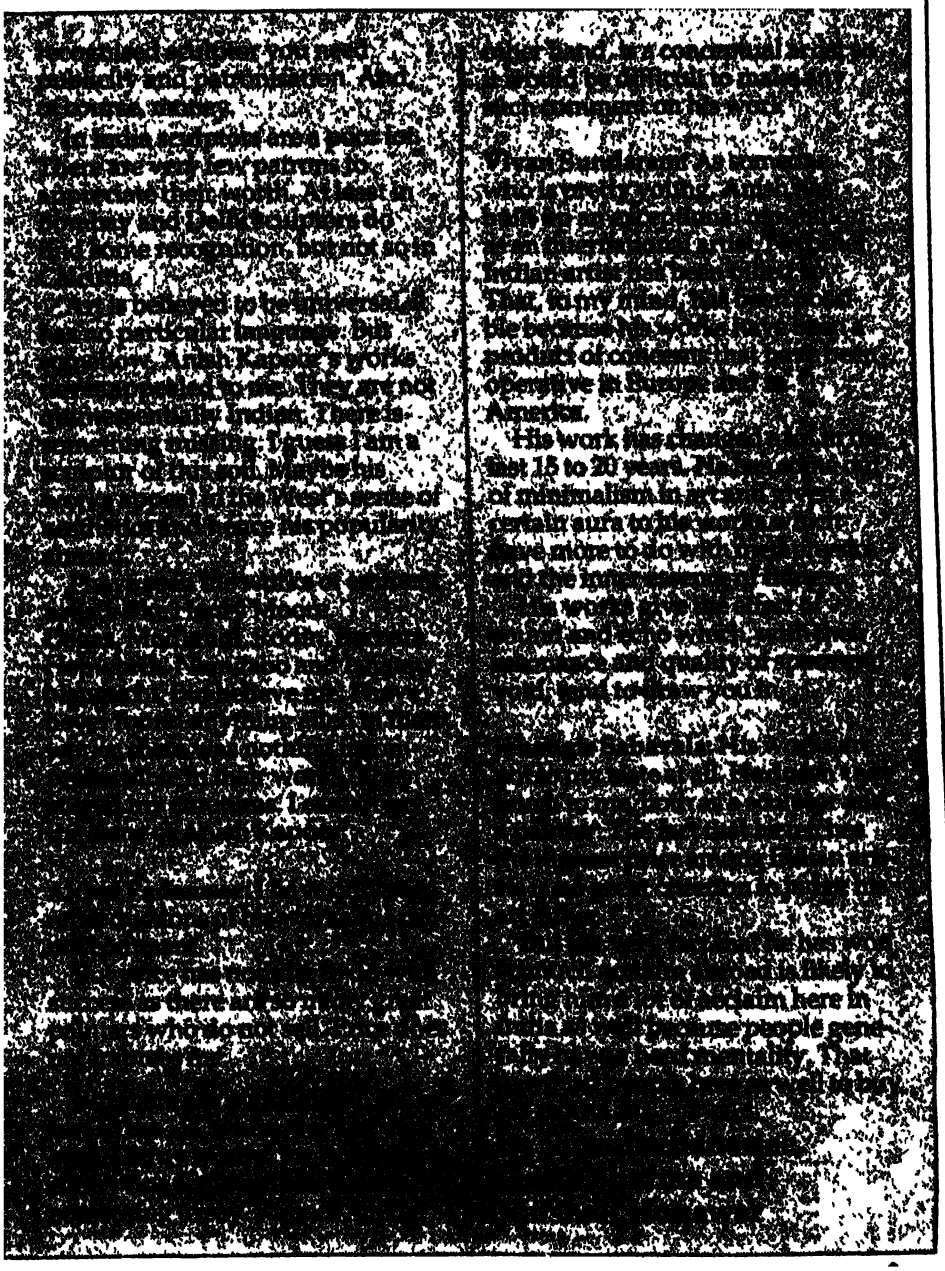
In one sentence it can be said he has merged Indian philosophy and culture with Western concepts in the British art scene to create a contemporary language of art.

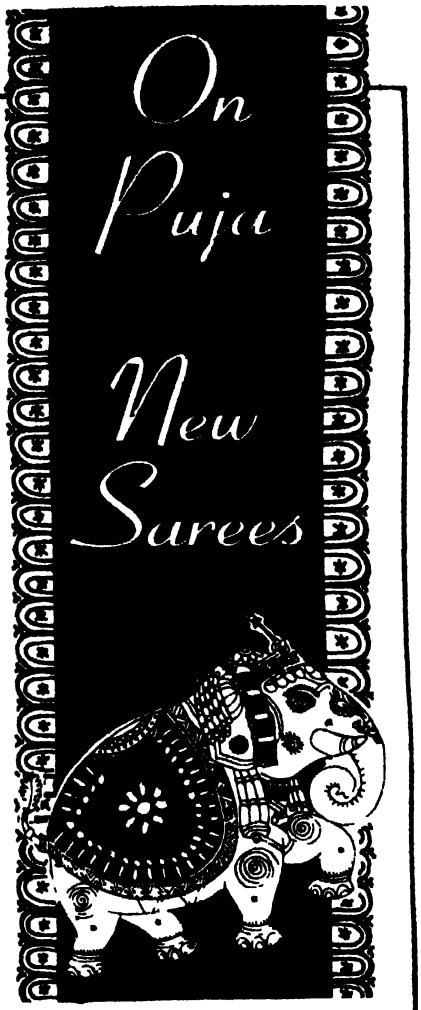
Biman Das: I have heard that he is a London-based sculptor, well-established in the British art scene, but I am not familiar with his works. It is only natural because he holds all his shows abroad. How many exhibitions has he held in India? And how many Indians are familiar with his works?

Sometime back when I was in Delhi I happened to see one of his group shows. From what I can recall he has a penchant for using deep, artificial hues. All his figures (I remember there was a snail) are abstract, three-dimensional.

I have just seen one exhibition of his. So I cannot really say much about him. I have heard the British Council has greatly patronised him.

You see, to be an internationally





ry of New South Wales, Sydney, the Tel Aviv Museum of Art, and the Hara Museum of Contemporary Art, Tokyo Indian galleries are conspicuous by their absence

His work has also been bought by private collectors whose identities remain secret It is unlikely that he has acquired an Indian clientele. So far, anyway

The most important recent event in his life was the birth of his daughter, Abha, to his German-born wife. He went round telling his friends "We are pregnant"

It remains to be seen how being a father will affect his work Perhaps, the void will be filled

Marjeena, the orphan from Howrah Station, not only found a home and a family but also got to meet President Bill Clinton. Trina Mukherjee recounts a life which reads like a fairytale

This is the story of a little girl, Marjeena Once upon a time Yes, one is tempted to add a chimerical hue or a fairy-tale gloss to this simple tale of love, hope and acceptance

Marjeena's story began at Ashirwad, a cosy home for enfants perdus and abandoned children Tucked away in a corner near Park Circus in Calcutta, this cosy apartment shelters several little souls

The sudden visitor is greeted with a loud blast of music, somersaulting toddlers and lusty bawlers — all part of the Ashirwad family Tiny national flags fluttered on the ceiling and Micky and Donald peered at all from the walls A sharp tug at one's handbag and a tentative touch spoke volumes than a formal handshake

Some of the inmates were normal infants, a few suffered from some kind of congenital defect or expressed autistic inclination But all shouted and played on The problem of being provided with a family, education or treatment is not their headache, but that of their maashis who look after them Marjeena was one of them

But let us regress further into the chrysalis of the past and catch up with Marjeena romping down the grimy platforms of Howrah Station with her urchin companions Marjeena spent the first few years of her life here

The social worker from Bangalore who found her there, described her as a scruffish looking child who was mistaken for a boy and sent to the boys dormitory Only after she was given a "good bath" that they realised their mistake

She was slightly built and looked like a four-year-old, but was older

Mused Swaran Chaudhry, secretary, Society for Indian Children's Welfare (SICW), "It is very strange, call it for-

tuitous, call it Divine Ordinance — we find a certain child or a baby and may just miss another forlorn creature lying helplessly, a few yards away, beside a refuse dump "

We wondered about it as Chaudhry read a letter from Marjeena to her "Friends at SICW,

"Guess what? Last month I went to Washington, DC and met President Clinton at the White House He was very nice and put his arm around me We were at the White House because there was a ceremony in the Rose Garden where my mom was named the 1995 National Teacher of the Year

"My mom will be going all around the United States next year making about 200 speeches about the importance of education At the end of her speech, she tells my story She says that worldwide, education is a link that connects us to our fellow human beings She tells how my parents died after my birth when I was so little, so I ended up living at Howrah Station, begging by day and sleeping on the cement platform at night I was protected by a street woman named Nur Jehan who shared her only possessions, a blanket and a cooking pot, with me When I went to live at Ashirwad, I had to say goodbye to Nur Jehan I told her, 'Don't worry, Nur Jehan I'll get education and a job and I'll come back to take care of you when you are old, just like you took care of me '"

It is a story all right But it is her 'story' Marjeena lived the story and grew up in it Nur Jehan was no fairy godmother with a silver wand The maternal woman with her threadbare possessions made life a trifle more enduring for the family of three Nur had her own son and also looked after Marjeena

After she was shifted to Ashirwad, Marjeena was found to be a difficult and reticent child, more "withdrawn than any normal kid" Six or seven years spent on railway platforms made a clear difference

"This phase is a time of tremendous adjustment and adaptation in the life of a child like Marjeena," observed Chaudhry The child has to settle down in every sense of the word — a new environment, a room to live in with other children, a cot or a bed that you can call your own, the 'miracle' of having regular meals and not having to worry about the next

"They feel two kinds of cravings — physical and emotional They satisfy the former by gorging themselves to the point of falling sick. We do not stop them The other craving is more important and more difficult to satisfy — a longing for love and security "

President Bill Clinton presents Elaine Griffin with the Crystal Apple Award

Marjeena received enough of both to emerge as a friendly and intelligent child Then "mom" or Elaine Griffin arrived on a teaching assignment to Ashirwad

Griffin, hailing from Alaska, taught at a school in Chiniak and lived with her husband Ned and two adopted daughters Marjeena became the third addition to the Griffin family

Geetanjali, a social worker in charge of foreign adoption, clearly stated, "In India, a child of two years or more, is deemed unfit for adoption The child should be pleasant looking if not pretty " Marjeena was seven when she was adopted and she was not pretty

Did she resent the fact of being uprooted from her country of birth? "No, none of them do In fact children like Marjeena feel quite flattered being pampered by gore log One little boy in particular, insisted on having 'white parents' In any case, a home away from home is by far a better prospect than living in a children's home "

Marjeena went to the US with her "mom" Griffin was later selected as the National Teacher of the Year, 1995

Then came the Rose Garden party, "White House ceremony, press conferences hotel suite with televisions in both bathrooms and the limousines with telephones "

Marjeena's letter described it better "Six years ago, I was living at Howrah Station without a family, and this year I got to shake the hand of the President That's pretty special I told him that I watched the news about how his wife visited orphanages on her trip to India, and when I got to the word 'India', I started crying So he put his arm around me and told me not to feel bad My mom wanted me to smile for our family picture with the President but I was so sad about all the kids who don't have a family and cannot come to meet the president and so excited at the same time, that I could not stop crying "

Marjeena's story does not end here She now has new dreams to pursue and surge ahead with her life But she remembers and nurtures a hope "My mom says education is the link between me and my desire to make the world a better place and its a dream of liberty and justice for all Marjeena is just one of the million hopeful hearts ■

AND THE DEVIL TOOK THE HINDMOST

Mahesh Motwani on how God escaped from Man's clutches*

The good Lord was in danger He was on the verge of being found out by Man He was just one light year away from the last planet set foot upon by Man, and out of fear, had shut himself in the last Black Hole of the universe which He had created

Man had advanced so much, in genetic engineering and other sciences, so that once they got hold of God, they could easily subject him to all sorts of scientific experiments and make, God knows how many clones of God (sorry, even God did not know)

So God had made the mistake of gifting mankind with so much ability and now, in a state of utter shock, thought desperately of some way to save himself He (my apology to the females in this universe, but if God was a woman He would not have had this problem) brought out his computer and plugging it to his channel of cosmic energy, checked every byte for some resource

But God being God, had kept no reserve for Himself

He sat thinking as to what to do Just then, there was a beep on his cosmic cellular phone Who was it? Beads of perspiration formed on his forehead All the other deities and forms created by Him had surrendered long back and had opted to leave their ethereal form and take earthly forms, and in doing so, had lost all memory of their heavenly life

In trepidation, the Lord picked up his receiver and waited for the caller to speak

He heard a crackle of glee and then his arch enemy Satan's voice came over the receiver

"Hello, friend! How are you?"

God mustered up strength and replied, "Fine!" And then to the point, "And why have you called?"

Satan with calorie-free sweetness in his voice replied, "And why would a friend call? I've come to save you"

God mused This was most unlikely of Satan To help Him? Who is Satan kidding?

But He could not tell Satan to go away (not that God turns anyone away) because He knew the depths of Satan's intelligence, and, if anyone could fool Man, it was Satan Even God had to agree Satan's track record in this field was excellent

But what would be the cost?

So God asked — "How and why?"

Satan replied, "Again you have got the order wrong First, the deal and then the secret You have always given Man everything and then expected him to listen to you, and thus have you suffered You should have first secured his devotion and loyalty and then rewarded him And now you expect me to repeat the same mistake"

God, now impatient, cut him short

"Stop lecturing me! Come straight to the deal"

Satan "Well! Till now you have exerted your control over Man and not allowed him to follow his own instincts and be happy"

God (in a rage) "What do you mean? I have always led Man towards his happiness"

Satan "Yes! Yes! You have promised Man all the happiness of the seven heavens after his death And what happiness can Man experience after death? After a life of sacrifices, troubles and endless unhappiness?"

God "It purifies their soul and makes their soul cleaner and stronger"

Satan "And now, this problem of yours should purify your own soul So sacrifice yourself and if you'll excuse me, I'll take your leave"

God "Wait! Don't! What do you have in mind?"

Satan "It's simple! Give yourself up to me and I'll take care of you and your world"

God felt weak A friend indeed! Shylock was better He excused himself, went to his inner sanctum, popped in two pills, and took a big swig of the magic potion

Now, feeling more confident, he addressed Satan — "You mean entire property rights to me?"

"Yes!"

God "Well, it's too much a price to pay, but if you're willing to discuss lease and let, then perhaps, we can talk"

Satan smiled God had obviously learnt something from Man A 1,000-year lease and let, and the world was in his control God must be really desperate to agree to such a deal

Satan "Okay, then! A lease for 1,000 years"

"One thousand years?" God asked incredulously, "A moment without my control and this universe could collapse"

"Then control it," Satan's eyes glinted "Final offer 5,000 years, nothing less"

The Lord then asked, "If I agree, how will you save me?"

Satan "Easy Whenever I have presented myself to Man as their wellwisher, you have interfered and prevented him from following me This time, too, I will appear before Man as you Man will think that they have found you and will give up further search for you I will give him so much happiness and pleasure that Man will stop all progress But you must not interfere"

"Fantastic! Excellent!" God could not hold himself back from exclaiming, and for once, could hardly withhold His praise for Satan

Satan beamed, "I've been telling you all along that you should listen to me But you and your God-done ideas So agreed?"

"Agreed!" God echoed enthusiastically, putting his hand into Satan's and shaking it vigorously And so God went back to the inner sanctum, a much relieved soul and sat before His cosmic television set to see the terrific saga about to unfold

He received his lease deed a week later and happily signed it Satan had done a terrific job Man was 100 light years away already Man was happy, Satan too, and the good Lord safer He turned on his radio and caught a serial from the earth The song was, "Don't worry! Be happy!" The Lord could not have agreed more He broke into a happy jig, "Don't worry! Be happy!"

March 21—April 20

The new moon, says Ganesha, favours anything connected with your work, say, a new job, overtime, an extra responsibility, handling more than one department, temporarily or otherwise Pets and projects are also highlighted The bottomline is, too many irons in the fire

April 21— May 20

Relax Let go Have fun Mercury-Uranus placing suggests that your productivity is directly linked to your capacity to have a ball, believe it or not The birth of children, long-distance connections, hobbies, education, research, religious ceremonies and consequent meetings are foretold

May 21—June 20

You will have to regroup your resources, marshal your forces, even draw upon the reserves, so to say, and then attack upon the twin frontier of home and the outside world Therefore, you have your work cut out Here, the superb Mercury-Pluto sextile comes to your help

June 21—July 20

A pleasing Venusian factor gives you silky grace and finesse in relationships, and yes, happiness is its legacy Many Cancerians will be having their full share of travel, visitors, relatives, news and views, and that should stimulate them considerably This is the time to finish pending work

July 21—August 21

You will blow your own trumpet, nothing new in that, and also that of others, and it should keep you on your toes There is an intense concentration on work, finances, food and services Do accept invitations even if you feel it drains your energy Why not suffer fools gladly?

Virgo

August 22—September 22

The new moon in your sign, according to Western astrology, helps you focus on your personal development, health and interfacing with people Love will strike you suddenly and mysteriously Children give real satisfaction Complications at home can be resolved

September 23—October 22

Slowly but surely, introspection and assessing your own worth, as well as that of others, will possess you Best to learn yoga, meditation, philosophy The travel bug will bite you The next 20 days are for it too On and after September 29, Mercury helps you to take important decisions

October 23—November 22

Deception will be mastered by you, and thus, you will be one up on your rivals Expenses will be heavy and you will be called upon to look after the sick and the weak The other aspect, very surprisingly, is that of socialising and having friends over A busy week indeed

November 23—December 20

The screws will be really turned on and you will have to work at breakneck speed This, in turn, could take a huge toll on your energy and even make you slightly accident-prone Periodic rest is essential, says Ganesha From Wednesday, ties and links will be the key to a happier life

December 21—January 19

You will have the will and the guts to fight effectively on a million fronts, and yet, come out right on top Remarkable bursts of energy and imagination will help you The foreign slant could well predominate Ceremonies, rituals, and drive will take you to your goals

Aquarius

January 20—February 18

Loans, funds, investments, buying and selling are the trends which will ask for your time and energy You may rely on friends and well wishers to help you to a certain extent Another distinctive direction will be friendship and partnerships

February 19—March 20

There is work to be done, negotiations to be entered into, settlements to be done, and frankly, battles to be fought The prospect of additional money is really bright It is a complicated week, because many things are bursting like bombs and you have to forge ahead

BIRTHDAYS

August 27: Mercury-Uranus trine means sudden good fortune, says Ganesha. This could come about by your efforts and the good wishes of others.

August 28: Moon-Jupiter sextile indicates an influx of money. The family will look upon you with respect. Strained relations can be mended.

August 29: You may have to push just that much harder, because there is no strong aspect or indication this year. It also means more haste, less speed.

August 30: Moon-Pluto conjunction gives you plenty of scope to advance in your career, and personal life, it means you can eat your cake and have it too.

August 31: A favourable planetary conjunction leads to good fortune. It will also affect your spouse, children, home and the office front.

September 1: Moon-Pluto conjunction emphasises developments in the house, office, say renovation, decoration, moving and so on.

September 2: Moon-Jupiter conjunction ensures journey, romance, education and socialising. Look to pending matters. The homefront gives satisfaction.

ESCAPE TO NOWHERE

By the end of August, the hill-dweller has got the monsoon blues Heartily sick of cloud and fog, drizzle and downpour, he longs for a little sunshine, some dryness in the air

Forsaking my jammed typewriter, mildewed books and files, I set out for Dehradun in the valleys It was damp there, too, and sultry, but at least, there were occasional bursts of sunshine I took a room in a small hotel and lay beneath a whirring fan, waiting for the cool of the evening

Evening walks in Dehra are not what they used to be Speeding vehicles stop for no one and you take your life in your hands every time you cross a road Most of the roads came into existence over a 100 years ago and were originally meant for pedestrians and pony-drawn tongas Now, neither pedestrians nor ponies have any rights

Wait until dark and the hazards are even greater, for street lights do not exist even on the smaller roads while open ditches and other obstacles are there in abundance, just waiting to trap you

Returning to my room muddled and dishevelled, I was consoled by the old man who brought me a cup of tea Things were much worse in Agra, he told me

"And what were you doing in Agra?" I asked

"I was in the madhouse, the pagalkhana for 10 years Then one day, when no one was looking, I slipped away"

He burst into laughter and naturally, I had to join in

"Inside or outside, there's no difference," he added, "the roads are full of pagals these days"

Next day, going out in search of a little sanity, I decided I'd call Nergis Dalal, a fellow writer whom I hadn't seen for some years

As I approached the Dilawar Bazaar, the area where she lived, I noticed that the traffic on the main road had come to a standstill and that smoke was issuing from a couple of shops

A crowd had gathered and now, as a police van arrived, people began to scatter, most of them running in my direction I always seem to be standing in the way of advancing hordes

Looking for some avenue of escape, I found a gap in the wall leading into an old orchard of lichi trees I sat beneath a lichi tree, recalling the days when Dehra was famous for its lichis Now, only a few gardens remain for their owners find it more profitable to sell their land for buildings Will lichis vanish forever? They don't grow anywhere else

When the main road seemed normal again, I left the protection of the trees and took another chance with my fellow humans Two boys were discussing the recent incident One said the shop had been burnt down because it had been selling brown sugar The other said it had been burnt down because it had refused to sell brown sugar

My own blood sugar level was by now distinctly low, so I hurried along to Nergis Dalal's flat, knowing she would give me sustenance Hadn't she written half a dozen cookery books? Nor was I disappointed Pulau rice, kofta curry and a chocolate souffle awaited me I was on the right track!

When I got back to my hotel, I found Mr Aurora of the Green Bookshop waiting for me on the verandah He had a surprise for me, he said, and wouldn't tell me what it was until I got into his car

Ten minutes later, we drove in at the gates of the Welham Girls' School And within minutes I found myself trapped in a classroom, surrounded by some 200 girls, their ages ranging from 14 to 18

And I was expected to talk to them! Usually tongue-tied in front of a girl, how was I to converse with two hundred?

Jules Verne had a similar problem, I believe No wonder he preferred to be 20,000 leagues under the sea — which is where I wanted to be just then Bright-eyed and eager as they were, waiting for words of wisdom to flow from my lips, I had none to impart! I looked around the sea of faces — here was beauty and intelligence combined — but I was struck dumb!

Their principal, Mrs Verma, came to my rescue and said nice things about my writing I answered a few questions, trying to be witty, if not wise The girls were kind and indulgent

When it was all over, I found myself back in my hotel room A smart young Gurkha brought me a cup of tea

"Where's the old man?" I asked.

"One of his sons came for him," he said, "They've taken him back to Agra."

So that was the end of his great escape Was it the end of mine?

WAITING FOR PEACE

There can be no more beautiful sight in all Israel than that of the Sea of Galilee, viewed from high above the Mount of Beatitudes where Jesus promised that the meek should inherit the earth The sky is deep blue, and the water deeper, and the hillsides tumble down to the shores, a mass of gold sun-dried grasses and thistles

Goldfinches, their heads dipped as if in pots of liquid gold and bright, blood-red are as common as sparrows Ever since King Solomon's ships brought peacocks from India, that bird has appeared in art as the symbol of eternity Similarly, the goldfinch was and remains the symbol of sacrifice

At night, a thin necklace of light rings the sea and the town of Tiberias glitters on the western shore Clusters of lights to the east mark the summit of the grand Golan Heights which rise sharply from the sea Insects sing But otherwise, nothing interrupts the utter peace of the night

Yehuda Avni, a mild-mannered, harworking man once from Chicago has built a ranch here He, and the neighbouring farmers who force mangoes and lichis from the natural grasslands, remember when they were shelled from the Golan by Syrian troops

They know that the Golan is not an integral part of Israel but in all the local tourist literature, it and other occupied territories are treated as such

The Golan is to be visited for its vineyards, ancient places and birds of prey But Yehuda knows that the Heights may return to Syria and then he will look again into a foreign country for his ranch

Israel surprises in many ways One being its size It is so much smaller than its place in world politics suggests It is really no distance from Jerusalem to Damascus, and it should be possible to go from Galilee to Beirut for a luncheon appointment

But what it lacks in physical size, it makes up for in the complicated depths of its history And perhaps, there are so many goldfinches because so many people from this ancient land have sacrificed so much

In this century, there was the Holocaust when one third of the total Jewish community was killed In previous centuries, too, they were exiled and persecuted Three thousand years ago, King David built the great Temple at Jerusalem, but only 410 years later it was destroyed by the King of Babylon

The Second Temple was built over two thousand years ago and stood only 420 years before the Romans destroyed it

Now religious Jews await the building of the Third Temple, and an age in which universal peace will be established on earth Until then, the closest point on earth to God remains the towering ruin of the Second Temple's western wall where the religious slip messsages to the lord into the crevices between the stones, and those who can't come in person, sends faxes addressed to Him to nearby fax shops from where they are duly posted

On Sunday mornings, peals of church bells wash over the Temple Mount The gilded Dome of the Rock built by the Caliph in the nineth century to commemorate the Prophet's ascension into heaven, and also, to show Jews and Christians that their religion had been superceded, stands on the Mount itself All the semitic religions are represented here, and all, in one way or another, claim Jerusalem for themselves

At present, the modern state of Israel holds sway, and the most recent exiles are of course, the Palestinians The most immediate search is for peace between these two sides Before the PLO won its autonomous areas in Gaza and the oasis of Jericho, large numbers of Palestinians came to work in and around Jerusalem Now they can no longer move freely They have to take passes from the Israelis, and they are often not forthcoming

One farmer in Jericho complained that he couldn't explain to his sons why he couldn't take them for a day out to the city and asked what he would do if he had to take someone to hospital But Israelis in Jerusalem told me that restrictions on movement had controlled terrorist attacks, and that they preferred to employ immigrant labour than unreliable Palestinians

An invisible line still divides Jerusalem despite the fact that Israel has held the entire city since it was captured from Jordan in 1967 Many Jews do not visit the eastern, or Palestinian, side of the city at all and have not since the beginning of the Palestinian uprising

But the search for peace is beginning to bear fruit A lawyer friend was able to persuade friends of his to cross to the East for the first time in over six years to have dinner with us at an Arab restaurant They were nervous at first but it was the chef's birthday and by the time the staff had enthusiatically sung "Happy birthday to you" in Arabic and handed out pieces of cake, they relaxed.

The lawyer said, "You see, after the Holocaust, we had no option, where else could we go? And the Palestinians had no options either They are right and we are right" He belives in compromise, and in the end that is where peace lies Puja shopping made easy!

Pujas in Bengal can be a real heady experience Of course, there are festivals that are celebrated with great pomp and pageantry in almost every region in the country Yet the Pujas are different For, where else would you come across a festival that the calendar informs will last a mere four days while the people celebrate it for one whole month If not two

Actually, the Pujas begin about two months earlier In case you doubt that, a short trip to one of the 'Puja Bazaars' is recommended You will find that the flavour of the Pujas has already arrived

In fact, this is also the time of sweet and sour feelings Sweet, when the controller of every home's finances, the housewife, pulls off her bargains And, a little sour, when on that rare occasion it's the shop-keeper who comes up triumphant

But unfortunately, in keeping with the times, this sweet and sour experience now faces a bitter truth inflation

Costs have gone up While the incomes have not The only way, therefore, to stretch the rupee is to cut a few items off the shopping list Unless, of course, a better alternative is found

So, The Telegraph and Philips have come together to make life better And to do that, they are introducing The Telegraph Philips Puja Bonus

Every weekday, from Monday, August 21, you will find one special coupon in The Telegraph This can be cut and collected with others that will keep appearing on subsequent days They can then be redeemed at the shops mentioned in the list given in the next page It will also be published every Sunday in The Telegraph

Estrangement

Mute and helpless
He stands alone
At the crossroads of humanity
One who mobilised the whole country
En masse to freedom
Now bears the air of inertness?

The lines on his face — perhaps deeper now,
His stooped back, shoulders weaker,
He leans on his staff
As if holding on his staff
As if holding on in sheer desperation
The unholy work of Man is not yet over.
"Where did I go wrong?"
Says the pained look on his face

The hungry baby cries as he still tugs at his mother's dry breasts
Power-blinded greed still holds sway over millions
And people have led themselves
Out of one prison into another

And when
On a misty October morning,
Smiles in their hands,
They garland the Father of the Nation,
Not even one can see
In the corner of his eye--
A lone tear
On its way down the dusty pedestal

The Gigolo

I creak the door shut on tiptoe
so as not to wake the kids up.
They got in at two last night and must have their eight hours
After all, health is wealth.

My freshly ground cup of coffee and a splash of tap water cleanse my mind of all thoughts Thoughts of creeping back in under the pink bordered eiderdown
That we were so lucky to pick up at a discount sale last fall

I need inspiration, a divine flash
I need to be deep, profound and yet keep in mind
That irreverence, marijuana and melifluous wordiness they were paying me a dollar a word

What would I choose to enlighten my paying public about aujourd hui?
Which social taboo would I scrutinise, which evil would I criticise?

While keeping in mind
I must not moralise.
After all, cultural diversities and differences must not be forgotten

Poverty perhaps No, I am getting typecast that's what my last review said
Lurid commercialism, the lucre of green?

Dowry deaths may be, with a touch of bride burning
After all, people musn't forget that we are a nation where young girls are mere commodities
That are sold or bartered to the highest bidder
Or may be our spiritual bankruptcy, selling out...

what shall I sell today?

LA BELLE DAME MARCEAU

And we are talking about Sophie's choice: the French bomb's first English-speaking film in Hollywood

And so it was not just Demi Moore who proudly bore her pregnancy, stunning the world with her turgid tummy on Vanity Fair's cover.

Sophie Marceau, the hottest actress of France's new generation, stole the show as she appeared at most star-studded events, including Cannes and the Oscars, in a smug state of pregnancy.

Last month, the 29-year-old femme fatale gave birth to her first babe, a boy, in a Paris hospital to where the father, Polish director Andrzej Zulawski, rushed, carrying with him a big bouquet of flowers.

Marceau, who has Bardot's sex-kitten charms and Deneuve's petite ice maiden looks, has enjoyed a string of successes ever since she appeared as the effervescent teenager in the 1980 hit, La Boum, a film which shot her to instant fame.

Former President Francois Mitterand had opted to take her on a visit to South Korea for she typified the very essence of the French feminine aura.

She captivated audiences with her stage performances in Jean Anouilh's Eurydice and George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion. Her crystallisation as a mature actress was possible in large part due to the actor, Gerard Depardieu, director Phillipe de Broca and Andrzej Zulawski.

Hers is the earthy sensuality combined with what fashion designer Emanuel Ungaro calls "a soft, blossomy innocence".

Hers is the earthy sensuality combined with what fashion designer Emanuel Ungaro calls 'a soft, blossomy innocence'

After 15 films in France, the Gallic star intended taking all that innocence to Hollywood. Sophie made a choice: she was willing to gamble her chances in Hollywood where foreign actresses are known to be ground to splinters. After earning money and fame at a precocious age, there were two alternatives: Live off her success at home or test her limits in cinema. "So I decided to choose the second course," she said.

Sophie is due to start a fresh round of publicity with the release of Braveheart, her first English-speaking role where she plays the 13th century French-born Princess Isabelle, who has a fling with Mel Gibson when she realises he is as dangerous as he is dashing.

Sophie is shockingly beautiful outshining even the dazzling Catherine McCormack who plays Gibson's tragic bride in the film.

Though she admits to a language barrier (her next goal being to improve her English), she does feel French actresses in Hollywood have their "own charms that, if things work out right, can look good on film.

ARPANA CAUR, 40, one of the most acclaimed painters in the country today, whose works adorn the walls of the Kunst Museum, Dusseldorf, Ethnografic Stockholm, Bradford Museum and the National Gallery of Modern Art, New Delhi, is a self-taught artist. Once described as someone who can never become a 'drawing room artist', the national award winner was recently commissioned by the Hiroshima Museum to do a painting on Peace to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima. She has held solo exhibitions in London, Copenhagen and Glasgow among other places.

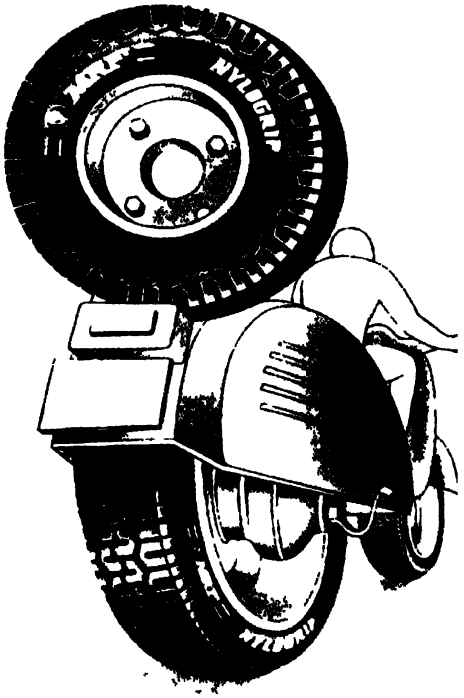
What is your idea of perfect happiness?
There is no such thing as 'perfect happiness'. To realise this is to be happy. The key to happiness is contentment with what one has.
What is your greatest fear?
Losing the one person dearest to me, to the inevitability of death.
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
My mother. She is more daring than I am, very progressive, a dreamer and a doer, and is my ideal.
What do you dislike most in others?
Corruption which is the hallmark of our whole social system and has eaten into our souls. And violence which is becoming a cult as a result
What do you dislike most in yourself?
My occasional outbursts of anger. I try hard, but have not been able to control this monster which I know harms me more than the object of my anger
What is your most precious possession?
My mother.
What objects do you always carry?
The name of the Giver Who has been exceptionally kind to me
What makes you most depressed?
This very unequal and shameful socio-economic system where most people cannot afford even the basic necessities like food, medicine, a roof, education, dignity
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
That is for others to tell.
What is your favourite word?
Love.
What is your favourite journey?

What is your nightmare?

Another Hiroshima



What do you dislike most in others?

Corruption which is the hallmark of our whole social system and has eaten into our souls. And violence which is becoming a cult as a result

The yearly journey I undertake to the mountains in Garhwal and Kumaon This helps me cope with the madness of Delhi for the remaining 10 or 11 months
What is your favourite dream?
A society where everyone has food, there are no weapons and where only love prevails, in other words, an impossible dream But artists are impossible dreamers, anyway
What is your nightmare?
Another Hiroshima
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
Not my painting, but my mother As long as she is around me I feel charged with energy and can lose myself totally in my painting
What is your source of sustenance?
My Guru Shri Sahibji, and the ashram he has created on the outskirts of Delhi where I go twice a week with my family He teaches here with great humaneness, humour and respect for work, how to improve ourselves day to day in the midst of our domestic and worldly lives
On what occasions do you lie?
When I do not wish to answer the phone or receive visitors. Then 'I am not at home', 'nor in my studio'.
What is your greatest regret?
Let that, at least, remain a secret please. ..
What has been your happiest moment?
The latest I can think of is a commission from Hiroshima Museum for a painting on Peace, this being the 50th anniversary of the holocaust.
What brings tears to your eyes?
The have-nots.
How do you relax?
By painting.
What do you envy most in others?
Easy-going people who have less sense of time passing than me.
How would you like to be remembered?
As a good painter.
How would you like to die?
Before the people I love go.

Neither God Nor Father

■ It does not really become the Magazine to blow up a Hollywood scandal into a major story ('The Marlon Mystique', July 30)

With his debonair looks, Marlon Brando is one of Hollywood's best known matinee idols The Magazine would have delighted readers had it come out with a cover story concerning his craft

Sexual escapades are part of the Hollywood lifestyle Womanising, philandering, alcoholism are all part of showbiz and an accepted order So, what is so great about Marlon Brando running from one woman to another in search of whatever you say, security or love?

From the great Charlie Chaplin to Hugh Grant there have been very few actors in Hollywood who have not been involved in a scandal at least once in their lifetime

Manoj Kumar Jain,
Shyamnagar (W B)

■ The book extract offered a glimpse of Brando's eccentricities and his turbulent personal life His many relationships with women did not bring any lasting happiness to Brando In fact, there was very little to give him stability in life a broken marriage, a son in jail and a daughter who committed suicide

Brando's tragedy is a reflection of the average Hollywood actor's disturbed life behind a glamorous and fun-loving exterior Marilyn Monroe and Rita Hayworth drowned their miseries in alcohol

Reba and Indubhushan Bose,
Jamshedpur

■ Being the child of celebrity parents has always been a curse. Christian became a victim of his parents' unhappy conjugal life

With an alcoholic father who spent most of life and time in the studios and, when not working, preferring the company of his various girlfriends to his family, the young Christian was naturally dejected

In the absence of parental love, care and affection, a neglected child is bound to turn a rebel

Dipankar Koley,
Jhikra (Howrah)

■ The Brando-Anna Kashfi matrimony made headlines in the late Fifties His eccentricities apart, this colourful actor had many humane touches to his personality He was one of the participants at the Black Americans' famous long march in Washington

Maybe he did love his wife, Anna, but the manner in which he unceremoniously deserted her on the night of their honeymoon speaks very poorly of this gentlemanly actor

Brando paid a heavy price for his arrogance and his string of relationships

Sunil Banerjee,

To Err is Hugh-man, to Forgive 'Divine'

■ The grapevine has it that several Bollywood stars are now showing a keen interest to purchase BMWs Is it because Hugh Grant popularised this brand by being caught with a prostitute, Divine Brown, in it?

The company should thank Grant for this free publicity And, Elizabeth Hurley, who has displayed exemplary patience in the face of her boy friend's philanderings, deserves the 'Most tolerant woman of the year' award

Diu: A lot of peace

Phal S Girota

Both Goa and Diu have their points of attraction and, at first glance, it looks like a toss-up between the two for the traveller of the sea and sand Samita Bhatia did a recce on the two

GOA IS A CELEBRATION, DIU IS PERPETUALly in a slumber Goa's beaches are crawling and alive with those bitten by the wanderlust, Diu's sands are almost virgin. Goa leaves you heady, and there is a quiet about Diu. Goa is easily accessed, Diu still remains the undiscovered corner of the subcontinent.

Goa, in a nutshell, is food, feni and frolic, Diu is yet to find a parallel definition.

Goa refuses to be included in any stereotype touristy brochure It is a special place where you can hear music everywhere — practically every village has a band of its own.

It is a state seemingly blessed with fabulous weather, even more fabulous beaches, delightful people, great cuisine, hilltop forts, little white-washed churches and soaring Portuguese-era cathedrals. A package deal that any traveller would find irresistible.

Diu is a small, picture perfect island Its beaches still hold the power to attract even the most seasoned beach lover. Unbelievably small at 13 kms by 4.5 kms, Diu is separated from mainland Gujarat by a narrow channel and extensive mud flats

There is also that narrow spit of land attached to the mainland, but jutting southwards towards the east of the island where the town of Diu stands. Along its shore are a number of inviting palm grit sandy stretches.

Phal S Groha

A Goa church One of many

Langour suffuses the air that you breathe in both Goa and Diu It is palpable and hangs heavy in the air Diu could well be a mirror image of a Goa a few decades back, but the major point of diversion is that it is completely devoid of the hordes of holidaymakers that one is wont to see in Goa on holidays or a weekend

While Goa is well connected to major points in the country, Diu is not so Close to Nagoa in Diu, stands a derelict aerodrome which had connected the island in pre-liberation times with Goa, Daman and Karachi Bombed later, the building continues to stand thus, a reminder of the days of yore

While the runway is just about operational, the locals speak of beefing up air connections that will cater to the anticipated tourist boom The nearest railhead is Veraval, 80 kms from Diu, which also provides onward connections to Ahmedabad However, access to Diu is mainly through Ahmedabad, Bombay Rajkot and Bhavnagar

A more expensive option could be a Gujarat tour aboard The Royal Orient that touches Ahmedpur, Mandvi and Diu Difficult access obviously reduces the potential of attracting tourists, but then some argue that Diu could well do without a situation where it might be overrun by foreign travellers

While Goa is crowded in season, there is room for anyone looking for accommodation, with something to suit every pocket — from budget hotels to posh five-star properties (And remember, if you want to rent a place for a year it will take just Rs 20,000 for a sprawling bungalow!)

As the sun and sand, sea and surf meet, there is an inevitable spill of beach hotels The number of hotels in Goa have proliferated phenomenally in the last few years, though some suggest that it might not be the best thing for Goa or its environs But the destination continues to be a paradise for travellers, particularly, those seeking the sea (tepid and safe), the sand (golden — in patches, when not polluted), seafood (fresh and varied) and silence (which can sometimes be deafening)

Undiscovered Diu has, in comparison, yet to get its act together The beach hotels that are so popular in Goa are few and far between in Diu There are several stretches of sandy beaches on the south coast of the island, but the best are those near the village of Nagoa

The sandy curve of the bay here is palm lined and there is even an attractive guest house for the stray foreigner who finds his way to this corner of the earth The Portuguese-style cuisine served here is great, we found

There are affordable and some luxurious hotels available in Diu, well appointed cottages built close to the beaches Hotel tariffs could swing between Rs 30 and Rs 400 per day However, tourism authorities bemoan a gross lack of room to take on any sudden influx of tourists

With distinct high seasons when business in Goa is brisk, come the problems The Goan has to contend with an image crisis

Charlie, who plies a taxi in Goa, is worried at the misinformation and too little relevant information about the destination reaching foreign shores

"This is the primary cause," he observed, "for Goa's distorted image as a hippie land "

He objects strongly to the fact that foreigners continue to see Goa as the veritable land for beach bums and packpackers

The hippies have long since gone but, in Goa, their passage has left a mark in its social history Certainly, a flea market on the beaches of Anjuna is a part of the chain they started which has withstood the passage of time The flower children seeking their own brand of nirvana

Hans J Bredt, general manager of the Leela Beach Hotel, Goa, and one who has been closely observing the tourism scene here, remarks that a recently published travel guide mentioned the state being promoted and dominated by hippie culture 'Which is why the upmarket and high-spending tourist has been giving Goa the go-by "

Other developments had added to this distorted image "Agitations launched by environmental groups against five-star hotels for alleged violation of coastal regulations were exaggerated many times over, which created scepticism among holidaymakers "

But tourists are untouched by these undercurrents as they amble through Goa's villages and streets A walking tour of unstructured fishing Goan villages and the streets of Diu prove to be exhilarating

Diu is bound to remind the traveller of some south European town The older homes are built of local stone soft to work on, but standing well to the test of time The large glazed windows with their louvered shutters are quite unlike those of the houses of Gujarat

While traces indicate that the walls were at some some point of time covered with frescoes, today they are coated with a wash of blue and ochre

Goa wears a different look today The straw huts of yesteryear that peeped from behind sylvan foliage and made Goa so distinctive, are giving way to the more solid and picturesque sloping red-roofed pucca houses

Charlie keeps up a chatter as he drives us for a leisurely sight-seeing tour

"With 80 per cent of the men away to the Gulf there's more money at the disposal of the families Thus, the new constructions That's also why you'll see less farming happening here " Which explains why the markets and shops are dominated by women workers

Bars and toddy shops dot the Goan landscape becoming the very leitmotif of this resort town Driving from the airport to the southernmost tip to the Leela Beach, you will come across innumerable bars and liquor joints — some wholesalers, too

If you find one closed just yell and draw the attention of the owners who will make an appearance from one of the adjoining bungalows Most of the shops double up as STD/ISD booths So there is no way you will feel cut-off

Visit any Goan tavern and you will see the locals drinking their favourite brew — cashew or palm feni The untrained palate must beware, for the concoction could hit you like a sting of a hundred scorpions and the aroma may feel like an equal number of rotten apples

Goan wine on the other hand is wel-

A view of Diu

Pinel S Carola

Horse riding at Leela Beach, Goa

come---a favourite accompaniment to any spicy Goan meal Vinicola, the popular local brand, comes in variously fancy bottles and even sachets good enough for two wine goblets These make ideal gifts for friends back home

We chanced upon the Vinicola factory and found 100 women — women yet again — (the only employees) at work "We make the wine and the men drink it," laughed one

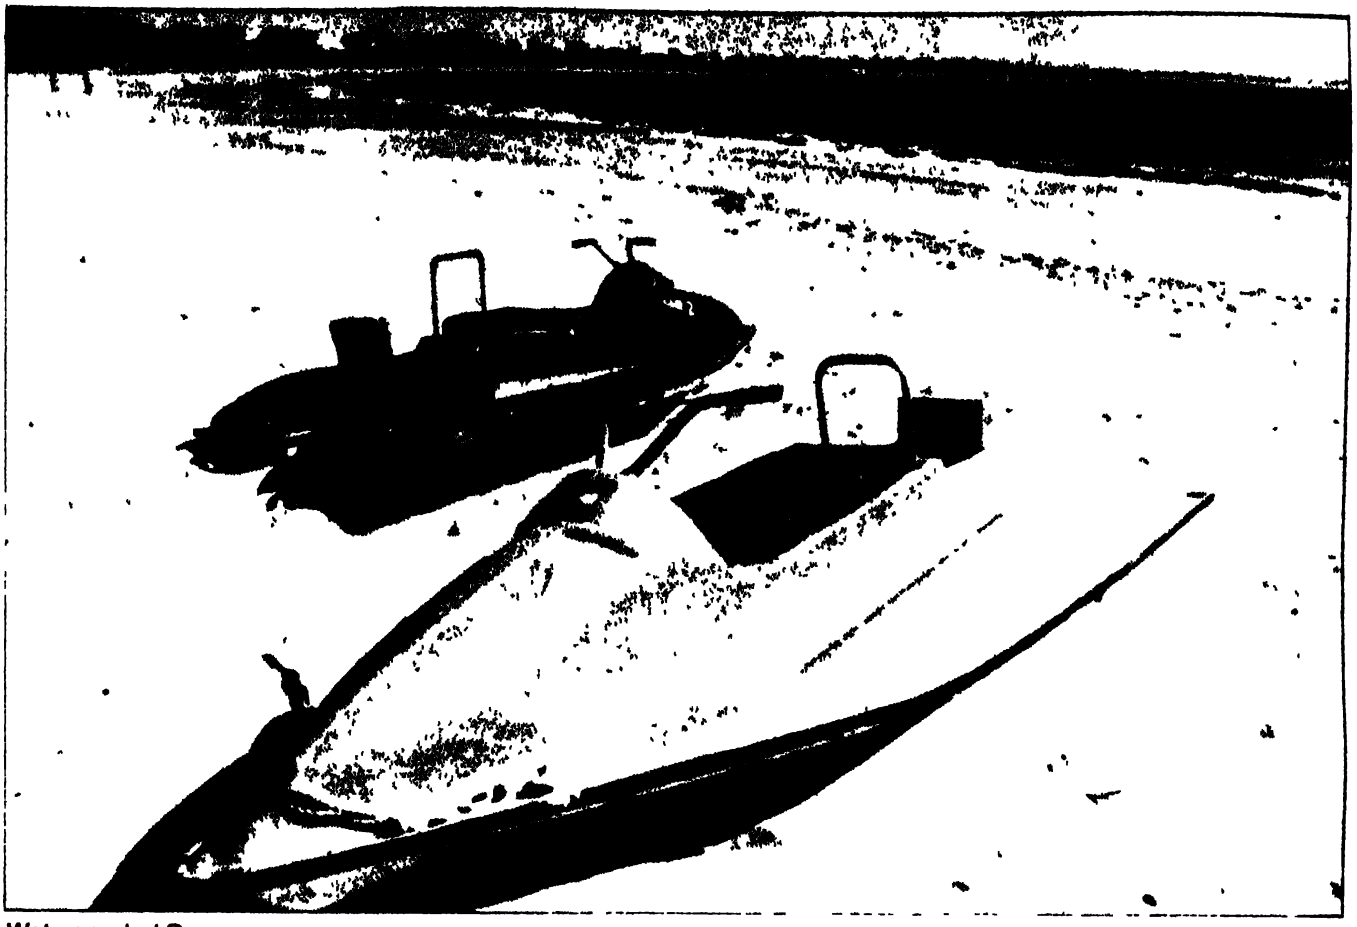
Diu, which the locals believe was the original Dwarka, the land of Krishna in comparison to magnetic Goa may, appear primitive but it too offers in plenty what nearby abstemious Gujarat lacks in — alcoholic beverages, cheap and plentiful

In Diu a majority of the bars are located near the waterfront, around the square or near the sabzi mandi Diu really has not any mineral wealth to talk about, but the two most prosperous factories on the island today are those manufacturing liquor, for which sugar is imported!

And it is along the waterfront that you will also find the fort completely dominating that end of the island and surrounded by its great ramparts Today there is no garrison posted here, merely the local jail, though one which is rarely used

Once the Portuguese ceased to hold sea power that they once enjoyed, they converted the awesome old fort into a penitentiary for hardened criminals And in the fort's garden stands the huge bronze statue of the first governor, Nuno da Cunho---against an ancient bell and a pile of cannonballs

The explorer in you will find two lighthouses within the walls, one of them long since abandoned, but the other still signalling to the ships as they pass by in the dead of the night



The sea here is rough, the rocks treacherous and the breaches on the fort wall are nothing but an invitation to disaster Our guide informs us that no one ever tried to escape from this fortress, it would be futile The fort is impregnable and today tourists casually weave their way between the cannonballs that lie around

The cannons that jut out of the fortress wall make excellent props for take-home pictures As the waters lap the fort's walls the lone crab battles the waves to keep a tenacious hold on the moss collecting on the wall

Northwards in Diu large fishing fleets bring their catch during the winter months The fleet is inactive in summer and monsoon and the locals depend largely on the dried stocks of fish for consumption Like Goa, however, the destination is a seafood lovers' paradise

The catch in Diu is variable, but there is plenty of pomfret, prawn, lobster, squid and even shark The rocky shores provide more seafood and when the tide is low you will find men and women scouring the weed covered ledges for crabs and shellfish

Seafood is Goa's forte, too, though Goan food is neither wholly Eastern nor Western Four centuries of

Watersport at Diu

Portuguese influence has left an indelible mark on the cuisine and contrary to popular belief not all Goan food is hot and spicy Lightly used spices enhance rather than dominate the inherent flavour of the fresh seafood

Salmon curry eaten with plain boiled rice and the flamboyant vindaloo must, must, be tried Glass plus types need worry a wee bit for Goan food is not traditionally known for its vegetarian fare

The thread of commonality between the two destinations is that both were colonised by the Portuguese during the early part of the 16th century The colonial lifestyle of the Portuguese was extremely luxurious and indolent, despite the searing heat Affluence was not visible in their dresses, belongings and cuisine, but in their lavish architecture

The Portuguese influence is visible in Diu in each edifice — the main gateway, St Paul's Church, the church of St Francis of Assisi and even in the maze of streets The ornate facades and the tower of the church of St Francis of Assisi must be visited Tourists are guided to the statue of the Virgin whose eyes appear to be real — luminous and expressive

So, too, Goa specially its northern stretch where the capital lies — Panaji and another 10 kms off in the Old City This area boasts of more churches per square kilometre than Rome, more icons on the altars than the Gods themselves in heaven and baroque at its best

Here, tourists usually head for the tomb of the first Portuguese woman who set foot on Goa and eventually married the governor

They love to clamber all over the ruins of the church of the Augustinian monastery where the solitary remaining tower reaches for the sky

A suggestion If your idea of a great holiday is staying at a good base camp accessible to all spots around, Panaji will be your best bet Ten kms from Old Goa, 20 kms from Ponda, the heartland of Hindu temples, 9 kms from Dona Paula beach Distances in Goa are great and so 35-60 kms will have to be trekked to get to the beaches of south Goa and 12-20 kms from those in the north

And if this is not enough you can visit the very site of the inquisition stake where the souls of those hanged and maimed returned to earth at the stroke of midnight, or the dry well where the women of the zenanas of the Bijapur noblemen who once ruled Goa hurled themselves to escape rape at the hands of the Portuguese soldiers sometime in 1510

What about Goa's bird life? Not too much to write home about However, Diu will take the avid birdwatcher by surprise The bird life is rich and in winter there is an onslaught of the migrants from Russia Cranes circle the skies and Rosy pastors collect in the bushes And there are more ducks, coots, purple gallinules and-jacanas The gaily coloured kingfishers and the blue reef herons, the fish-eating osprey all stalk the waters looking for food

Do keep your eyes peeled for the occasional jackal and porcupine and the giant sea turtles as they surface in the waters every now and then

Yes, Diu could mean many different things to different people Can you not hear it call — the sun and sand, sea and surf?

But, and a big but Despite it all in Goa be prepared to face a few hardships Bumpy roads, power cuts and water shortage even in deluxe accommodations, a gross lack of facilities at the airport and exorbitant rates charged by private taxi operators

LIKE BAD PENNIES?

Portugal, which ruled Goa till as recently as 1961, is keen to re-establish economic, cultural and social links with India How do Goans view this grand return of the colonialists? Frederick Noronha on the bitter-sweet memories that still haunt the people of this region

Nearly three-and-a-half decades after its hasty and inglorious exit, Portugal is once again speedily rebuilding its relationships with India

Goa, the former capital of what was once grandiloquently dubbed 'Portugese India', is at the centre of this exercise

A spate of events in the recent past indicate the return of the Portuguese to Goa They include Portuguese film and book exhibitions, a high-level business delegation visit, the setting up of a Portuguese-funded cultural centre, attempts to give local viewers a glimpse of Lisbon's TV channels, the building of India's largest dry dock with Portuguese collaboration, and even flying in top Portuguese chefs to display their culinary expertise

Goans have greeted these happenings with mixed feelings For large sections of Goa — youth under 30 and those born outside the state, including those of Goan origin — memories of the Portuguese are simply non-existent There are others who are suspicious of the return of the descendants of a country which ruled parts of India for a record four-and-half centuries

On the other hand, some Goans, mainly those who belonged to the privileged elite class of earlier times, are doing little to hide their glee at the renewed friendship

Portugal today is just one of the less influential and tiny European nations But its importance is still obvious if one recalls it was the first European power to rule in Asia, including India Its seafaring pioneers discovered for Europe the sea route to India in 1498

By 1510, the Portuguese conquered Goa Coming here way before the British and even the French, or other European powers, they stayed on for the longest period — till Indian military action ended their rule in Goa in 1961

But the Portugal of today is a different nation from the obstinate one which had to be forced out of India Two decades ago, a coup in Portugal ended the right-wing dictatorship and the Socialist President, Mario Soares, whose qualifications include contacts with Goan freedom fighters while in jail, was quick to normalise ties

Lisbon, in a widely appreciated gesture, returned gold pawned by Goans, and which had been taken to Portugal in 1961 In return, India reciprocated with an out-of-the way permission for Lisbon to set up its Consulate in Goa, outside the four metropolitan cities where consulates are normally set up in India

Ever since, there has been no turning back

A Portuguese trade team in Goa

Strangely, the Portuguese legacy in Goa is something which is still cherished in some quarters And for sound reasons, too Hoteliers find that it pays to portray Goa as some sort of a Europeanised, Portuguese-influenced destination, rather than compete with the rest of the Indian coastline as a place offering scenic beaches Some hotels go out of their way to give Portuguese names to their restaurants, rooms and even toilets

Businessmen are suddenly realising that they can put to good business use the former colonial ties The Portuguese language, despite being the fifth most widely spoken tongue in the world, is used by only 200 million people And most of them have no great purchasing power since they live in countries like Brazil, Angola and Mozambique, apart from Portugal (which has 10 million inhabitants)

Yet, knowledge of Portuguese has suddenly become an encashable asset, since Lisbon is showing considerable business interest in Goa

"Goa is the preferred place (for doing business) We have a natural capacity to understand each other We could use Goa as a home basis for our operations," president of the Portuguese trade body, ICEP, Minguel Athayde Marques, told businessmen recently

GOA BACK?

It is not roses all the way for the Portuguese as they navigate a slow and uneasy route to India. Opposition has come, not unexpectedly, from politicians who feel the re-entry of this small Iberian nation will only re-open the wounds of the past

Italians are welcome and play a giant role in Goa's iron-ore trade. The Japanese often come down on business visits Even Germany has its honorary consul — a local businessman — operating from Panaji

But, the very idea of the Portuguese setting up a consulate in Goa has evoked strong protests not only from the Opposition, but also from some freedom fighters.

The Maharashtrawadi Gomantak Party, which draws its support from Goa's Hindu voters, has made its stand clear about the Portuguese re-entry. Perhaps, this is not too surprising since the earlier colonial Portuguese [illegible] by dictator Antonio Oliveira Salazar for much of this century, and governments in earlier centuries, too, were theocratic and communal in nature.

Of late, the MGP and a section of Goa's press circle are raking up controversies which could make life difficult for the Portuguese here.

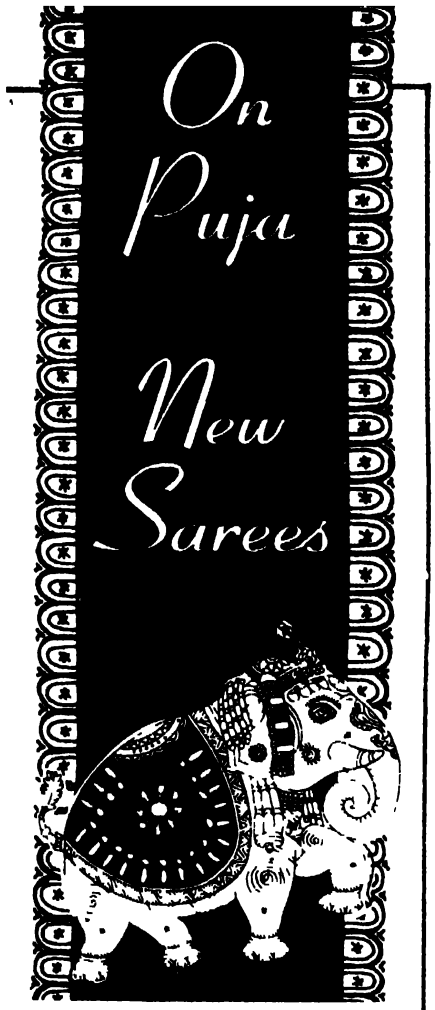
In the Assembly, many hours were spent debating whether the Portuguese had the right to hoist their country's flag over a building which actually was not part of the consulate

A driver, claiming to be a tenant in a palatial house bought over by the Portuguese consular officials — reportedly for one crore of rupees — got support for his claims from the MGP opposition. Neighbours in the locality, however, dismissed the veracity of the claims

So far, the Bharatiya Janata Party has been rather ambivalent about its stand over the Portuguese return. Still searching for a base here, the BJP has not yet ventured into this issue in a big way.

Oddly, this ultra-nationalist party which held its National Executive meeting in a hotel here had, as its backdrop, [illegible] of Portuguese heroes and conquistadors.

Students in Goa, which is a sleepy backwater compared to the facilities available in any other major Indian metro, also seem eager to cash in on the scholarships and other pickings offered by the return of the Portuguese



In recent years, an eager number of students have showed interest in learning Portuguese, which can be studied as a third language in Goa

But it was not like this all along

Since 1961 the unceremonious way in which the Portuguese had to be pushed out left a bitter taste behind Resentment against the Portuguese was also considerably strong, and the rather-theocratic nature of the government they ran in the past caused quite a backlash against things Portuguese

Unlike the exit of the British, or even the French, suspicion prevailed between India and this former colonial power Both sides were not even on talking terms till the mid-Seventies

In Goa, ties with Portugal snapped completely Their language was completely forgotten, as many switched to either English or Marathi for education Goa's regional party, the Maharashtrawadi Gomantak Party (MGP), which ruled throughout the Sixties and Seventies, was virulently anti-anything Portugese

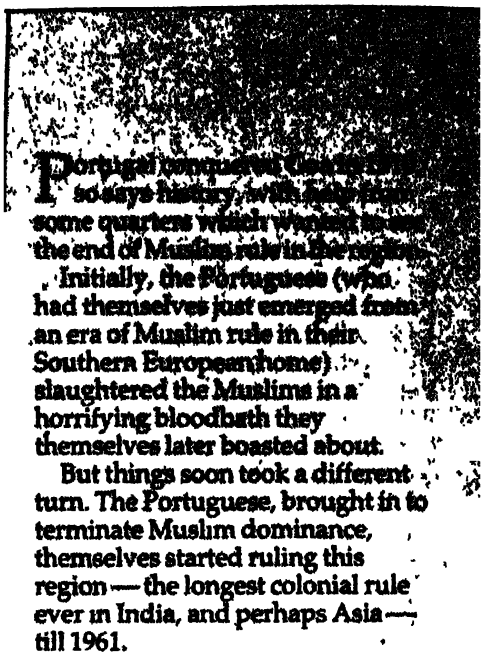
Politically, the Portuguese have had a smoother time with the rise of the Congress in Goa, particularly since with this party, national concerns and real-politik mattered more than the emotions based on the hard feelings of the past

Over the past three-and-a-half decades, the Portuguese influence has been fading fast Barely a couple of Portuguese programmes are aired on Panaji's All India Radio each week In 1983, India's last Portuguese daily, O Heraldo (The Herald), was converted into an English broadsheet

Unlike the misconception, the large bulk of Goans were not Portuguese speakers even during colonial rule (And it is just a myth that Goans — with the exception of a microscopic minority — are of part-Portuguese ancestry

For that matter, Goans get badly irked if they are referred to as "Goanese" as some do)

The Portuguese have much to gain if they can reestablish their link with this region One main advantage is economic Lisbon gave a hint of this when its high-level team of 28 trade representatives and officials spent three days in Goa in early April



Currently, Portugal's shipbuilding group, Lisnay, said to be the second largest in the world, is completing India's largest dry dock oft Goa in collaboration with the Western India group Lisbon is also aiming to increase the slender toe-hold it currently has in the vast Indian market

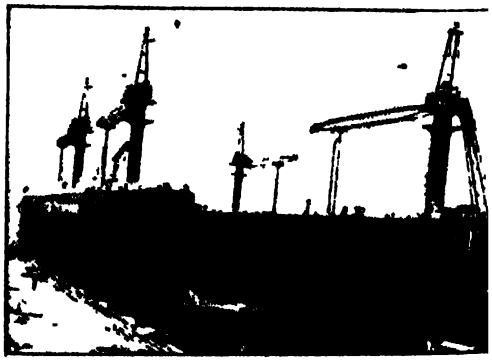
There are emotional reasons, too For a country which had its heyday in the 16th century, Portugal remains rather sentimental, living somewhat in its past Some feel that, perhaps, recollecting its role in 'Portuguese India' helps to enhance the self-esteem of a country struggling on the lower rungs of the west European scale

There are even better reasons In 1999, Lisbon's administrative control over the island of Macao, off mainland China, comes to an end Like Hong Kong, this tiny region, too, will be returned to China In this context, it might make good sense to build other baskets in which Lisbon's egg could be laid, so to speak

The Portuguese initiative obviously is three-fold — economic, cultural and social Of these, the attempted business links have been the least controversial

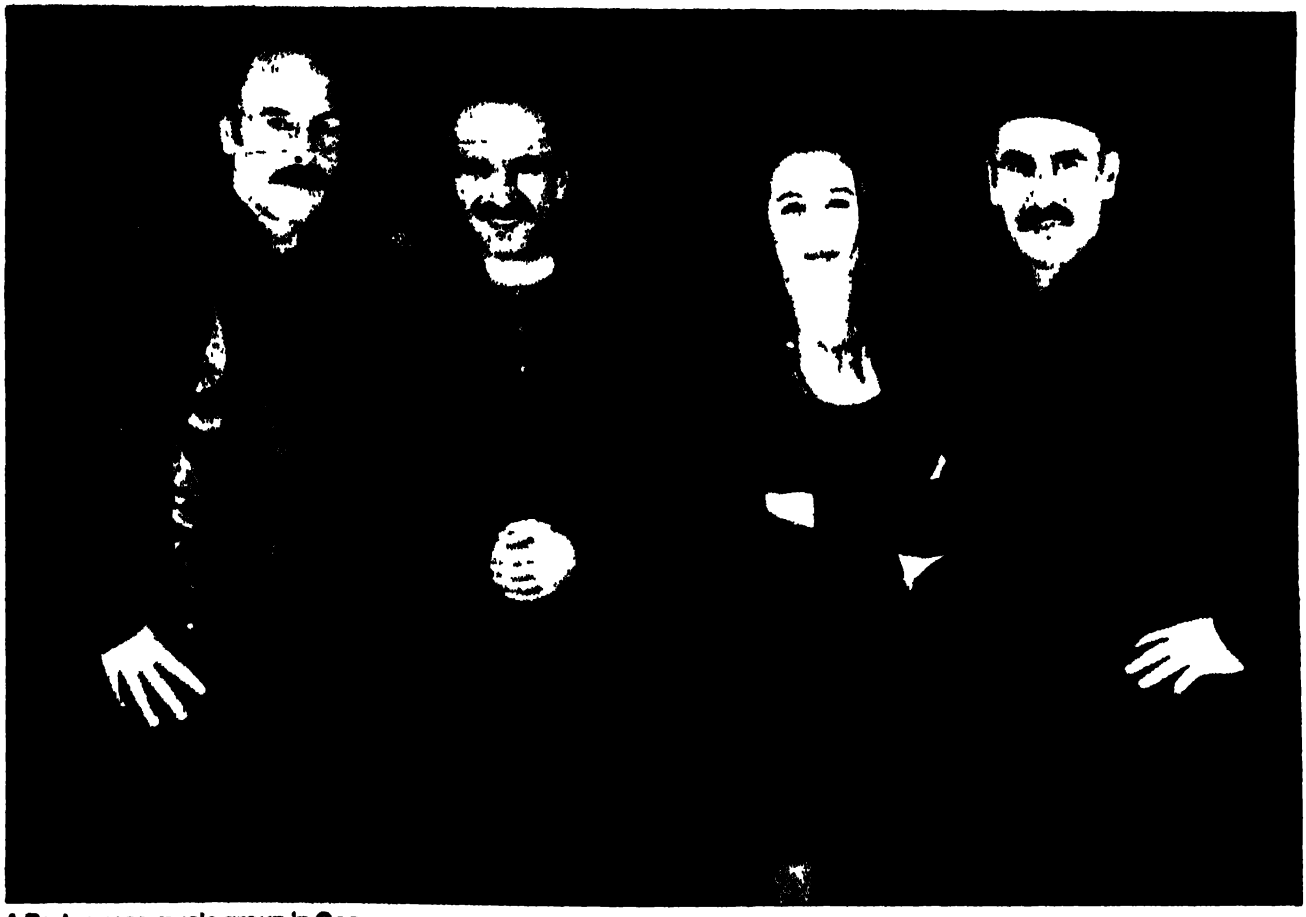
On the cultural front, the Portugue

Portugal conquered Goa [illegible] so says history, with [illegible] some quarters which [illegible] the end of Muslim rule in the region. Initially, the Portuguese (who had themselves just emerged from an era of Muslim rule in their Southern European home) slaughtered the Muslims in a horrifying bloodbath they themselves later boasted about.



But things soon took a different turn. The Portuguese, brought in to terminate Muslim dominance, themselves started ruling this region — the longest colonial rule ever in India, and perhaps Asia — till 1961.

se have flown in singers and chefs, held book exhibitions and linked up with satellites for Portuguese programmes here A Portuguese foundation, called Fundacao Oriente, which has its base in the offshore enclave of Macao, and Lisbon recently set up headquarters in Goa



Just as it was being set up sometime in April, there were objections that Fundacao Oriente was actually being funded by gambling money from Macao Carlos Monjardino, Fundacao Oriente president, acknowledges the accusation is true But it is nothing unusual, he maintains, for gambling is legally sanctioned there and there is no moral revulsion attached to it in either Macao or Portugal

During an exhibition of Portuguese books, the titles were priced very cheaply, reminding one of the former USSR's political tracts sold at throwaway prices in India earlier Within five minutes, all the dictionaries in Portuguese were sold out, amid a small stampede of sorts Some

700-plus page dictionaries were sold for as little as Rs 50

"Nobody gives you something for nothing. With cultural grants or aid, there are always strings attached. The purpose is to gain an influence," cautions South Goa MP and Union minister, Eduardo Faleiro He points out that India, too, indulges in this "in good measure" in regions like Mauritius or the Caribbean.

Chief minister Pratapsing Rane has already noted the importance Goa was giving to do business with the Portuguese. With mixed feelings — indifference, and uncertainty about the outcome — the moves are firmly on to re-establish ties which go back centuries

Much of the suspicion may be misplaced But as in fairytales, could there be a happy ending to this relationship which was often unhappy in earlier times?

BENGALI AHOY!

When it comes to travelling, none can beat the Bengalis
Bishakha De Sarkar on the great mobile (upwardly, downwardly, horizontally, in any direction) race*

After a bone-wrenching trek, our friend, Malini, reached the last Indian village near the China border after a six-day-long, ordeal with a group of mountaineers

Huffing and puffing, their feet aching, their backs breaking, their lungs bursting, the trekkers finally paused for breath at Chitkul in Himachal Pradesh

Malini looked at the awesome mountains that circled the tiny village in the back of beyond, next to the no-man's land that bordered China This, then, was distant Chitkul in Kinnaur, where few outsiders had ever been Malini soaked in the fresh mountain air, the wild colours of untouched flowers, the warm rays of an unknown sun, the silence of a desolate land

Suddenly, a decrepit state transport bus screeched to a grinding halt near the village And out trooped a column of Bengalis old grandmothers in starched white cotton saris, ageing men in dhotis and sneakers, young sons in woollen trousers and off-white shawls, wives in crisp Bengali taant and their little children in monkey-caps

"Ai, idhar gorom jol milegaa (Is warm water available here?)," a gentleman with a loud voice asked befuddled villagers

If the story has a moral, it is simply this much as you may try, you just cannot keep a Bengali traveller down

Harsh deserts, snowy passes, idyllic hideouts and bustling towns — you will find Bengalis everywhere

They are there during the mellow days of the Pujas, in the cruel months of winter, in the frisky weeks of spring, in the dead heat of summer and in the tempestuous period of the monsoons Umbrella in hand, Borolin in pocket, Digene in bag and monkey-cap on head, the Bengali has touched the remotest spots on the Indian map

Of course, other Indians travel, too, but few seem to do it with the single-minded determination that spurs the Bengali The Bengali journeys against all odds, with little money, but with immense dedication They are great day-trippers, touch all points of interest next to their base, assiduously visit museums and forts and imbibe as much knowledge as they can in a packed seven-day schedule

The Malayalee and the Punjabi appear to travel more for business than fun It has been said — though unfortunately never verified — that when Hillary and Norgay climbed Mount Everest, they found a lone Malayalee on the world's highest peak "Coffee venno (Do you want coffee?)," asked the man with a steaming coffee percolator and a sharp business sense

Gujaratis are other inveterate wayfarers, but their mode of travel is substantially different from that of the Bengalis Gujaratis move around in music-blaring Marutis, put up at the best of hotels and dine in upmarket restaurants

Most Bengalis, on the other hand, travel by bus or train, stay at smaller and inexpensive hotels — usually at the market-place or inexplicably near the railway station — and generally move around on a shoe-string budget

Just last fortnight, three busloads of Bengalis were spotted on a Delhi highway The buses, with West Bengal numberplates, had brought them all the way from Calcutta and were taking them right back home after a tour of the North With towels and gamchhas acting as curtains over the windows, the tired Bengalis lolled around on their seats, looking both sated and spent

The Bengali, indeed, can travel in great discomfort But you will not see them late in the evenings, cavorting on the Mall in Manali or at Scandal Point in Shimla By dusk, they are in their rooms, with hot-water bottles, and getting ready to call it a day And early in the morning, when the sky is still an inky blue, they are to be seen at distant peak points, patiently waiting for the first sun rays to lighten up the dark sky

The only time we saw Bengalis a trifle put out was in Kosani in Uttar Pradesh some years ago It could have been a particularly fussy group, or it could have been the non-stop, all-night-long Dylan singing in the adjoining room that triggered the spark

By the next morning, a bunch of grim Bengali men had thrown the gauntlet There was a bitter fight between the group of 20-odd Bengalis — luggage in hand — and the hotel owners "And you should know, our ladies are used to commodes," said one Bengali as a parting shot — no doubt clinching the argument — before herding his family out of the hotel

Yet another aspect of travel that bugs the good Bengali is the unhappy fact that fish is not easily available everywhere

Of course, knowing the Bengalis' penchant for home food, most tourist spots have now made adequate arrangements to suit the picky Bengali palate Large placards proudly proclaim in shaky Bengali letters "Ekhane maachh-bhaat pawa jaye (rice and fish are available here)" are as common as the hydrangea blossoms in the hills

Not that all Bengalis like to take a chance when something as grave as food is concerned A group of people from West Bengal, travelling in the Kumaon hills, had prudently taken their own maharaj (cook) along That summer, tourists meandering through the Kumaon had to often give way to three Bengali men purposefully carrying a squawking cockerel each

A tourist operator in Delhi holds that though the Bengali traveller is more open to tasting alien cuisine today, he still wants his staple Bengali diet every now and then But stubborn places like Mussoorie continue to deny the poor Bengalis a taste of aquamarine life, a la kalia or shorshey

"So many Bengalis travel to Mussoorie," rues the operator, "and not one place where they offer Bengali fish"

Enterprising Bengalis, of course, always find a way out of such hardships Some years ago, a Bengali tourist, travelling extensively in the then Soviet Union, yearned for a bit of maachher jhol, but there was none to be found in the uncompromising restaurants of Moscow

Then suddenly, just by chance, he managed to lay his hands on just what he wanted He ordered some fish soup, and found — to his great glee — that the bland, clear liquid with pieces of fish floating helplessly in it was just the right substitute for maachher jhol

So, as all Bengalis will tell you, when there is a will, there is a way And, of course, as everybody else will say, wherever there is a way, there is a Bengali there ■

THE WORDS RUN ON

I must have been eight or nine when my father gave me a small diary, and I began my first tentative forays as a writer or wordsmith, as I have sometimes described my calling Many of those early diary entries were lists- -books read, gramophone records collected, films seen and enjoyed — but even this indulgence was a discipline of sorts and was to stand me in good stead in later years

It made me neat and meticulous, and helped me form the habit of keeping notes and filing away facts, not perhaps essential attributes for a writer, but useful ones

Young writers with natural talent are often handicapped by untidy working habits A friend of mine wrote quite brilliantly but always contrived to lose his manuscripts He now breeds Angora rabbits

During World War 11, my father was serving in the WAF and had to put me in a boarding school in the hill-station of Simla, then the summer capital of British India

I discovered Dickens in the school library, and, captivated by David Copperfield, decided I was going to be a writer like David, who was really Charles Dickens

At the age of 12 I did, in fact, write a short novel, an account of school life —eulogies of my friends, mostly — but it was confiscated by my teacher who thought I was wasting my time He may well have been right

These schoolboy efforts were, however, not really wasted I found I could write in a busy classroom, noisy dormitory, or corner of a playing field That is, when I really wanted to As William Saroyan once said, "All you need is paper" and there was no shortage of that — empty paper bags, wrappers, pages torn from exercise books, the backs of calendars and school circulars The wartime paper shortage did not defeat me

Writing under such conditions, sometimes with a pillow-fight raging around me, was good training too Later in life I found, I was able to write in the crowded compartment of a moving train, or in a room full of children

I love solitude and there is no pleasure to equal that of writing a poem under a blossoming cherry tree, but I am a compulsive writer and when I want to put words to paper I am not fussy about the conditions

Even as I write this piece, a wedding procession is passing along the road beneath my window It is led by a twelve-piece band, at least six of the instruments being trumpets! The drummers have stationed themselves beneath the window My cherry tree is a far cry Yet the cacophony won't stop me from completing this essay Play on, band! Blow, blow, thou windy trumpets! Your piercing notes may have loosened the wax in my ears, but my hand remains steady, the words run on

I had lost my father before I finished my schooling, and at the age of 17, I found myself in the English Channel Islands working in a grocery store, and writing late at night in an attic room provided by an aunt

Most of my relatives were pessimistic about my literary prospects and there were no literary influences on the Islands Late one winter evening I walked along the sea-front, a lonely

Late one winter evening I walked along the sea-front, a lonely figure on the esplanade while a wind of gale-force blew in from the sea, whipping the salt spray against my face. The tide was in, great waves crashed against the sea wall, sending plumes of water over the ramparts. 'This is it!' I thought, these are signs and portents. I must have more resolve. I must not give up

figure on the esplanade while a wind of gale force blew in from the sea, whipping the salt spray against my face The tide was in, great waves crashed against the sea wall, sending plumes of water over the ramparts "This is it!" I thought, these are signs and portents I must have more resolve I must not give up

I decided I would leave for London the next day I was David Copperfield, of course, the grocery store found itself short of an assistant while a London travel agency was richer by a very inexperienced clerk I think it suffered a little because of me, but we both survived, and the first novel got written in fits and starts at weekends and on holidays I was bold enough to look for a publisher and brash enough to find one

'All glory comes from daring to begin' said the blurb on the dust cover of my book But in truth, Glory did nothing of the sort After receiving a few encouraging reviews, the book all but disappeared from sight But the advance I received enabled me to return to India More determined than ever to be a full-time writer

In Dehra Dun, the small town I had known as a boy, I set up a 'shop' in a small apartment near the bazaar and made a precarious living from submitting my stories and articles to the English language press in India

But this was one of the happiest periods of my life Still in my twenties, I was independent, free to write as I pleased, monarch of all I surveyed — which was the local bus stand, a row of small barber shops, and a large tamarind tree dominating everything else When I passed through Dehra the other day, I was glad to find the tamarind still there

After two years of freelancing, circumstances took me to Delhi and Bombay, but I have always preferred the small towns of India to its cities I feel lost in the big city, and too much the stranger in a village I'm a small town person and when I came to live in the hills and freelance again, it was on the outskirts of a small town that I took up residence

This is, for the most part, a quiet place, and it suits a quiet person If I want to write on a sunny hillside or in the shade of a chestnut tree, there is nothing to prevent me from doing so But I like my desk near the window, close to the busy little road leading to the bazaar The daily business of life does not distract me

The marriage procession with its out-of-tune band has moved on Now a car has stalled on its way up the hill A truck on the way down cannot get past There is a furious honking of horns and an exchange of words which are not in the best interests of global harmony It is all part of my writing life Blow your horn, charioteer! My hand is steady, and the words run on

SUMMER IN SUBURBIA

Summer in England, once schools have broken up, is a time to learn Parents gird their loins and prepare to travel up to London to take their children to the Natural History Museum, or the zoo, or the London Dungeon or Madame Tussaud's or the excellent Museum of the Moving Image where they can stand back and relax as their children fly like Superman up the Thames, take part in a mock TV interview, or learn to make a primitive cartoon

Wherever they go in London they will feel they are in a minority This is, you see, also the time of the year when foreign students descend in droves Once Britain colonised and ruled a huge pink area on the globe, its language a symbol of its might

Now, each summer England is itself colonised, if only temporarily, by tens of thousands of youngsters all come to sightsee and practice their English, perhaps the country's last great asset

I, too, with my best friend in school, became a guide for five young Sicilians fresh from Palermo Together, on one very hot summer's day we visited the Houses of Parliament, St James' Park, Trafalgar Square, The British Museum, Covent Garden market (for shopping — Italian students love shopping), Waterloo Bridge and the Museum of the Moving Image

We started with five students and we ended with five which is a miracle because today's children just won't walk in crocodiles and whenever I counted them during the day I could find no more than four I was exhausted by the evening and so, I am glad to say, were they

In the process I learnt many things For example, British television's coverage of the House of Lords often shows peers of the realm reclining on the red upholstery as if asleep or dead However, they are neither Small amplifiers are fitted into the seats in such a position that you cannot hear speeches through them unless you are practically supine

Taking other children to the zoo and the Natural History Museum, I was forced to learn more about the damage we are doing to our environment and the species we are destroying But, then, even in suburbia you cannot escape ecological disaster stories

The last one I mentioned in this column was the falling fertility levels in Europe due to pollution Word of mouth in suburbia had it that we were inhaling substances which disbalanced hormones That is not necessarily true It seems more likely that these substances are in food and drink

First the evidence A team of Parisian doctors led by Dr Augur studied donations to a Paris sperm bank by 1300 donors between 1973 and 1990 Their conclusion, a blow to macho French pride, was that sperm counts of Parisian men had fallen by a third over this period The finding confirmed evidence from three previous studies which had already reported that European fertility patterns were changing

Although the French government and the chemical industry attempted to discredit Dr Augur's evidence, the British government accepted it and has linked falling fertility with rises in breast and testicular cancer

Now each summer England is itself colonised, if only temporarily, by tens of thousands of youngsters all come to sightsee and practice their English, perhaps the country's last great asset

But why is this happening? Ecologists think they have the answer They put the blame on synthetic organic chemicals, 197 5 billion kilograms of which are produced in the US alone each year, most of which ends up in humans

Ecologists point out that hormone-disrupting chemicals have been found in wildlife from the Arctic to Antarctica If their hormones can be disrupted, so can ours

The defence, represented by governments, scientists and industry (the latter nowadays funding much scientific research) argue that chemicals are innocent until proven guilty and that tests they make prove chemicals are safe

The ecologists reply that this is a polluters' charter and that present-day testing methods are hopelessly outdated Many scientists, too, believe that we cannot correctly assess the effect of chemicals we do not fully understand on our biology which we don't prperly understand either There is no long-term research on the effect of these chemicals, either singly or in combinations, on humans

Such research would have to be extensive to be effective, bearing in mind that over 1,000 new chemicals come on the market each year

In short, we do not know for sure what is causing fertility rates to fall, but something certainly is

Public opinion in suburbia and many other parts of the West, however, backs the ecologists against industry and its allies, government and scientists

Although the green lobby's scientific claims often lack objectivity, they have been proved right on such issues as the dangers of nuclear radiation, asbestos dust causing cancer, CFCs causing ozone damage and the dangers of acid rain The triumvirate of vested interests has too often been seen to be forced by them into considering the public good

BURNING DESIRES

Books continue to be written about Katharine Hepburn, one of Hollywood's most enigmatic characters. The latest biography, says Martin Walker, dwells on her life and lovers including Spencer Tracy (who thought she was a whore)

Only one woman knows the answers. And Katharine Hepburn is not telling whether she had an affair with director John Ford, or whether her lifelong lover, Spencer Tracy, had VD and thought of her as a whore

"My privacy is my own I am the one to decide whether it will be invaded," is perhaps the best known line from the only Hollywood actress to win four Oscars

She is now fiercely guarding that privacy in the storm over the 20th book her life has inspired "The rest is silence," was the only on-the-record comment to emerge from Hepburn's camp, told by her agent Freya Manston The fuss began with the publication of Barbara Leaming's new biography, Katharine Hepburn

Its ecstatic review in the New York Times was followed by an almost unprecedented two pages of attacks and defence Dan Ford, grandson and biographer of the director who made Stagecoach and The Grapes of Wrath, complains that John Ford was no drunk and that there was no grand affair

Leaming, he concludes, has wildly exaggerated the relationship as "one of several convenient plot devices to add drama, mystery and a new twist to what is otherwise another ho-hum biography." Selden West, the authorised biographer of Spencer Tracy, is apoplectic, accusing Leaming of bending "the facts to establish a romantic triangle that simply never existed"

With Spencer Tracy in Woman of the Year: Rage pair

Katharine Hepburn, Spencer Tracy and John Ford are as eminent a triad as Hollywood has ever produced.

And a feud which has their heirs and biographers locked in a vicious dispute over who did what with whom in Hollywood's golden days would be news enough. But from her first screen hit in Little Women, Hepburn has always been a symbol of a great actress She foreshadowed a generation of self-confident, assertive and above all intelligent feminism that was to become a social and political force in the Seventies The great power of her films with Tracy, from Woman of the Year to Adam's Rib, stemmed from the way that this unusually self-reliant woman was fated to subordination by her own will

The great fascination of her life story stems equally from the degree to which it was parallel ed in her film life with Tracy They never married, because he would not give up his Catholic wife But they were together for 27 years, and made nine films together He died 17 days after they finished Guess Who's Coming to Dinner, and she has never been able to watch it, although the role won her an Oscar In Hepburn's autobiography, Me, she chronicles an extraordinary relationship

It saw her sleeping outside his hotel bedroom when he was on a drunken bender and saying her farewell at the funeral parlour, leaving him to be buried by the woman who was still his wife "I always say Spencer grew me beyond my potential," was Hepburn's own summary in a film she made two years ago, called All About Me "I made it. I know a lot about life I've been lucky. Thank you, Spencer."

In Leaming's account, the relationship becomes a nightmare, with a man who beats up prostitutes, and believes his VD caused the deafness of his son. "A cruel, erratic figure" who was driven to drag Hepburn down into his own misery and darkness. "Full of self-loathing as he was, he seemed to enjoy humiliating Kate by bringing her down to his own level; turning a woman of that calibre into his mistress. Tracy reminded himself and others of the moral depths to which he had sunk."

Hepburn: 'Katharine of Arrogance'

Leaming presents Tracy as the antithesis of the Hepburn family and its feminist values. She chronicles a disastrous visit when Hepburn took him to the patrician family beachhouse on the Connecticut shore

"The Hepburns did not argue with his conservative views or ask whether he intended to marry their daughter " Tracy's official biographer counters that there is no evidence for the venereal infection, and that it is "an utter falsehood" to assert that he would visit Hepburn in the evening, have his drunken way "and leave when he had finished".

Leaming does not suggest the Hepburn-Ford relationship was sexually consummated Although she calls them "lovers", she admits she does not know But she does claim that Ford was the only person who understood Hepburn, while going on to infuriate his family by claiming he was "a periodic alcoholic" who turned to Hepburn to escape his "shrill and argumentative and monstrous wife"

The usual drama of Hepburn's private life has been dated to the Forties and Fifties, the years with Tracy The documentary record for the Ford-Hepburn affair is thin; five letters from him, of which only one is explicitly romantic, and 16 from her, including postcards and telegrams.

Since Hepburn is not talking, we may never know what happened. Her autobiography says only. "We became friends, and from time to time during his life we met." Whatever its flavour, the friendship with Ford took place during the most gruelling phase of her career "Katharine of Arrogance" became her Hollywood nickname, reflecting the spiky, uncompromising personality which matched the screen roles that enthralled, but also baffled the cinema audiences of the Thirties

Sylvia Scarlett in 1936 saw the first overt flirtation with androgyny, a blurring of male-female roles that was as old as the theatre, but startling in Hollywood Her studio, RKO, tried to force her into roles she despised She bought out her contract, weathered the charge that she was "box-office poison" and Dorothy Parker's celebrated sneer that "Miss Hepburn runs the gamut of human emotions from A to B"

She remade her career by starring on Broadway in The Philadelphia Story, and armed with the film rights to the play came back to storm Hollywood again. But this time it was on her own terms, and she remained as assertive off-camera as she was on set, quite ready to bully any man, except Tracy.

"She lectured the hell out of me on temperance and the evils of drink," recalled Humphrey Bogart, after they made The African Queen. "She doesn't give a damn how she looks. I don't think she tries to be a character I think she is one."

And so she remains, after a new biography and a literary row which has the publishers celebrating As Hepburn says in The Philadelphia Story "Oh, we're going to talk about me, are we? Goody!"

(The Guardian News Service)

Ford was the only person who understood Hepburn, while going on to infuriate his family by claiming he was 'a periodic alcoholic' who turned to Hepburn to escape his 'shrill and argumentative...and monstrous wife'

The Fringe

The train gathered speed,
Time is crucial to a tarveller
eager to be gone
Outside, the daylight was failing and I had left my life
just like a parked car

When I pushed up the window of the compartment strange faces
flurried against my face
As the train raced towards the curve of the earth
I realised — the disguise had been taken off me

Stripped of my mask
my body looked unreal
as though sprayed with blue paint and suspended on a cliff
Here on the fringe yesterday looks like a vista that has retreated
into a snowy haze

A Rare Bird

I am aware where the farmer in his farmstead
And the woman in her slum are nightly slaughtered
I know too, how eccentric distortions get vulgar acceptance and pass as art

Here the river blesses sprouting crops and their roots
And it is here that people lose a patch
Of the dark soil of their dreaming

A dead artist's gifts remembered incites the feelings and the stern trees bend in grief

It's scaring the way animals hunt here!
Some just knock your shelters to the ground While others whet a taste for human flesh

It has come to such a pass that even if his flute emits a lone note predators stalk and kill the unwary cowherd

Such a pass that even he is a rare bird of poetry
Who finds a friend in each standing tree

Sea in the Fishermen's Village

Every night the sea rushes into the fishing village
When black corpses would be rolling on the roadside
When queers warm themselves by the fire in the shivering cold
And when age dances beneath the arrogant breast—
At all times the sea
rushes into the fishing village

It pushes open the frail palm-frond door
Moving on tiptoe to put out the oilwick lamp Laying out the wounds to dry on a fishy mat
Plunging into a body of bones
And smouldering in the smoke of burnt sandalwood Towards morning the shadows of blood
Grow long to reach the seashore,
The sea gets lost in some island,
Corpses would be arranging the pyre
The queers dressing themselves in expensive silks

And slowly, the light would be coming back

Once again darkness piles up
In the sea's eyes, and each night
The sea rushes into the fishing village.

VINOD KAMBLI, for much of his career, has lived under the shadow of his younger school chum Sachin Tendulkar. Except, of course, for a while in early 1993 when he registered double-hundreds in successive Tests. In more recent times, he has not had the same luck. In the Asia Cup, he was even dropped from the first 11. But Kambli, who is prone to experimenting with earrings and his visage, is more than determined to be a megahit in the coming season

Trouble in Tribal Land

■ Though the decline of ancient tribal traditions is lamentable (because of various religious influences), it cannot be denied that such forces contribute greatly towards the well-being of these sections ('At the Crossroads', August 6)

Both Hinduism and Christianity are highly advanced religions, modern in thought and outlook, and have a deep impact on believers

Cut off from the mainstream and living in a world dominated by pagan beliefs and rituals, the tribals are grossly unaware of science and still hold many evils (like killing their womenfolk for being witches) as part of their life

Religious forces should work towards eradicating such ills from tribal society and not just make them pawns in their nefarious designs to acquire power.

Talking of keeping alive tribal culture and tradition sounds politically correct, but does it also not mean keeping them in the darkness of ignorance?

Brando's Last Tango

■ That Marlon Brando had a disastrous personal life is known to all, but did it warrant so many pages of graphic reporting ('The Marlon Mystique', July 30)?

Brando as an actor and star is unsurpassed in Hollywood; each film presented him in a fresh role — A Streetcar Named Desire, On the Waterfront, Viva Zapata, The Godfather, The Last Tango in Paris.

As lovers of Hollywood movies and its icons we would like to learn more about Brando as an actor. Why do we need to delve into his personal affairs?

A genius, we all know, is most often eccentric And for such a superb actor caprices and eccentricities cannot be ruled out.

Remember Romeo?

■ The cover story, 'So You Think 13 is Unlucky?' (July 9) where the writer talks about Romeo and Juliet was highly offensive William Shakespeare must have turned in his grave

It would prove very lucrative for the writer if he turned to penning scripts for third-rate Hindi films

I had expected the cover story would help erase the stigma attached to the figure 13 But it turned out to be a story full of cheap humour

I have been reading the Magazine since my school days and I have been noticing a discernible deterioration in the quality of its articles

As this is the 50th anniversay of World War II why don't you publish something on this?

Rekha as the middleclass housewife who strays; in Aastha

Gulzar, Basu Bhattacharya and Rekha: Taking stock

Rekha has staged yet another coup in the autumn of her career She stars in a revolutionary role in Basu Bhattacharya's Aastha, a film that promises to blaze a new trail, as he tells Vaishali Honawar

HUMAN RELATIONSHIPS HAVE ALWAYS INTRIgued Basu Bhattacharya. And every film he has made has been an exploration of and a tribute to the complex and delicate bond between man and woman, be it Teesri Kasam, Anubhav, Aavishkar, Grihapravesh — or his latest venture, Aastha (In the prison of spring).

"The man-woman relationship is the most basic relationship of all," says the producer-director explaining his fixation.

"All the problems in the world are created by this relationship — if the seed relationship goes wrong, everything else goes wrong, too."

And everything goes wrong in Aastha, starring Om Puri and Rekha, where the director takes a look at how the middleclass of this

Basu Bhattacharya deals with the woman's sexuality head-on.... 'She's a loving wife and a loving mother, but she's sexually unfulfilled and as a prostitute that is something she gains,' he says. 'Which doesn't mean she doesn't love her husband. She tries to make their sex life more interesting...'

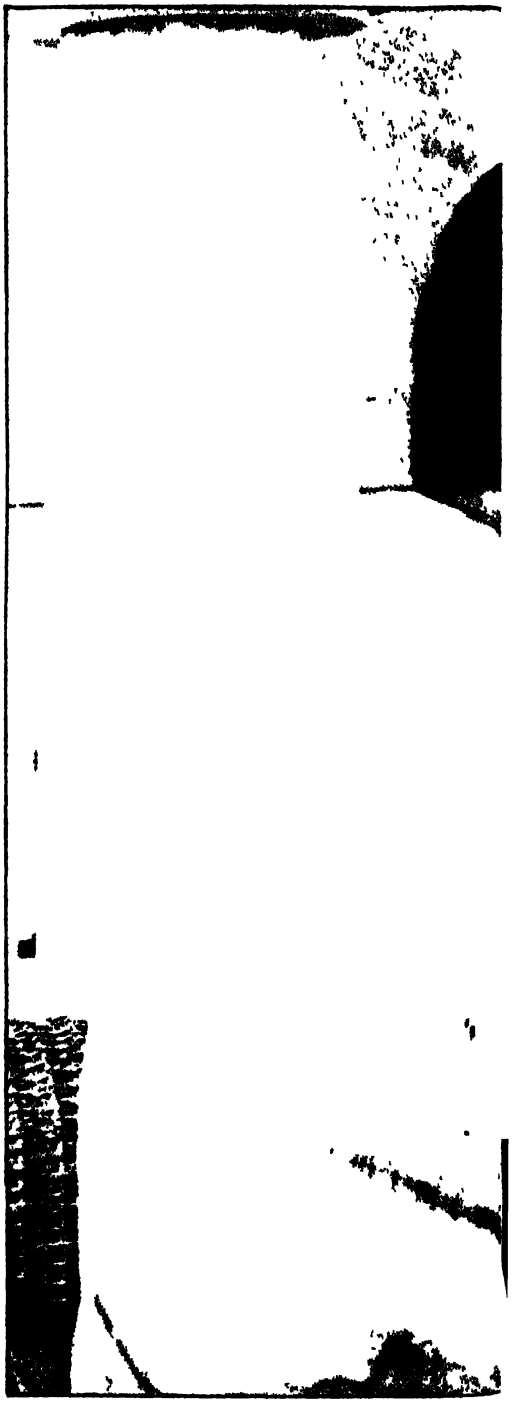
country copes with the pressures and lure of consumerism

The film, written, produced and directed by Bhattacharya himself, is about an honest professor who earns just his salary and nothing more because he needs whatever spare time he can get to spend with his wife and daughter

They, on the other hand, want more of the worldly comforts they see around themselves than he can afford

The daughter goes to boarding school where she studies alongside the children of rich parents and soon she begins to ask for 'rich things', too When she wants a pair of Nike shoes and the mother pleads with her husband to buy them, he counters with middleclass logic "What she needs are shoes, they don't have to be Nike "

The film takes a rather shocking turn when the wife, having failed to prod her husband into taking tuitions after college hours, lets herself be drawn into prostitution through a procuress (played by the child actress of yesteryear, Daisy Irani) to earn that extra buck



And she starts lying to her husband to explain away the expensive things she buys

Bhattacharya deals with the woman's sexuality head-on instead of skirting it "She's a loving wife and a loving mother, but she's sexually unfulfilled and as a prostitute that is something she gains," he says

"Which doesn't mean she doesn't love her husband — she would never leave him She even tries to make their sex life more interesting with her newly acquired knowledge and when he asks her where she learnt it, she tells him she saw a blue film at the neighbour's house "

Om Puri and Rekha: Estranged bed fellows

Om Puri with Anweshna Bhattacharya: Moral

Parallel to this tale runs the story of a collegian couple, the girl played by Bhattacharya's daughter, Anweshna Here, too, Bhattacharya takes life into the fast track, with this daughter of well-to-do parents letting a middle-aged man at the restaurant of a five-star hotel mistake her for a hooker, while she's waiting for her boyfriend who's stuck in the local train

She goes to bed with the man and walks out with even more money to entertain her middleclass boyfriend in a restaurant where "people eat money".

One cannot help but wonder if such questions

a story of frank promiscuity will be swallowed by Indian audiences, leave alone digested, but Bhattacharya is quite confident "Our audiences are very mature, they can take anything if there is truth in it And I haven't portrayed a thing in this film which is away from reality All these things are happening around us, given the consumerism in today's world "

Bhattacharya is simultaneously shooting the film in English and Hindi This is the first time he is making a bilingual as he feels the subject has international appeal and he would like to screen it abroad as well

The film has been shot mostly in Bombay, in Bhattacharya's own picturesque house off Bandra Seaface, and has music by Sharang Dev with lyrics by Gulzar Eighty per cent of the film has already been shot and Bhattacharya is hoping to release it by October this year

Rekha, who is working in just a few films at the moment, including Mira Nair's Kamasutra, has been totally deglamorised for Aastha and wears a sari and no makeup through most of it

So what made Bhattacharya cast glamourpuss Rekha — this is the first time he is working with her — with the realistic cinema hero, Om Puri? "I saw them just as two very good actors," he says, admitting that many have been stunned by the combination "I needed talented people, not good-looking or glamorous ones "

Rekha is certainly capable of delivering the goods, and so is Om Puri And Bhattacharya himself has consistently proved his worth as a director over the decades

But the acid test remains will the film convince the Indian mind?

THE ULTIMATE RIDDLE

If Churchill had met Rekha, would he have changed his mind about Russia?

If to Winston Churchill, Russia was "a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma", he had obviously not encountered Rekha People began writing her off 15 years back, and have been doing so every two years or so But Rekha, the ultimate Madame X, continues to defy age, their predictions and even, perhaps, her own expectations

Her last 'comeback film' (when did she ever go away?), Geetanjali, might not have done much for her image (at last, at last, her critics cried), but she unleashed a series of devastating photographs in magazines again She, as usual, has to be seen to be believed

Even if it is only the face everyone concentrates on, no other face must have been put so consistently on the covers of non-film magazines, and for so long That's the true test of a filmstar who's really got 'it'

If one goes by her films, too, the Sawan Bhadon girl, crude and gross as they come, went on to become a kaddu-chhaap sex symbol with sufficient bovine appeal But after Do Anjaane and Amitabh Bachchan, she metamorphosed into a cosmetic butterfly, soon to be unrivalled

Come to think of it, Do Anjaane itself was a revelation of her acting skills The role, even at the time of its making, was fairly daring, almost an anti-role, which most leading ladies at that time would consider suicidal to touch She played an ordinary housewife who is lured by the arclights and decides to walk out of home, husband and child for her own personal ambition

If she played a strong willed tawaif in Muqaddar Ka Sikandar, giving a strong hue to a typical role, her lead role in Girish Karnad's Utsav was certainly a coup Later, Muzaffar Ali's Umrao Jaan, with Rekha in the title role, became an art film which acknowledged the fact that without Rekha it could not have been half as perfect, it harked back to the casting of Meena Kumari in Kamal Amrohi's Pakeezah

The other films she did by art filmmakers were Shyam Benegal's Kalyug and Govind Nihalani's Vijeta

Hrishikesh Mukherjee dared to call her one of our finest actresses even while she was doing commercial films (and he was hung up on Jaya Bhaduri) and the distinction between 'art' and 'commercial' films was very sharp, the fact that she went on to do those 'art films' was, therefore, only proving Hrishida's point

About that time, he also cast her in Alaap and Khubsoorat, one serious and the other a ripoff film, where she did an incredible ripoff on HIM!

betrayed wife, rather than the other woman, in Gulzar's Ijaazat with rare panache

And you had Ghar, arguably her best performance to date, where she plays a rape victim Her husband, Vinod Mehra, is understanding and supportive, but nevertheless she has to go through trauma the brilliance of her performance is matched only by the meatiness of the character

With Amitabh Bachchan in Do Anjaane: The film that changed her life and career

In Khoon Bhari Maang, she played a scorned woman, an ordinary housewife again, who transforms herself into a ravishing model so as to ensnare her rat of a husband

A film that will go down in history as the casting coup of the century, however, is Yash Chopra's Silsila, an autobiographical replay of current history by Amitabh, Jaya and Rekha At the opposite end, she played the

And you thought this time she was really through? Mira Nair didn't She has cast her in her forthcoming Kamasutra, and no, she didn't consider Mamta Kulkarni or Shilpa Shetty for the role first Not to speak of the bold character she portrays in Basu Bhattacharya's Aastha

Sanjay Prasad

KNOT SO EASY

Basu Bhattacharya continues his obsession with the man-woman relationship

Rajesh Khanna and Sharmila Tagore in Avishkar

The delicate dialectics of the man-woman relationship, at once intimate and alienating, has obsessed Basu Bhattacharya It all began with the cinematic gem, Teesri Kasam, an unusual love story of a gaadiwaan and a nautch girl whom he ferries across to his village for the nautanki and falls head over heels in love with

She, too is charmed by his simple and winning ways, but tries to break off to get over a guilt complex he is too simple to understand that she is, after all, a naachnewali with loose morals But their love is fated and fated to doom, too

The turmoil in the man-woman relationship continues because of ones search for peace and progress beyond the four walls of the homes "We want to find happiness in the marketplace," claimed the filmmaker referring to the unabashed consumerist culture swamping our lives

If this is the theme of his latest venture, Aastha, it also dominates his earlier trilogy, Anubhav, Avishkar and Grihapravesh

In Anubhav, a rich creative man who got married to a middleclass woman has an ethos which is markedly different from that of his wife The film begins six years after their marriage and ends when they fell in love The woman tried to create a situation where she would be indispensable to the man – an attitude of a beloved wife, not a beloved's

She confesses to her husband when he suspects her, that her boyfriend, without so much as a touch, has given her in six hours what he could not give in six years That is an enormous statement and her husband understands, as does Amar in Aastha towards the end

In Avishkar, the lovers get married They are two individuals striving to become one, fighting to salvage their crumbling relationship Proximity breeds irritability and trivialities begin to loom large and drive a wedge between the two

And in Grihapravesh the man is an accountant whose dream is to save up for 10 years and then make a home, little realising that youth, unlike money, cannot be saved for a rainy day Naturally, the other woman enters the frame

Relationships are meant to be repaired, not replaced, an underlying motive which ran through his earlier trilogy and now through Aastha as well

In Panchavati, the woman lets go of her superficial marriage to a man who cannot understand her mind but covets her body, and has children by his elder brother with whom she shares a curious bond

Though the elder brother is going through a broken marriage, it is Sadhvi, the heroine, who has the guts to break the fetters of convention and create a 'Panchavati' of her own The film throws up the query as to why physical union is called 'sleeping together

It is not a coincidence that in the trilogy, as in Aastha, the names of the two main characters are Amar and Manasi Amar, meaning somebody who does not die, and Manasi, meaning creation of the mind Both these names embody love, affection, caring and sharing

Though not exactly prototypes, they are tools with which the director communicates to his people Togetherness brings in fulfilment, says the filmmaker, no wonder Aastha begins with a scene in a classroom where the professor tells his students that Romeo and Juliet is not a love story for the characters suffer on their own Love stories are always lived together by people

And there are directors like Basu Bhattacharya to create them

LOVE IN THE AFTERNOON

The re-release of Belle de Jour in America has propelled France's Catherine Deneuve to new heights of glory and fame

Age does not wither her or her glacial charms For 'Paris symbol', Catherine Deneuve, had America recently in the grips — of her icy mesmerising spell

So what if her film, Belle de Jour, is 28 years old It continued to enchant America, raking in the dollars

Directed by the surrealist Spanish director, Luis Bunel in 1967, the film made a comeback in late June this year, by no means ready to return to the archives

Lauded by critics, the film has swept across 70 cinemas in the country, earning $1 5 million at the box-office — a shocking figure by art film standards

For nearly 20 years, Bunel's Belle de Jour was in the cans, until filmmaker Martin Scorsese got the rights and released it

The film has nothing by way of modern pyrotechnics, but an eroticism that could hardly be called sexually revealing

The key to all the fizz in the film is Deneuve's timeless good looks and tantalising reserve — both on and off-screen, ensuring she is still a woman of exquisite loveliness

The film's story, drawn from a novel by Joseph Kessel, has Deneuve playing the young Severine, the bored wife of an affluent Parisian doctor Severine lives out her fantasies by day when she goes to work for a brothel at Madame Anais' establishment

When afternoons titillating clients are over, she slips back into her Yves Saint Laurent dresses — and into her husband's life, prim and proper at the decent hour of five

Though a story of sexual fantasy, Bunel does not pander to public taste with explicit scenes, leaving them to visualise a lot of what is delicately hinted at

As reverie and reality mingle, Deneuve comes across as what Bunel himself said "beautiful as death, as seductive as sin, and as cold as virtue"

Her return to America seems to herald the choice of a new genre of films (though she had not quite disappeared from America's public memory and certainly not from the French arclights) "Even today, people talk to me about the film," said Deneuve of Belle de Jour

Her screen persona is one of icy sensuality, where she has had to often portray the role of a seemingly innocent girl driven by an intense sexuality which sometimes overwhelms her, or as a call girl or mistress where sex is the pivot of her relationships

In Tristana, Catherine plays a willing innocent seduced by her elderly guardian Roman Polanski's Repulsion had her in the role of a young girl who locks herself in a flat with her sexual fantasies for company, in Robert Aldrich's Hustle she is the mistress of police officer Burt Reynolds besides being a whore

She seduces the unsuspecting hero in Benjamin, played the mistress of a Marseilles gangster in Dirty Money, and in the fairytale, Donkey Skin, it is her own father who wants to get her into bed

Even frothy musicals like The Umbrellas of Cherbourg showed her jumping into bed and becoming pregnant

Catherine Deneuve in Belle de Jour Living it up by day

Compared to Greta Garbo for her extraordinary beauty and ability to act, Catherine's real life has traces of what she enacted on screen, specially when it comes to her independent attitudes about men and sexual morality

She is one who likes secrets and has had two children outside marriage — she refused to wed Roger Vadim by whom she has a son, and a daughter by the Italian actor, Marcello Mastroianni Marriage to actor David Bailey (1965-67) did not last

She continues to do at least one film a year, with parts that are written specially for her as in Indochine, which won an Oscar nomination in 1993 Right now she has worked in John Malkovitch's The Convent, screened at the 1995 Cannes festival

Just when America was doubting the stability of its suburban convictions, Bunel's carefully crafted film or bourgeoise marriage has touched the right chord

Moreover, it has shades of Clint Fastwood's The Bridges of Madison County, which dwells upon the same theme of the housewife's inner desires springing to bloom

As for Catherine's own desires, she chooses to keep her distance, defending her right to privacy with quiet dignity "I am not an inaccessible star In a sense, I am a star who has given birth to a great many characters I am a privileged actress with an important place in the difficult world of cinema "

Rajlakshmi Bhattacharyya

THE 'OTHER' FILMS

Basu Bhattacharya may have done it; Rekha may have done it But there were others, too, who dared to make films about contemporary sexual mores, as Sanjay Prasad thinks back

Dimple Kapadia in Drishti

Basu Bhattacharya's Aastha is certainly a bold film in concept and could be a little ahead of its time in terms of acceptance

Of course, films that were bold for their time — whether Rekha starrers or Basu Bhattacharya films — met with varied degrees of success

The B R Chopra camp must have been the one to make the boldest films of its times, always ahead of the hour glass Dhool Ka Phool was about a bastard child and an unwed mother, Naya Daur struck out for the communist message, Kanoon was the first to go songless and be based almost entirely on verbiage in the court of law, Daag for the first time didn't make lame excuses for bigamy, Ittefaq cast the heroine in the villainous murderess' role, and in Sadhna, starring Vyjyanthimala, the Chopra's not only made the heroine a prostitute, but stood by her in the whole film

After Sadhna, films began to project

Shabana and Naseeruddin in Masoom

Raakhee and Mukul Sharma in Paroma

the golden hearted nautch girl till it became a cliche, as for instance in Hema Malini's Sharafat Chhod Di Maine (Indian style) or Parveen Babi's Deewaar (Western style) In between there were classics, however, like Devdas or Amar Prem or even bio-films like Bhumika (based on the life of actress Hansa Wadkar) or Pakeezah (a near autobio-film) and the unforgettable Guide

Vinod Pande's Phir Bhi was a frank discussion of infidelity and were followed by Shekhar Kapur's Masoom, Aparna Sen's Paroma, Kalpana Lajmi's Ek Pal Aruna Raje's Rihaee and Govind Nihalani's Drishti

When it comes to incest, something still considered taboo, it Yash Chopra made Lamhe he was preceded by Sukhwant Dhaddha's Ek Chaadar Maili Si

Interestingly, Raat Aur Din was portrayed by Nargis after the autumn of her career, and it wasn't a film about twins, one bad and the other good, but about a schizophrenic

In the Sixties, there was a Sunil Dutt-Leela Naidu-Rehman starrer, Yeh Raaste Hain Pyar Ke, based on the famous triangle, double murder Nanavati case, which was a pretty daring thing to do, and artistically made, too Years later, Gulzar's Achanak looked like a remake of Yeh Raaste Hain Pyar Ke

So, it's not as if this raasta has been untrod even while admitting that Basu Bhattacharya's Aastha will take some accepting by the Indian public ■

RUSKIN BOND'S  COLUMN

A STRANGER IN THE CROWD

It was my second year at boarding school, and I was sitting on platform No 8 at Ambala station, waiting for the northern bound train I think I was about 12 at the time

My parents considered me old enough to travel alone, and I had arrived by bus at Ambala early in the evening now there was a wait till midnight before my train arrived

Most of the time I had been pacing up and down the platform, browsing at the bookstall, or feeding broken biscuits to stray dogs, trains came and went, and the platform would be quiet for a while and then, when a train arrived, it would be an inferno of heaving, shouting, agitated human bodies

As the carriage doors opened, a tide of people would sweep down upon the nervous little ticket collector at the gate, and every time this happened I would be caug' t in the rush and swept outside the station

Now tired of this game and of ambling about the platform, I sat down on my suitcase and gazed dismally across the railway tracks

Trolleys rolled past me, and I was conscious of the cries of the various vendors — the men who sold curds and lemon, the sweetmeat seller, the newspaper boy — but I had lost interest in all that went on along the busy platform, and continued to stare across the railway tracks, feeling bored and a little lonely

"Are you all alone, my son?" asked a soft voice close behind me

I looked up and saw a woman standing near me She was leaning over, and I saw a pale face, and dark kind eyes She wore no jewels, and was dressed very simply in a white sari

"Yes I am going to school," I said and stood up respectfully, she seemed poor, but there was a dignity about her that commanded respect

"I have been watching you for some time," she said "Didn't your parents come to see you off?"

"I don't live here," I said "I had to change trains Anyway, I can travel alone"

"I am sure you can," she said, and I liked her for saying that, and I also liked her for the simplicity of her dress, and for her deep, soft voice and the serenity of her face

"Tell me, what is your name?" she asked

"Arun," I said

"And how long do you have to wait for your train?"

"About an hour, I think It comes at 12 o'clock"

"Then come with me and have something to eat"

I was going to refuse, out of shyness and suspicion, but she took me by the hand, and then I felt it would be silly to pull my hand away She told a coolie to look after my suitcase, and then she led me away down the platform

Her hands was gentle, and she held mine neither too firmly nor too lightly

I looked up at her again She was not young And she was not old She must have been over 30 but, had she been 50, I think she would have looked much the same

She took me into the station dining-room, ordered tea and samosa and jalebis, and at once I began to thaw and take a new interest in this kind woman The strange encounter had little effect on my appetite I was a hungry school boy, and I ate as much as I could in as polite a manner as possible She took obvious pleasure in watching me eat, and I think it was the food that strengthened the bond between us and cemented our friendship, for under the influence of the tea and sweets I began to talk quite freely, and told her about my school, my friends, my likes and dislikes She questioned me quietly from time to time, but preferred listening, she drew me out very well, and I had soon forgotten that we were strangers But she did not ask me about my family or where I lived, and I did not ask her where she lived I accepted her for what she had been to me -- a quiet, kind and gentle woman who gave sweets to a lonely boy on a railway platform

After about half-an-hour we left the dining-room and began walking back along the platform An engine was shunting up and down beside platform No 8, and as it approached, a boy leapt off the platform and ran across the rails, taking a short cut to the next platform He was at a safe distance from the engine, and there was no danger unless he had fallen, but as he leapt across the rails, the woman clutched my arm Her fingers dug into my flesh, and I winced with pain I caught her fingers and looked up at her, and I saw a spasm of pain and fear and sadness pass across her face She watched the boy as he climbed the other platform and it was not until he had disappeared in the crowd that she relaxed her hold on my arm She smiled at me reassuringly, and took my hand again but her fingers trembled against mine

"He was all right," I said, feeling that it was she who needed reassurance

She smiled gratefully at me and pressed my hand We walked together in silence until we reached the place

The strange encounter had little effect on my appetite. I was a hungry school boy, and I ate as much as I could in as polite a manner as possible. She took obvious pleasure in watching me eat, and I began to think it was the food that strengthened the bond between us and cemented our friendship where I had left my suitcase, one of my school fellows, Satish, a boy of about my age, had turned up with his mother

"Hello, Arun!" he called "The train's coming in late, as ususal Did you know we have a new headmaster this year?"

We shook hands, and then he turned to his mother and said "This is Arun, mother He is one of my friends, and the best bowler in the class "

"I am glad to know that," said his mother, a large imposing woman who wore spectacles She looked at the woman who led my hand and said "And I suppose you're Arun's mother "

I opened my mouth to make some explanation, but before I could say anything the woman replied "Yes, I am Arun's mother "

I was unable to speak a word I looked quickly up at the woman, but she did not appear to be at all embarrassed, and was smiling at Satish's mother

Satish's mother said "It's such a nuisance having to wait for the train right in the middle of the night But one can't let the child wait here alone Anything can happen to a boy at a big station like this, there are so many suspicious characters hanging about These days one has to be very careful of strangers "

"Arun can travel alone though," said the woman beside me, and somehow I felt grateful to her for saying that I had already forgiven her for lying, and besides, I had taken an instinctive dislike to Satish's mother

"Well, be very careful, Arun," said Satish's mother looking sternly at me through her spectacles "Be very careful when your mother is not with you And never talk to strangers!"

I looked from Satish's mother to the woman who had given me tea and sweets, and then back at Satish's mother

"I like strangers," I said

Satish's mother definitely staggered a little, as obviously she was not used to being contradicted by small boys "There you are, you see! If you don't watch over them all the time, they'll walk straight into trouble Always listen to what your mother tells you," she said, wagging a fat little finger at me "And never, never talk to strangers "

I glared resentfully at her, and moved closer to the woman who had befriended me Satish was standing behind his mother, grinning at me, and delighting in my clash with his mother Apparently he was on my side.

The station bell clanged, and the people who had till now been squatting resignedly on the platform began bustling about

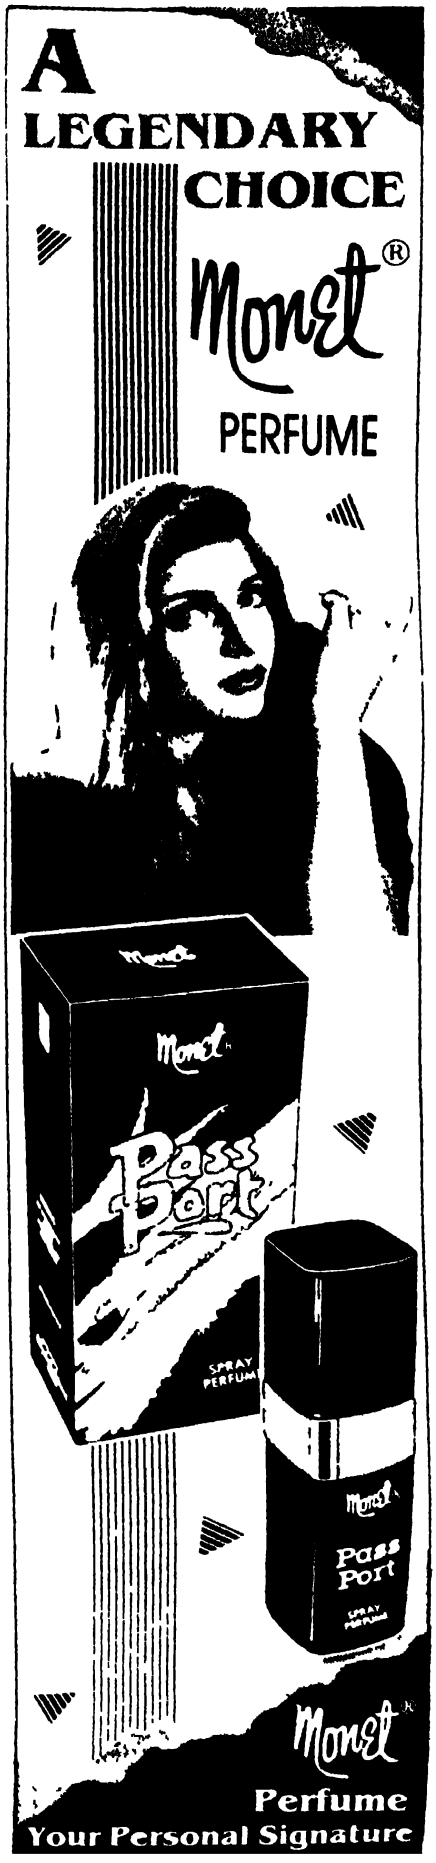
"Here it comes," shouted Satish, as the engine whistle shrieked and the front lights played over the rails

The train moved slowly into the station, the engine hissing and sending out waves of steam As it came to a stop, Satish jumped on the footboard of a lighted comaprtment and shouted, "Come on Arun, this one's empty!" and I picked up my suitcase and made a dash for the open door

We placed ourselves at the open windows, and the two women stood outside on the platform, talking up to us Satish's mother did most of the talking

"Now don't jump on and off moving trains, as you did just now," she said "And don't stick your heads out of the windows, and don't eat any rubbish on the way " She allowed me to share the benefit of her advice, as she probably didn't think my 'mother' a very capable person She handed Satish a bag of fruit, a cricket bat and a big box of chocolates and told him to share the food with me Then she stood back from the window to watch how my 'mother' behaved

I was smarting under the patronising tone of Satish's mother, who obviously thought mine a very poor family and I did not intend giving the other woman away I let her take my hand in hers, but I could think of nothing to say I was conscious of Satish's mother staring at us with hard, beady eyes, and I found myself hating her with a firm, unreasoning hate



The guard walked up the platform, blowing his whistle for the train to leave I looked straight into the eyes of the woman who held my hand, and she smiled in a gentle, understanding way I leaned out of the window then, and put my lips to her cheek, and kissed her

The carriage jolted forward, and she drew her hand away

"Goodbye," I said to the other woman, "goodbye — mother "

I didn't wave or shout, but sat still in front of the window, gazing at the woman on the platform Satish's mother was talking to her, but she didn't appear to be listening, she was looking at me, as the train took me away She stood there on the busy platform, a pale sweet woman in white, and I watched her until she was lost in the milling crowd

RAGE OF AUTO-TERRORISM

It was April in London Overcoats tightly buttoned, a group of venerable old age pensioners gathered on a street corner Their faces set in anger, they marched down towards a line of cars parked on the pavement — their pavement, the pavement which belonged to pedestrians

They surrounded one car — a Volkswagen — and shouting encouragement to one another, began to bounce it up and down The car's suspension responded and slowly, inexorably, it was bounced on to the road

A hoarse cry of triumph rent the air at the pensioners moved on to the next car and did not cease until they had cleared each and every vehicle from the pavement

As summer warmed, Steve recommenced his dual existence By day a civil servant, by night a revolutionary Each evening, he and fellow members of the minimalist collective, the radical Pedestrians Front, set out with red paint to daub rude slogans over hoardings advertising new cars

Come May and the "disorganisation" known as Reclaim the Streets went to Camden Town and for five hours turned the High Street into London's largest car-free zone cum-outdoor party

Supporters danced on car roofs and bands played There were free burgers and beans for all-comers Helpless, the police could only divert motor traffic and infuriated motorists

In 15 cities across the land, militant cyclists hold mass rallies on the last weekend of the month in protest against motor transport Human zebra crossings block streets, and even the sober Pedestrians' Association (founded in 1929) has published information how to use a match stick to fix pedestrian crossing lights at permanent green

These are all symptoms of Car Rage, a Nineties' phenomenon How much rage you feel depends on whether you're in a car or out of one As Marshall McLuhan put it, "The car is the protective shell of suburban man"

Thirty-two cent of Britons are still shell-less, the majority are not But even the majority, when they emerge from their shells, are becoming pretty angry

There are several reasons for this summer sunshine and engine fumes create a particularly poisonous atmosphere — as all those living in Indian cities can confirm

Cauldrons of vehicular smog in Britain have sent asthma rates soaring and many schools now have "puffer rooms" where children go to use their inhalers

City centres are a noisesome motorised hell for shoppers Road-ringed suburbs are losing their butterflies, birds and other wildlife And the lovely, though limited English countryside is despoiled much more greatly now than in the Thirties when E M Forster spoke of it being "gashed to pieces with arterial roads" and put to "systematic ruination by auto terrorism"

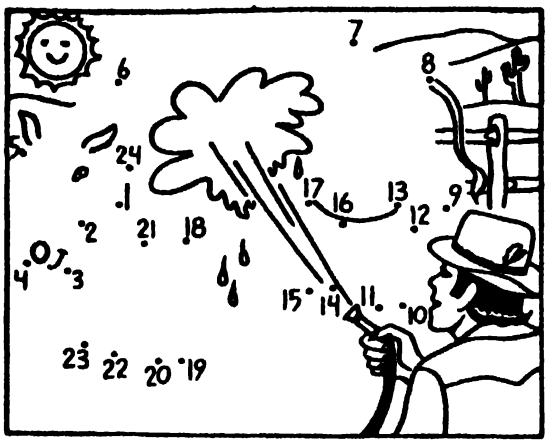
Britain in many ways has followed America but Britain is not America — it does not have that country's wide open spaces or sparse population And while it might be all right for Americans to build countless roads and for every American, ideally to own a car — it doesn't work in Britain

In a recent poll even motorists themselves opted in a clear majority for closing city centres to traffic and restoring to them peace, clean air and ease of access for pedestrians

Car Rage is not therefore limited to the unemployed, the homeless and the disadvantaged, who form the main support-base for Reclaim the Streets, or to women and old people who are also notably anti-car

An important cross-section of British society is telling the government to leave the American pattern and become more European European cities are increasingly reserved for pedestrians and cars are banned Recently, Athens experimentally banned traffic from the city centre and there was hardly any protest

But this mood for change cannot overcome the dominance of the motor car either here, or in Europe In Germany, 60 per cent more land is used by motor cars than by houses In Britain, car ownership is expected to rise by 130 per cent over the next 20 years, and although ruling politicians pay lip service to anti-car concern, they have so far done little about it



When smog levels become dangerous, they appeal for people to leave their cars at home and use public transport, but the Prime Minister and environment minister set a very poor example themselves Between them, they made no more than six rail journeys in the whole of last year

Ruling politicians will eventually have to respond to Car Rage to strike a new balance between man and machine The continuing damage to countryside and towns will have to be contained, but the remaining few who dream of victory over the motor car will be disappointed. Hardly any Britons could now honestly say with J D Salinger, "I'd rather have a goddam horse A horse is at least human, for God's sake' (Sanctuary Features)

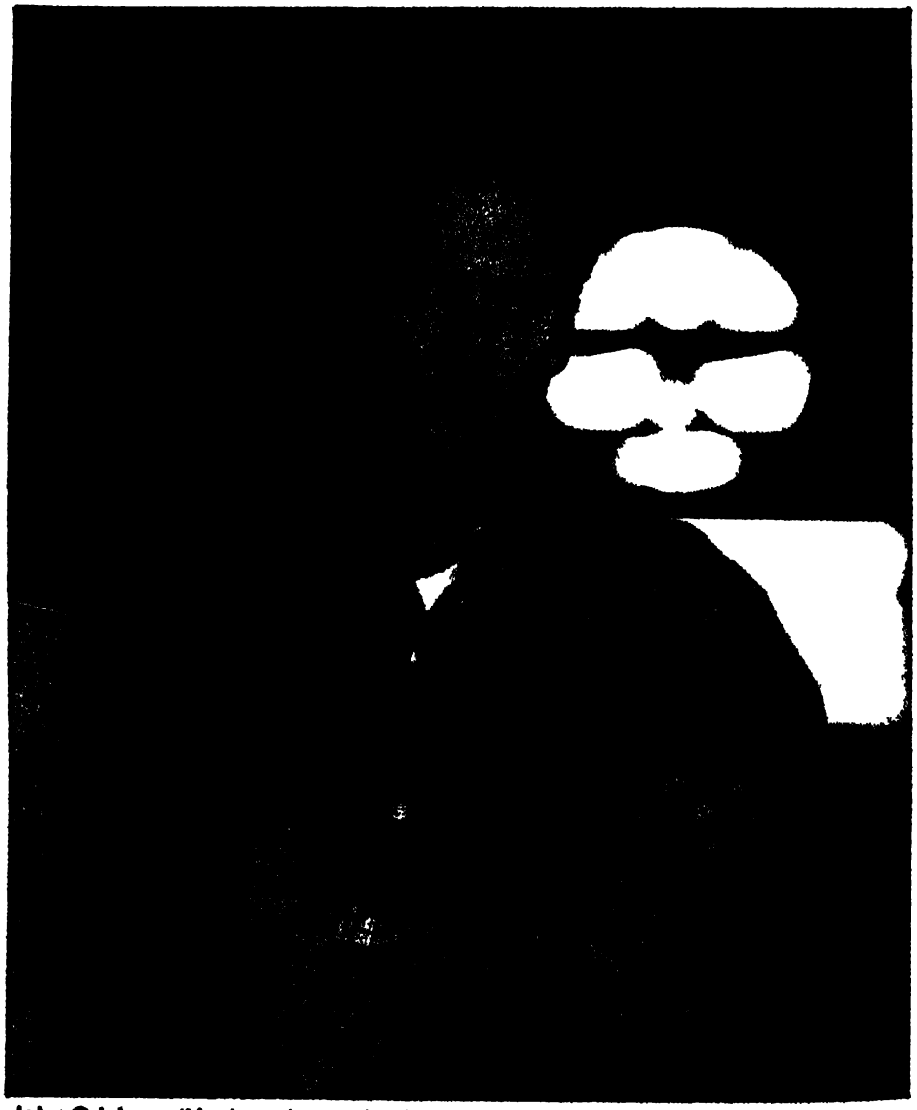
IT POURS

In each of his novels, John Grisham celebrates the heroism of individuals against a powerful and corrupt machinery. Now, this writer of international bestsellers like The Client and The Firm, is basking in the success of his latest all-time hit, The Rainmaker. Arthur J. Pais profiles the celebrity novelist

For several months, John Grisham has been competing with himself. On one hand, his newest hardcover sensation, The Rainmaker, has been sitting at the top of the bestsellers' list in the US and on the other hand, the paperback edition of The Chamber has been refusing to move from the bestseller's list for several weeks.

The Rainmaker has sold about one million copies in the first five weeks, and The Chamber has sold nearly 1 5 million copies in paperback after having sold nearly one million copies in hardcover.



The Rainmaker is the biggest windfall Grisham has had in his 10-year publishing career, says Paul Noglows, critic and entertainment writer.

"Right now, Grisham is so hot that he is far ahead of the likes of Robert Ludlum, Tom Clancy, Michael Crichton and Robin Cook The only person he should really be scared of is Stephen King"

With The Rainmaker, a riveting tale of legal intrigue and corporate greed and Grisham's sixth novel, for which he got more than $12 million in international sales and movie rights, Grisham has gone back to the court in eight years since the publication of his very first novel, A Time to Kill

In paraphrase the story of The Rainmaker may not sound great, but Grisham has the supreme gift of making his readers' pulses race as they read each of his books

In The Rainmaker we meet Rudy Baylor who is soon to graduate from

John Grisham: 'Having a bestseller is so much fun'

Denzel Washington and Julia Roberts in The Pelican Brief

Tom Cruise and Jeanne Tripplehorn in The Firm

Memphis Law School and is assured of a position in a small law firm. Too bad that the firm, Brodnax and Speer, is bought out by Trent & Brent, and Baylor has no job.

Feeling defeated, he takes up a job offered by a personal injury lawyer, notoriously known as Bruiser, who uses the firm mostly to launder money. Imagine his surprise when Baylor brings him a real case and wants to fight it through rightful means.

An insurance company has wrongfully denied funds for a bone marrow transplant of a 19-year-old youth. Though he is passed saving, Baylor is determined to have the huge insurance corporation fined to the tune of multi-million so that in future poor people will not be denied medical insurance.

Further fuelling Baylor's determination is that the insurance firm is represented by Trent & Brent which had thrown him on the streets a few months ago.

The Rainmaker welds the courtroom savvy of A Time to Kill with the psychological nuances of The Chamber and shows that Grisham's imagination can hold its own in a courtroom as well as on the violent streets outside.

The world of his own youth was anything but violent. Grisham was born in 1955 in Arkansas; son of a migrant construction worker and a homemaker. He and his four siblings travelled throughout the southern US settling briefly wherever their father could find a job. "We would move into a small town and the first thing we would do was join a local Baptist church and the second was to go to the libraray and get our library cards and check out all the books we were allowed."

In 1967, the family took a permanent residence in a small town in Mississippi. "We didn't have a lot of money," Grisham says. "But we didn't know it. We were well fed and scrubbed."

Grisham says that he has always been extraordinarily self-assured and discovered as a baseball player in high school that he had a flair for thinking on his feet — and for winning arguments. In 1981 he graduated from the University of Mississippi with a law degree.

'Ten years from now I plan to be sitting here, looking out over my land,' he mused recently. 'I hope I will be writing books; if not, I will be on my pond fishing with my two children. I feel like the luckiest guy I know'

For a few years he ran his one-man law firm, growing dissatisfied with each of the cases he had handled. They were "garden-variety criminal cases", he says, adding that he wanted something more challenging.

He won his first jury trial in which he defended a man who had shot his wife's lover six times in the head at point blank range. Grisham argued that his client had acted in self-defence because the lover had fired a shot from a .22 calibre pistol that had fallen off the defendant's chest.

Tired of practising criminal law, Grisham switched to civil cases

and won a spectacular victory on behalf of a boy who had sustained burn injuries when a water heater exploded The 1984 suit, settled at more than $5 million, was the largest damage settlement ever recorded in the state by then

Ever impatient with his chosen careers, and dissatisfied with the way the politicians in his state behaved, Grisham ran for the state legislature and won two terms He wanted to reform the state education system more than anything, he says, and make it more accessible to the poor

But he realised that it was an uphill fight. "I realised that it was impossible to make changes the way I wanted them," he says in explaining why he resigned before his second term was over

Unexpectedly he got inspiration to write Grisham, who never wrote for the school or college magazine, and who had shown no interest in reading many novels, had no idea that his life would change for a dramatic turn when he observed a trial

"There was this 10-year-old girl who was testifying against a man who had raped her and left her for the dead," he recalls "I never felt such emotion and human drama in my 30 years

"I became obsessed wondering what it would be like if the girl's father killed the rapist and was put on a trial. I had to write it down "

For the next few years, Grisham arrived in his office at five in the morning, six times a week, and wrote in long hand, A Time to Kill

In the novel, a Black man is charged with murder of two White men who raped his teenaged daughter The book was finally published in 1987, after having gathered 20 rejections

The reviews were rather encouraging But the book, for which Grisham was paid $15,000, was not selling

The publishers had hosted a party to announce its release, but only the friends and family of Grisham attended the event. Neither Grisham nor his publicist knew how to attract booksellers and influential critics "Look, if we invite your mama and wife, your friends and all your relatives, we will do well to sell 50 copies," his publicist said. Of the 5,000 copies printed, Grisham bought more than 1,500

It is an altogether different story that A Time to Kill was reissued last year and sold more than eight million copies in paperback in the US alone, and Grisham got a record $6 million for its movie rights, with the provision that he would decide the stars and the director of the movie.

Despite the poor sales of A Time to Kill, Grisham decided to write more books for he was pleased with his first effort But it took him many more years to write the second book For he was thinking hard about writing a fast-paced novel that would keep people up all night.

The Firm, about an idealistic young lawyer's fight against a firm led by malevolent barristers, became an overnight success in 1991

The Firm sold more than one million hardcover copies and eight million paperback copies in the US, outside the US, it has reportedly sold more than five million copies in hard and soft covers

"Having a bestseller is so much fun," Grisham says. "But a lot of times in 1991 I felt that it was happening to somebody else."

It took him nearly six years to write his second novel, but the third, The Pelican Brief, was written in less than 100 days, and was published exactly a year after The Firm, and went on to become an even bigger success

Critics meanwhile began to find fault with Grisham's characters While they gave him full marks for his page-turning narrative, they said most of his characters were shallow and one-dimensional

By that time Grisham did not have to worry about critics — he had begun to enjoy the worldwide sucess that was not only greeting his novels, but also the movies adapted from them The Client and The Chamber that followed also became huge bestsellers

Even then, Grisham says that he takes some reviews seriously. "If someone writes a negative, but fair, review, I read it carefully and pay attention. This is one of the reasons he has given more importance to his characters in his recent books, sacrificing dramatic events in the process

He deliberately slowed it down in The Client and The Chamber so that his characters could develop fully.

His wife, Renee Jones, edits all his books before they are sent to the publishers "She is really good with women characters," he says "Not a day passes without having spirited discussions with her, but she has always emerged right That's the frustrating part!"

The Client and The Chamber were not as big hits as The Firm So in The Rainmaker one encounters more of Grisham's page-turning ability

All the millions, all the adulations, and all the attention in Hollywood has not detracted Grisham from the deep reality of his business.

"I am philosophical about all this, in that five or 10 years from now, things may not be as hot as they are now. Everything has X number of years to it, and I know it."

But he has wisely planned for the future, his friends say. He lives in a custom-built Victorian style home on a 70-acre farm in Oxford, Mississippi Recently, he invested $5 million to revitalise Oxford Review, a local magazine, hoping to make it the premier magazine in the South.

"Ten years from now I plan to be sitting here, looking out over my land," he mused recently "I hope I will be writing books, if not, I will be on my pond fishing with my two children

"I feel like the luckiest guy I know."■

Dangerous Minds Some of the toughest wars are fought, not on battlefields, and some of the most serious casualties are not those with visible wounds

Dangerous Minds which stars Michelle Pfeiffer, with George Dzunda, Robin Barlett, Austin Pendelton and Courtney Vance, is an intensely exciting film that deals with the everyday wars that are waged in America's classrooms to overcome despair and defeat

LouAnne Johnson, the one-woman show, is living proof that one person can make all the difference

The film is a true-to-life experience based on her book, My Posse Don't Do Homework, a moving account of the education crisis in America

Motivating her students to develop their self-esteem is only half the story LouAnne takes on the deeply entrenched educational system which tries to ruin her chances at every turn

Dangerous Minds is co-written by Ronald Bass, the Oscar winner for Rain Man and directed by John N Smith, maker of the highly charged The Boys of St Vincent

AISH WHO?

Bikram Vohra on the formula that made a celebrity out of him*

When The Telegraph asked me to write a humorous column, I wanted to know if it would be slugged so

Nothing scares no more than columns that have 'Humour' on the page and would leave it to the reader to decipher that element for himself

I then asked if I could make fun of the editor, making fun of the editors being the best part of journalism and, therefore, great grist for any writer's mill

The Telegraph said, no

So, how about the owners of the newspaper, can I set them up in front of funny mirrors

I was told that the paper would be reconsidering its initial offer

I said, what about the government?

A letter came back saying there was a shortage of newsprint and the humour column would not be published

See, I told you, they meant to slug it that way

Consequently, I have been asked to write a serious column about the serious issues of our time and, for all I care, it can be slugged 'Serious' across the top

I know Shobha De She is one of the most beautiful women who ever walked the land I have never read her books but, then, I have never read Jackie Collins either, and since she is known as the Indian version of Collins, I guess I am constant

But I know her. I have been to her home, had verbal battles, all rapier sharp thrust and riposte and always enjoyed her company, although, unlike British Nandy on Mallika Sarabhai, I have not written a book of poems on Shobha.

I did have this undergrad crush on her in the Seventies, even persuading Mario Miranda to make a funny sketch of her for an article. The sketch was taken away by Khushwant Singh because he also had a crush on her and he pulled rank on me.

Now I am in Bombay at this swank do and beautiful people are floating about like prawns in a soup and suddenly, she is next to me, smiling and sultry With this second stunning looking girl

"Meet Aish," she says

I say, "Hello, Aish "

Followed by deafening silence

I say, "So, Aish, what do you do?"

Shobha says, "This is Aish Rai "

I say, "That's nice, you should be a model, you are very attractive."

Shobha frowns, drops her smile and skates past dragging this living legend with her.

My friend says, "I didn't know you knew Miss World."

"I don't," I say.

"You were just talking to her."

"I was!"

"You didn't recognise her," she says, "that's rich, listen to this, folks, he doesn't know Aishwarya, what sort of journalist doesn't know Miss World?"

"I know her," I say hotly, "I just didn't twig that was Aishwarya Rai."

A gasp of horror crepes the room.

One lady drops a sandwich, another spills tea.

"You know her and you didn't recognise her," says my friend, "how can you live with yourself?"

Back at home my wife says, "Calls are coming from all over, how could you?"

"I am sorry," I say, "I am sorry"

The girls say, 'What's the point of being sorry, do you work at it, Dad, or does it come natural "

My wife says, Zee TV wants to know how you feel after the disaster, they want to come over and do an interview with you Rajat Sharma wants to know if I can appear on Aap Ki Adalat and Anu Kapoor wants me to make a guest appearance on Antaakshri Ghoomta Aina wishes to know how to put the pieces together in the after Aish era of my life

My partner has called to say he is appalled He said, "Appall-ed that you should do this in public, people were watching, we are a media company, we are supposed to recognise Miss World, our credibility lies there like shards of broken glass, would you care to explain yourself, I worry about you "

I am a wreck I skulk in the shadows, cringing with shame We went to dinner last month and a banker said to me, "Are you the guy they are all talking about, the schmuck who didn't recognise Aishwarya Rai? Here, darling (to his wife), this is the fellow you wanted to see "

'Darling' looked at me and said, "Was your mind a complete blank or did you have at least a faint idea?"

I mumbled something. She said, "You poor dear, it must be so very hard for you."

It is, it is devastating.

Except that last week, I have been asked to address the Indian association in Dubai on 'How I live with myself,' appear on Aap Ki Rai and go on the Donahue Show. I am even getting paid for it.

Dinner invitations are pouring in and someone has even asked for my autograph.

What a Life!

■ The justification that this world is not good enough to bring in a child is not wholly convincing ('It's Our Life', August 13) The proponents of this view are, I am afraid, not giving due thought to the world after them

One of the principal social functions of marriage is to bring in a new generation, arguably that will be a better one in intellect and strength Thus, making this earth a better place to live in

Bringing up a child is not easy it involves patience, tremendous love and sacrifice, and the profound joy it gives to parents cannot be compensated by the possession of wealth

Parents get a glimpse of the future through the eyes of their own children Childless couples can never experience this joy

R.K. Sriman,

■ "I don't like children. I don't like dogs either" — how insensitive some people have become; they are comparing babies with dogs!

A child browsing through the Magazine would wonder if his parents valued him thus, too.

Olive Phillips,

Illustration: Gopal Sarkar

■ It is difficult to think of a world sans children There have been and are parents who have reared as many as 14 children. Dr B R Ambedkar is an example he was the 14th offspring of his parents Rabindranath Tagore was the ninth child

But people who are insecure and have a grim view of this universe think it is an unsafe place for kids

Md. Tanweer,
Calcutta

■ I was intrigued by the opinions of couples who wanted to stay childless I thought a child was the greatest bliss of matrimony and that a woman's finest dream was motherhood. But here it was the reverse Women spurning motherhood!

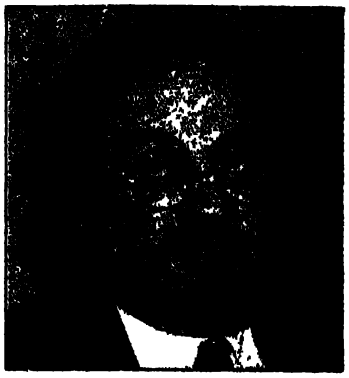
D. Sen,
Calcutta

■ The concept of a married life without the trappings of parenthood is gaining legitimacy in society, specially among working couples

The recent court battle over the custody of Avan Sarkar – son of Aloke and Anindita Sarkar - speaks volumes in favour of childless couples

Mili Das,
Jamshedpur

■ Most of the couples want to reach the top, with the process unhampered by squealing babies. The question is, how far can they go in their profession without being responsible at home



There are so many couples with children who have risen to the top professionally Of course, they have had to sacrifice some valuable moments, but that did not impede their success

SATANIC VERSES ALIVE

Salman Rushdie has struck again — with his new book that, in part, [illegible] Shiv Sena supremo Bal Thackeray. Amit Roy profiles the [illegible] in jeans and denim

BAL THACKERAY NEE[illegible]

[illegible] with The Satanic Verses Sigh

In Britain, the Daily Mail was the first pape[illegible] fundamentalists' had demanded a ban in Bombay bec[illegible] caricatured Bal Thackeray, the Shiv Sena leader.

The story of Rushdie is now larger than the struggle of a lone writer, however important he might be — and there is a consensus that his latest work will help consolidate his position as one of the most gifted in the English language

After years of assuming that only Muslims could be fundamentalists, the suggestion that Hindus, too, can be fanatics will provide welcome relief to Western newspapers

As for Rushdie, he can be expected to produce a spirited response to the proposed ban [at the time of writing, the Maharashtra government was soft pedalling] He is currently promoting his new novel and will appreciate that all publicity helps In any case, he is not shy when it comes to hitting back

But the story of Rushdie is now larger than the struggle of a lone writer, however important he might be — and there is a consensus that his latest work will help consolidate his position as one of the most gifted in the English language

He has been compared favourably with other writers of Indian origin, notably Vikram Seth, one of the other superstars in the literary firmament

According to Tom Maschler, former chairman of the publishers, Jonathan Cape, Rushdie is the superior writer "The average literary groupie would be much more excited if he saw Salman Rushdie at a party," he says

Maschler could say so, considering The Moor's Last Sigh is published by Cape at £15 99 Rushdie's previous publishers, Viking Penguin, are no longer in the picture After the Iranian threat to Rushdie, his publishers and almost everyone connected with The Satanic Verses drifted away from him Viking Penguin had to spend a fortune enhancing security at its offices

Seth, however, has not attracted any of the vitriolic press that Rushdie has inspired If Rushdie's close friend, Martin Amis, or any other White author, had been threatened, no British paper would even have dreamed of questioning the cost of providing security

Rushdie is guarded night and day by a team of armed special branch policemen whose number is believed to be six One can only imagine the stress and strain involved in such an arrangement

Recently, it was claimed, for example, that Rushdie has had a couple of brief affairs since the breakup of his second marriage to the American writer, Marianne Wiggins He is now said to have a steady relationship He cannot request privacy since it is the job of the officers to guard him

How serious is the threat? The police believed in the early days when he went into hiding that the danger he faced was real enough He has been moved around the country, often at short notice

In one period, he slept in 13 beds in 20 days He has lost count of the number of places he has lived in the past six years The number is probably more than 30.

"At the beginning of the Gulf War," he told one journalist, "I was informed that there was a contract out on my life, paid to a group of assassins who were so confident of success that they promised to kill me within 100 days."

It is not only Rushdie who believes his life is in danger. Stella Rimington, the head of MI5, the British intelligence gathering operation, said publicly "The determined efforts to locate and kill the author Salman Rushdie seem likely to go on."

After Khomeini had issued his fatwa, Muslim groups sprang up all over Britain to lend the Iranian leader varying degrees of support. The novel was ceremonially burnt in Bradford, lighting a flame which raged through the Islamic world.

January 14, 1989

It is in Britain, however, where the battle over Rushdie has raged and where the political and religious map has been altered forever by the controversy generated by The Satanic Verses.

The wiser among the Muslim leaders quickly realised that their demand for withdrawal of the book would never be met. When it came to a choice between freedom of expression — even when the book had clearly given offence to many Muslims — and censorship, the British establishment stood firm in defence of the former.

The Muslims, who number just under one million in Britain (despite claims to be double that number), may not have lost the war, though. Today, no publishing house in Britain comes out with a work on Islam without first having it checked.

An estimated 600 mosques flourish in the land (compared to 60 temples). Although the call for withdrawal of The Satanic Verses has not been formally abandoned, the agenda has now moved on to such issues as state funded, single sex schools for Muslims. In dealing with the Muslims, the British authorities take care not to give offence.

It is hard to be sure of Iranian intentions, but President Rafsanjani and his faction appear keen to reassure the West that no death squad will be sent from Teheran in pursuit of the author. Nor is there a reward for his head These were the clear signals which were communicated earlier this summer and raised hopes that even if Khomeini's fatwa could not be formally lifted, some kind of a deal could be done over Rushdie

In return for a solemn pledge from Teheran that the author would not be harmed, the West would move towards normalisation of relations with Iran This has not happened because Rafsanjani's enemies have come forward to challenge the notion that the fatwa will not be carried out

Living in the shadow of the assassin who may or may not materialise, Rushdie ought to have many more people on his side He has put on weight, lost much of his hair, wears a beard and could easily pass for a mullah in the right clothes on the streets of Teheran

There is something about him that puts people off The reason could partly be racism, of course

One objection to him has been that he had been too left-wing and not shown enough gratitude to those who have protected him

Rushdie did not spare Prince Charles who was unwise enough to offend the author "Prince Charles' literary efforts are quite second-rate, and he costs the country quite a bit more I am a citizen who pays a great deal of tax and I expect something in exchange " accord due credit to Dr Frances D'Souza, head of the human rights group, Article 19, who has led a long international campaign on the author's behalf

Thanks principally to her, no foreign ministry in Europe has been allowed to forget that Rushdie's life remains in danger As a consequence of her efforts, it seems unlikely, that the European Community members will ever fully normalise their relations with Iran so long as the fatwa remains in force

As for Rushdie, he has taken up the cause of other writers, including Taslima Nasreen He has urged France to offer asylum to Algerians threatened by Muslim militants

"When any Algerian is under threat of death and badly in need of asylum, France should open its gates rather than close them," he said in Strasbourg, in his capacity as president of

At a literary party, to launch a Martin Amis novel, he was pictured dancing with the journalist, Nigella Lawson, to the Bee Gees number Stayin' Alive, Stayin' Alive. One could go on

The author's critics have found it galling that instead of opting for a low profile existence, he has been photographed at glamorous parties with the beautiful folk of London

"They are beginning to say that if Salman has not shown his face at an event, it is not worth being there," one writer noted

The pictures published in the newspapers tell their own story Salman with the model Marie Helvin at a bash thrown by former Sunday Times editor, Andrew Neil, Salman with actress Helena Bonham Carter at the London Film Festival, Salman with Sir David Frost before an American TV interview, Salman with Steven Spielberg at the premiere of Schindler's List

At a literary party, to launch a Martin Amis novel, he was pictured dancing with the journalist, Nigella Lawson, to the Bee Gees number Stayin' Alive, Stayin' Alive One could go on

But Rushdie has a different perspective leading as normal a life as he can manage is, he reckons, the most fitting reply he can give to his enemies Some things can never be the same, though

One is his relationship with his 15-year-old son, Zafar, from his first marriage to Clarissa Luard "We have always been close, although not being able to see him spontaneously is one of my greatest sadnesses," he told a journalist "He was nine when all this started, but from the very beginning I told him as much as I could about what had happened The times that were the worst for him were when I couldn't get in touch, and he heard the news about me from the media "

He clearly suffers his periods of darkness, but in recent years, appears to have achieved a kind of mental equilibrium The first book written in hiding, Haroun and the Sea of Stories, was conceived with his son in mind

As he gained in strength, his collection of short stories, East, West, followed It has taken two years to write The Moor's Last Sigh

Although he is a person who has always found it easy to get involved in controversies, he does appear to be more at peace with himself Some

the International Parliament of Writers

In 1990, he embraced Islam as a conciliatory gesture to Iran But now describes the move as one of his biggest mistakes Now, far from cowering in his cave, Rushdie has come out fighting

He has not lost his sense of humour During a spell in hospital, he was treated by a doctor who turned out to be Iranian The man persuaded the author to give up smoking

Rushdie joked how other Iranians might respond if the doctor's identity became known "What?!! You made him better?"

On the literary front, he is recognised by Indians as having created a new language Midnight's Children, which launched him in 1981, was adjudged two years ago to have been the best of the novels which have won the Booker Prize for fiction over the previous 25 years

It must appear ironic to the winner of the 'Booker of Bookers' that he is now being denied a place of honour in his own hometown

GOLDEN SCREEN

Midnight's Children will be televised by BBC to celebrate the 50th anniversary of India's independence

When the BBC looked for a television drama to celebrate the 50th year of Indian independence, it picked Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children.

Kevin Loader, who is producing the six-part series, admits both he and the author initially wondered whether the novel could be dramatised at all. Fortunately for all concerned, Rushdie, who is acting as unofficial consultant, approves of what he has seen so far of the script.

The job is being done by Ken Taylor, an award-winning playwright who was responsible for the script of the immensely successful TV adaptation of Paul Scott's Jewel in the Crown.

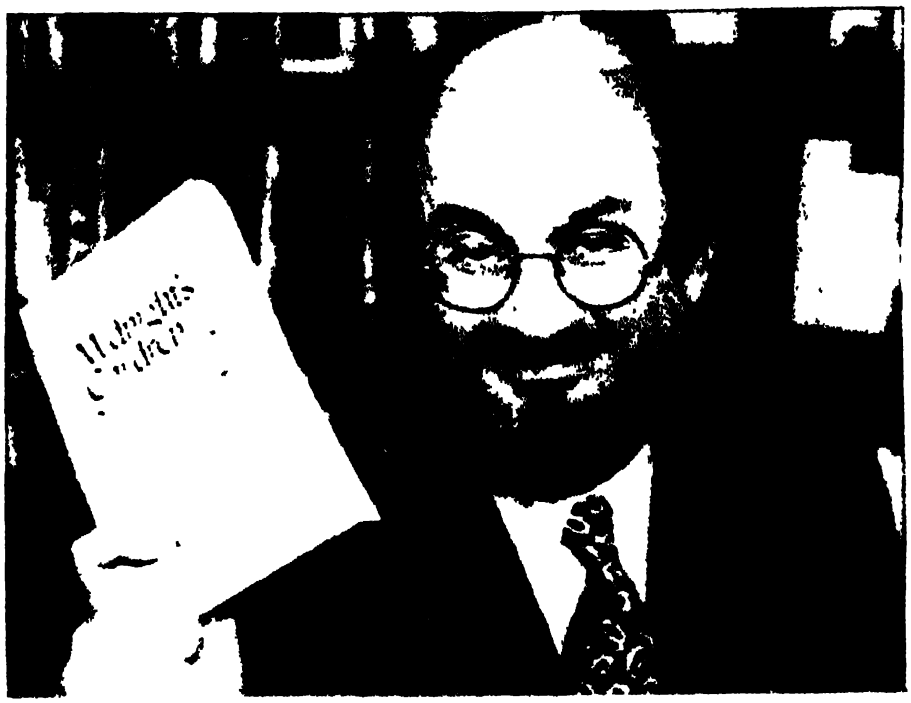
"We are halfway through the script of Midnight's Children," says Loader, one of BBC's best known drama producers.

He added: "When Salman saw the script he was amazed and overjoyed."

Loader produced the adaptation of Hanif Kureishi's The Buddha of Suburbia and a documentary of the Bombay actor, Harish Patel, in Roads Where You Are, Mr Patel. He is currently an executive producer in drama series and serials with special responsibility for literary adaptations.

"I love Midnight's Children," he says. "I have always loved the book."

Alan Yentob and Michael Jackson, controllers of BBC1 and BBC 2, respectively, also considered the choice appropriate. "It is the great masterpiece on Indian independence. Although it has a British connection it is about the Indian experience. Television has done other post colonial stories but with mainly White characters," Loader says.



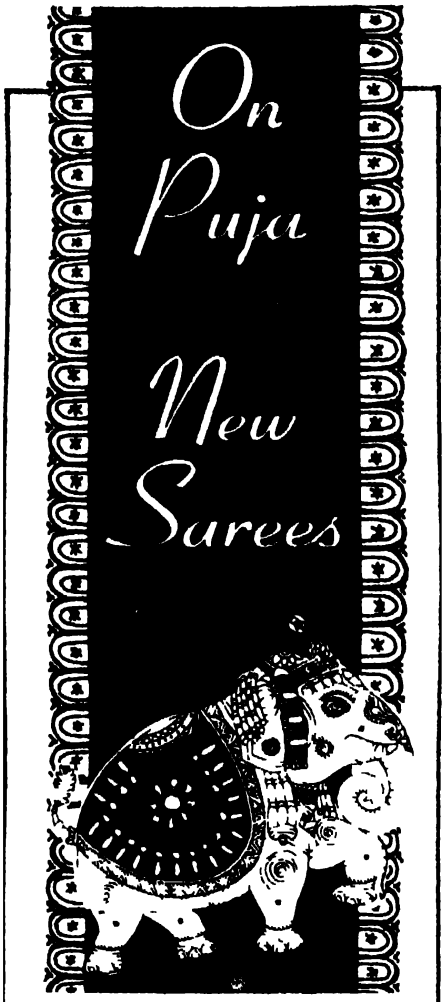
Shooting will take place in late 1996 and early 1997. It is intended to open the series with a two hour episode followed by five others each one hour long.

Loader hopes the series will be shot in location in India although he recognises that there would be political opposition to anything involving Rushdie, specially in a general election year. "It would be sad if we couldn't."

BBC turned down Vikram Seth's A Suitable Boy, which is to be dramatised by Channel 4 also for the 50th anniversary of Indian independence.

With two major dramas now in the making it is possible there will be a shortage of suitable actors.

Some of the actors we might be going for might be the same," Loader concedes.



CRITICS' SIGHS

Salman Rushdie couldn't be more pleased

Despite the fatwa, Salman Rushdie was able to make his first pre-announced appearance in public earlier this month in London when he took part in a literary debate, 'Writers against the State' organised by The Times newspaper.

He foresaw a time when he might be able to come out of hiding completely. "I can't predict exactly when it will be but, nobody will be happier than I," he said. "I have always been aware of the fact that one's ability to be free is something that one has to take for oneself. It is not handed out on a plate. I have always felt since the start of this affair that it was important to take gradual steps to regain the ability to lead a normal life."

With him were his author friends, Martin Amis, Fay Weldon and Melvyn Bragg. Some Asians in the audience said later that they found his behaviour arrogant when dealing with a question from a Muslim critic. Others made the point that he does not appear any longer to have any Asian friends

Perhaps, Rushdie does not need them He must be buoyed up with the glowing reviews which The Moor's Last Sigh has had

The Sunday Telegraph Salman Rushdie Added Spice — by Doris Lessing "I found myself kept awake by a novel by Rushdie, the superb storyteller, for above all else, that is what he is

"This novel is as stuffed with delights as a da Gama spice sack, but while you are laughing at the inventiveness of the language and exuberance of the plot, all fuelled by a jovial anger ('anger is my inheritance') another voice is making itself heard During all this terrible time while Salman Rushdie has been under threat of death, he has always been cheerful and brave, has never shown what he felt, but all that is here, in this story, pain and fear transmuted "

The Times Literary Supplement Salaam Bombay! — by Orphan Pamuk "This book, in its scope, most resembles Midnight's Children, the best of Salman Rushdie's previous novels The fact that The Moor's Last Sigh is a lesser performance is nothing to do with Rushdie's creative powers as a verbal illusionist Filled with puns and verbal games, buffoonery and scenes of slapstick comedy, it proves that Rushdie is one of the most brilliant magicians of the English language writing now The problem, however, is that Salman the narrator the verbal innovator, too often rushes to offer help to save the day when Salman the fabulator, like his hero, Moraes Zogoiby loses his breath

Rushdie's love-hate relationship with Bombay is crucial For him, and for his narrator as well one feels that his 'super epic motion pictures of a city' has two sides One is 'improper Bombay', the many headed cosmopolis of diverse cultures, this is Moraes Zogoiby's 'inexhaustible city of excess' with which, he tells us, he is deeply and for ever in love The other one, the new Bombay of religious and nationalistic fanaticism, is the city of 'senseless' bombings and the egoistic cynicism of post colonial intellectuals and the new power elite The heartfelt political message of The Moor's Last Sigh is to defend the richness of the first Bombay against the assaults of the second, against the imposition of Hindu language, art and gods as 'authentic', Indian culture, against fundamentalist Hindu triumphalism

"More intentionally disorganised than complex, more funny than com passionate, more bitter than moving, The Moor's Last Sigh, lacks a central logic Somewhere in the novel, Moraes Zogoiby tells us that if he 'were forced to chose between logic and childhood memory', he'd go along with the tale Valid for every imaginative writer of Salman Rushdie's calibre, this remark produces the reader of The Moor's Last Sigh to reply but magic should also have its logic"

The Sunday Times Absolutely Fabulous by Peter Kemp "Moraes is, it's evident, something of a fictional surrogate for Rushdie, similarly surrounded by would-be assassins after the Islamic theocrats put a £2 5 million price on his head for alleged blasphemy Just as Rushdie's Japanese translator was shot by Muslim fanatics so here a Japanese art-expert who helps Moraes is gunned down by a psychotic

"In his boisterous books, battles are waged between the open-minded and the close-minded the tolerant and the dogmatic, the healthily sceptical and the sceptically doctrinaire

'In a way, the fatwa, which The Satanic Verses brought down on him constitutes a nightmarish confirmation of his world view Teheran's call for murder horribly endorsed the accuracy of Rushdie's insights

"Fundamentalist ferocity of another sort is deplored in The Moor's Last Sigh Surveying contemporary India Moraes recoils from the thuggish sectarian that is reducing the 'many headed beauty of the Hindu religion with its multiple gods to hooligan allegiance to the war-like cult of the Lord Ram

"The Moor's Last Sigh is sensationally but unstirringly stocked with evil beauties, pantomime termagants, shapely sexpots, ogreish tycoons and warped celibates The novel can be both lurid and psychologically colourless, crammed to bursting point, but depthless

'Where Rushdie's talent more masterfully manifests itself is in the extravaganza of his prose Passages of glowing description melt into bouts of word-play, flashes of wit scintillations of metaphor Images of exotic strangeness alternate with punning pyrotechnics Energy vibrates visibly from the page

It is extraordinary to reflect that this flamboyance is rooted in fortitude The Moor's Last Sigh is to be hailed as a triumph of imaginative indomitability With it, Rushdie unfurls his pent-up creativity and lets it gorgeously ripple out over a sombrely beleaguered life"■

DIDI, DIDI...!

Usha Uthup joined the people of South Africa to celebrate their freedom after three centuries of White domination

"It's really a free South Africa now!" exclaimed Calcutta's pop queen, Usha Uthup, with unconcealed ecstasy She had just returned from a South Africa sojourn where she held the people spellbound with her magical music "There is no ethnic discrimination now The Whites, Blacks and coloureds mix freely"

The old image of South Africa pampering the Whites and ill treating the Blacks is now a thing of the past, thanks to the first multi-racial elections last year that terminated three centuries of exploitative colonial rule and gave power to the majority Blacks

This was Usha's second visit to South Africa During her first tour in 1992, the 40 plus singer recalls, she was a witness to the blatant discriminations that many Indians living there for generations had to encounter "They couldn't walk on the same road, there were separate shops for them It was awful! I couldn't believe my own eyes!"

South Africa was not liberated then, but was beginning to show the first signs of a new dawn She had fervently hoped she would be able to revisit the country sometime And her dream came true, the contrast this time overwhelmed the singer

Usha was bowled over by the warm reception Whites, Blacks and Indians -- everyone -- came to see her concerts wherever she performed, whether in Johannesburg or Durban or Cape Town, for here was a singer from the land of Mahatma Gandhi who had come to partake of their jubilation, now that South Africa had finally unshackled itself from the vicious grip of White rule "We need more ambassadors like her," said the Durban metro mayor Sipho Ngwenya, praising her

'Mama Africa' and Usha Uthup in Johannesburg

Usha, or simply Didi, resplendent in Kanjeevaram silks, an array of multi-hued bangles, her trademark gajra on her snaking braid and a mega-sized bindi, is a great crowd-puller, her appeal unmatched With her disarming smile and husky voice, the Seventies' sensation struck an instant chord with her audience in South Africa

She belted out songs in various Indian languages and, of course, in Zulu and Afrikaan For she believes if "you want to reach out to the people you must sing in their mother tongue' And Usha has a way of mastering languages she can sing in 14 foreign tongues and nine Indian! Incredible

Usha's moment of triumph came on August 15 when during one of her shows she opted for the popular African number, Pata pata Mariam Makeba, South Africa's legendary singer more popularly known as 'Mama Africa and the original singer of Pata pata (who had recently returned from exile after 32 long years) joined her on stage

"It was such a thrilling moment The two of us singing together Such a thing had not happened before," reminisces the One two cha, cha cha crooner with a dimpled smile

South African Indians Usha discovered, cherished Indian music and there were very few songs from India which were not heard there

An exclusive radio station called Radio Lotus aired 24 hours Indian music in Tamil, Telugu Bengali Oriya and the singers ranged from K L Saigal to Kumar Sanu Quite in contrast to our tendencies for regional broadcasts and telecasts

"In India the more we talk about national unity the more parochial we become I cannot think of a regional channel which gives the songs in all Indian languages But there you have it in South Africa!"

Usha is always there singing for a cause for she believes "Music is not my business communication is"

Turn of the KEY

BY SHANTA GOKHALE

Extracted from Rita Welinkar by Shanta Gokhale, Disha Books, Rs 115

The same dream again Rita wakes up exhausted from the panic of pulling balls of hair out of her mouth Her upper lip is dotted with sweat, her limbs are limp Her chest heaves Through the slits of her half-open eyes comes a shimmering blue radiance and into her nostrils, filled with the smell of ether and the odour of flesh and blood, creeps a wisp of expensive perfume

Rita wants to smile but the muscles of her face do something else "Did I disturb you? You're frowning Or is it the usual frown that greets me?" Ina Aunty, holding the pleats of her light blue georgette sari together, sinks like a pleasurable sigh into the chair by Rita's bed

Rita shakes her head "The frown wasn't for you It was probably for the dream I was having"

"Perhaps But it wouldn't worry me even if it was for me I know you don't like me, but I must do my duty I had to come and see you"

"But I'm glad you've come," Rita says with a frank smile "It gets quite boring here There's nothing really the matter with me Sangeeta comes every day, but quite late, after work"

"And when she gets home, she locks herself in her room with Eric till all hours Not of course since Shanks stopped him from coming over But Nellie was telling me, from what she'd overheard, something's brewing at the office She and Shanks are very worried"

Rita sits up bolt upright "What's brewing?"

Ina lifts her gracefully curved shoulders, slightly "Who knows? Ask her, since she comes every day Something's certainly amiss She's losing her looks completely She's at the marrying age and look at the dark circles under her eyes Her hair bundled up into that untidy knot, and those coarse, loud coloured cholis and saris like ghati's In our days do you think anyone as ungroomed as that would have found a job with a reputable company?"

"I know who would have got jobs in reputable companies in your days, Ina Aunty, and for what qualifications," Rita can't stop herself from saying While she is racked by worry about what's gone wrong at Sangeeta's office, this woman goes on about looks

Ina raises her neatly plucked eyebrows and straightens the pleats of her sari The expression on her face is the same as when she's lecturing Nellie and Shanks on the mistakes they made in life, that have brought them to the present pass Smiling crookedly, she says, "Your barb has gone home, but such barbs don't hurt me Just as there are men of the world, there are women of the world These are the people who run the world They know where the key to every human being is Turn the key and your work is done Listen to me I'm going to take advantage of your being captive here to tell you a few things Once you come out, you'll spin around like a top, with no time to listen What I want to know is, why you girls refuse to conduct your lives intelligently People like us don't have the wherewithal, the family infrastructure to live cosy, protected lives When I lost both my parents in an accident at the age of sixteen, I had only two qualifications - I had just done my Senior Cambridge and could speak English well, and I was beautiful I had no other assets and no human being whom I could call mine How was I to survive? A friend of my mother's introduced me to a gentleman she knew He could give me a job she said In our first meeting, he said to me 'My wife doesn't live with me You will have to spend time with me when I ask you to" At that age how was I to know what spending time meant? I thought it meant chatting with him or seeing a film with him He realised it and didn't rush me He was basically a very nice man That is why we are still such good friends But if I had been uppity and refused to comply, I'd been out on the streets Yes I 'spent' time with him We had great times together Wives also 'spend time' with their husbands in addition to slaving for them What do they get in return? Comparatively nothing I got a lot from him Of course, I'm not suggesting that this alone has helped me reach the position I am in today No I was intelligent and worked hard and picked up skills fast and learned on the job and rose But I am grateful to Teddy and the woman who introduced me to him for giving me such a good start I tried to do for you what that friend of my mother's did '

"Please, Ina Aunty I'd rather not talk about that "

"Suit yourself But what gives the right to act all untouched and pure, anyway? What have you got with all your moral principles? I lived clean You've lived dirty "

"What are you suggesting?" Rita asks, watching the cunning shades in Ina s eyes

"Don't pretend you don't know," Ina murmers in her warm, silky voice, letting her lashes down over her eyes "I'd had a relationship with a married man, but he acknowledged me publicly I went around with him in style — to parties, abroad, the theatre, the cinema My man was upper class He was a king A lion among men You found yourself a little middle-class mouse What sort of love did you make in dark mouseholes, hiding from the world?"

Rita wants to sink her teeth into something, someone, draw blood She clenches them hard and says, "I have no wish to listen to you I don't know what you're talking about If you have nothing else to say "

" then I may leave, mayn't I? Ina's lips are two straight, sharp lines "Don't worry I intend to go I merely wanted you to know that everybody has seen through your life Did you think we didn't know? Did you really think that?"

Rita's lips are paper white "Mummy? Daddy? "

"Of course," Ina rises triumphantly from her chair in one graceful, sinuous movement like a swan lifting its head out of water

"But they think no end of Salvi "

"Why shouldn't they? He's a fine man A proper gentleman

'Gentleman'? He's isn't what he's pretending to be He is fooling them and his family And that makes him a gentleman?"

"Fooling them? What an idiot you are Didn't I tell you they know what they need to know? How can he fool them? He knows that they know "

"Rot He's always saying they'll never get over the shock if they knew "

"You really are an idiot People who have cancer know they have cancer but we don't talk about it, do we? They'd be shocked if you talked about it! Things take their course People know That s enough "

Rita is still But inside her, a wave of laughter is building It surges up and breaks, foaming at her mouth Another comes and another, till one rises, unaccountably, to her eyes and breaks at their rims, flowing down uncontrollably while she continues to laugh Ina, frightened, calls the nurse, who gives Rita an injection That is what Rita is craving for She does not wish to think She doesn't want to go under in that thick, black water She wants to swim into a warm cave and sleep, with her knees drawn up against her chest

Ina sits still by her side watching her sink into a drugged sleep Then she gets up softly Leaning over, she places her lips on Rita's forehead, then, making sure her stiletto heels don't ring too loudly against the cold, hard floor of the ward, she glides away

"RESPLENDENT KANGRA"

An enchanting dream trip to Dharamsala & Palampur.

ST JOHN CHURCH

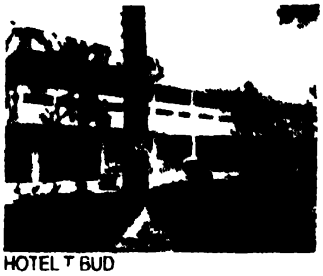
The first line of morning quietly appears on the distant horizon and gently unload the stars of the night into the waters of the thousands of streams that flow through Kangra's enchanting valleys The curving terraces of the fields steadily climb the slopes and watch life stretching its limbs in every picturesque hamlet The vegetation is a fascinating mix of tropical and sub-Himalayan varieties Behind, a sheer-wall covered with breathtaking murals carved in snow, rise the Dhauladhar ranges - stark white against the flawless sky and misty, romantic pink at dusk

As we take any of the half-a-dozen roads that feed Dharamsala, even the breeze carry a heady cocktail Dharmsala is the district headquarters of Kangra and rises from 1300 mts to a commanding 1770 mt

Strategically placed near the bus stand and between Lower and Upper Dharmsala, is Himachal Tourism's Yatri Niwas This economy hotel complete with a drive in and restaurant has a choice of double bed rooms at Rs 400 and Rs 300

Past this, lies the little library - a veritable treasure trove on Kangra's rich heritage And just above, is the Kangra Art Museum whose exhibits include a gallery of Kangra's famous miniature paintings and a representative collection of sculptures, pottery and drawings, as well as the work of contemporary artists and photographers

With a long glazed corridor that faces the Dhauladhar rocks, while the rooms look out to the wide spread of the plains, this spur is crowned with the Hotel Dhauladhar Here, the Kangra suites are a luxurious pair, each complete with a drawing-cum-dining room, bedroom, dresser and splendid bathroom Each costs Rs 1200 There is a choice of de luxe and regular bed-rooms where the tariff ranges between Rs 450 and Rs. 700 The hotel has a host of other facilities that include a well-stocked bar and billiards room Higher still on the hills, is Himachal Tourism's gracious art-deco mansion - Kashmir House - once the property of the princely rulers of Jammu and Kashmir Here, where old world' elegance combine with modern facilities, a de luxe suite with four beds, costs a mere Rs 750, and the other double bed-rooms have a tag of Rs 600 and Rs 500



From Kashmir House, one can take the somewhat steep walk or drive to Mcleodganj Or past Forsythegani named after a commissioner of the Punjab - take the regular road that shines like a river in the afternoon sun Under the shade of cedar branches, just past Forsythegani, stands the charming little church of St John in the Wilderness.

Often called the 'Little Lhasa", McLeodganj now rests firmly on the world map as the residence of His Holiness The Dalai Lama A bare five minute walk from the Dalai Lama's residence is Himachal Tourism's Hotel Bhagsu The hotel's beautiful lawn - embellished with stones collected from the forest - is an invitation for a relaxed sit-out meal Here, there is an independent cottage for Rs 1000 and double bedrooms from Rs. 400 to Rs 1100 These hotels are also the base for a number of interesting excursions You can also venture to ancient temples - the rock cut monolith at Masrur, to Bhagsu Nag, Baglamukhi, or Chamara, to Haripur, Kangra, Nurpur, or to Trilokpur - in whose tiny confines are a Buddhist convent, Hindu temples, a mosque and a gurudwara You can imagine the sanguine stories that the stones tell at the forts of Kangra, Mangarh and Tira Sujanpur Or you can take in the serenity of Swami Chinmayananda's ashram at Tapovan

While at McLeodganj, the entire hillside embraces a cedar forest, at Palampur, 40 km from Dharamsala and at a height of 1250 mts, the landscape rises gently

The name, 'Palampur', comes from the local pu'um or 'lots of water' And water certainly abounds here. There are large rivulets small streams and tiny brooks of all sizes It is this bounty of water and the unique character of the climate - cool breezes laden with moisture from the snows and warm sunshine - that have given Palampur its tea gardens

The finest part of Palampur has been reserved for the church and Himachal Tourism's Hotel T-Bud With lush dew-kissed tea gardens across the road, the hotel rests amid a sprawling lawn on a wooded knoll Shaded by cedar and pine trees, this red brick building is a haven for those who seek solitude and privacy Its four bed suites cost Rs 600 and the double bed-rooms and prices at Rs 500 and Rs. 400

HOTEL T BUD

Take a delightful walk through tea gardens and fields to the Cafe Neugal where a sumptuous fare is yours for the taking by the banks of the Neugal stream

From the Hotel T-Bud, you can venture to the monasteries of Bir and Tashijong and at the latter meet the head lama who is yet to enter his teens At Andretta, 13 km away, is the gallery of the celebrated artist, Sobha Singh, and a pottery centre The more intrepid can take one of the passes through the Dhauladhar ranges to Chamba There are numerous temples around Palampur and the most famous is the exquisite one of Baijnath - a distance of 15 km - with an incredible range of unique carvings, it is said that here, King Ravana invoked Lord Shiva for the boon of immortality, an episode from the epic Ramayana

Just past Palampur, on the metre guage railway from Pathankot, another engine is added to the train But here, no visitor needs to be pushed and pulled The Kangra valley has its own stream and there is the smooth track of Himachal Tourism all the way ■

How to get there :

The airport at Gaggal is 14 km from Dharmsala and 37 km from Palampur

The broad guage railway reaches Pathankot which is 19 km from Dharmsala and 115 km from Palampur The metre guage railway comes to Moranda, 4 km from Palampur

WINDOW TO THE WORLD

I came in the spring, and took the room on the roof. It was a long, low building which housed several families, the roof was flat, except for my room and a chimney. I don't know whose room owned the chimney, but my room owned the roof. And from the window of my room I owned the world.

But only from the window.

The banyan tree, just opposite, was mine, and its inhabitants my subjects. They were two squirrels, a few mynahs, a crow, and at night, a pair of flying-foxes.

The squirrels were busy in the afternoon, the birds in the morning and evening, the foxes at night. I wasn't very busy that year, not as busy as the inhabitants of the banyan tree.

There was also a mango tree, but that came later, in the summer when I met Koki and the mangoes were ripe.

At first, I was lonely in my room. But, then, I discovered the power of my window. It looked out on the banyan tree, on the garden, on the broad path that ran beside the building, and out over the roofs of other houses, over roads and fields, as far as the horizon.

The path was not a busy one, but it held variety, an ayah with a baby in a pram, the postman, an event in himself, the fruit-seller, the toy-seller, calling their wares in high pitched tamil arpeggios, the rent collector, a posse of cyclists, a long chain of school girls, a lame beggar, all passed my way, the way of my window.

In the early summer, a tonga came rattling and jingling down the path and stopped in front of the house. A girl and an elderly lady climbed down, and a servant unloaded their baggage. They went into the house, and the tonga moved off, the horse snorting a little.

The next morning the girl looked up from the garden and saw me at my window.

She had long, black hair that fell to her waist, tied with a single red ribbon, her eyes were black like her hair, and just as shiny. She must have been about ten or eleven years old.

"Hello," I said with a friendly smile.

She looked suspiciously at me. "Who are you?" she asked.

"I am a ghost."

She laughed, and her laugh had a gay, mocking quality. "You look like one!"

I didn't think her remark particularly flattering, but I had asked for it. I stopped smiling anyway, most children don't like adults smiling at them all the time.

"What have you got up there?" she asked.

"Magic," I said.

She laughed again, but this time without mockery. "I don't believe you," she said.

"Why don't you come up and see for yourself?"

She hesitated a little, but came round to the steps and began climbing them, slowly, cautiously. And when she entered the room, she brought in a magic of her own.

"Where's your magic," she asked, looking me in the eye.

"Come here." I said, and I took her to the window, and showed her the world.

She said nothing, but stared out of the window uncomprehendingly at first, and then with increasing interest. And after sometime, she turned round and smiled at me, and we were friends.

I only knew that her name was Koki, and that she had come with her aunt for the summer months. I didn't need to know any more about her, and she didn't need know anything about me except that I wasn't really a ghost - not the frightening sort anyway. She came up my steps nearly everyday, and joined me at the window. There was a lot of excitement to be had in our world, specially when the rains broke.

At the first rumblings, women would rush outside to retrieve the washing on the clothes line, and, if there was a breeze, to chase a few garments across the compound. When the rain came, it came with a vengeance, making a bog of the garden and a river of the path.

A cyclist would come riding furiously down the path, an elderly gentleman would be having difficulty with an umbrella, naked children would be frisking about in the rain. Sometimes,

Koki would run out on the roof, and shout and dance in the rain. And the rain would come through the open door and window of the room, flooding the floor and making an island of the bed.

But the window was more fun than anything else. It gave us the power of detachment: we were deeply interested in the life around us, but we were not involved in it.

"It's is like a cinema," said Koki. "The window is the screen, the world is the picture."

Soon the mangoes were ripe and Koki was in the branches of the mango tree as often as she was in my room. From the window I had a good view of the tree, and we spoke to each other from the same height. We ate far too many mangoes, at least five a day.

"Let's make a garden on the roof," suggested Koki. She was full of ideas like this.

"And how do you propose to do that?" I asked.

"It's easy. We bring up mud and bricks and make the flower-beds. Then we plant the seeds. We'll grow all sorts of flowers."

"The roof will fall in," I predicted.

But it didn't. We spent two days carrying buckets of mud up the steps to the roof and laying out the flower beds. It was very hard work, but Koki did most of it. When the beds were ready, we had the opening ceremony. Apart from a few small plants collected from the garden below, we had only one species of seeds — pumpkin. We planted the pumpkin seeds in the mud, and felt proud of ourselves.

But it rained heavily that night, and in the morning I discovered that everything — except the bricks — had been washed away.

So we returned to the window.

A mynah had been in a fight — with the crow perhaps — and the feathers had been knocked off its head. A bougainvillaea that had been climbing the wall had sent a long green shoot in through the window.

Koki said, "Now we can't shut the window without spoiling the creeper."

"Then we will never close the window," I said.

And we let the creeper into the room.

The rains passed, and an autumn wind came whispering through the branches of the banyan tree. There were red leaves on the ground, and the wind picked them up and blew them about, so that they looked like butterflies.

I would watch the sun rise in the morning, the sky all red, until its first rays splashed the window-sill and crept up the walls of the room. And in the evening, Koki and I watched the sun go down in a sea of fluffy clouds, sometimes the clouds were pink, and sometimes orange: they were always coloured clouds, framed in the window.

'I'm going tomorrow,' said Koki one evening.

I was too surprised to say anything.

"You stay here forever, don't you?" she said.

I remained silent.

"When I come again next year, you will still be here, won't you?"

"I don't know," I said, "but the window will still be here."

"Oh, do be here next year," she said, 'or someone will close the window!"

In the morning, the tonga was at the door, and the servant, the aunt and Koki were in it. Koki waved up to me at my window. Then the driver flicked the reins, the wheels of the carriage creaked and rattled, the bell jingled.

Down the path went the tonga, down the path and through the gate and all the time Koki waved, and from the gate I must have looked like a ghost, standing alone at the high window, amongst the bougainvillaea.

When the tonga went out of sight, I took the spray of bougainvillaea in my hand and pushed it out of the room. Then I closed the window. It would be opened when the spring and Koki came again.

THE SIXTH EXTINCTION

I went to see some of our distant relatives at the zoo recently. The gorillas were the most dignified, despite being taunted by uneducated visitors. Some Arab tourists were even trying to feed them liquors of all sorts. The chimps were lying asleep behind the glass panes of their bedchamber, only one youngster was awake, turning somersaults over a swing.

Given humanity's undoubted command over the world, our culture, consciousness, language and human compassion, it would be comfortable to think that we are a long way from these apes. But we are not.

In genetic terms, chimps are much closer to us than they are to gorillas. Our genetic blueprints — DNA — differ only two per cent from one another. This makes us closer to the chimps than horses are to zebras — and they can be interbred. Fortunately, unequal chromosomes make impossible such an experiment between humans and chimps.

But still, the concept of ourselves as one species among many is one to contemplate in order to control our human arrogance and ego. It is a concept much promoted by the Kenyan, Richard Leakey, who is at present in the news for Safina, his new political party.

Previously, he had headed the Kenyan Wildlife Service, fighting to control elephant and rhinoceros poaching. But before he took on the poachers, or was beaten up by political thugs supported by an intolerant ruling party, he was searching for the origins of humanity - fossils were, and remain his chief love.

His parents Louis and Mary Leakey, were two of the most famous names in paleo-anthropology. His own most celebrated find was in the Great Rift Valley.

There, on an ancient sandy bed on the shores of what had once been a lake his team unearthed the best part of a skeleton one and a half million years old. This young man, called the Turkana boy, had died and decomposed on the lakeside. A strapping 5'8" tall, he was one of our African ancestors, a hunter-gatherer in the days long before homo sapiens.

Studying fossils is a little like studying astronomy — it fills one with a concept of the vastness of time and space, and of our own comparative insignificance. Dealing with fossils, one is also dealing with extinction. More than 99 per cent of all species which ever existed are now extinct.

One day, then, we shall probably be extinct, too, but long before that we shall have done something unique — we shall have single-handedly wiped out half of the species on earth, and that, too, possibly within the next three decades.

This is what Richard Leakey calls the Sixth Extinction, and which he discusses in detail in his book Origins Reconsidered.

The other five extinctions were caused by natural disasters. There were the Ordovician, 430 million years ago. The Devonian, 350 million years ago. The Permian, 225 million years ago, the Triassic, 200 million years ago, and the Cretaceous, 65 million years ago.

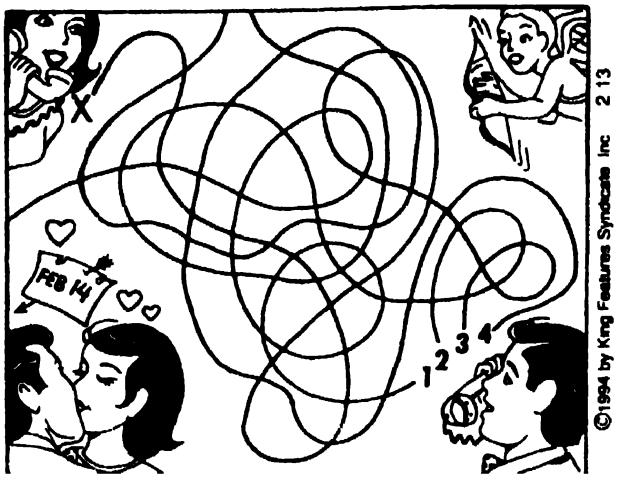
And here we are, only about a lakh years old as a species, and only about 10,000 years old in terms of civilisation — if you take it as the beginning when we settled down and began to produce food. We should have a bright future

The Permian was particularly bad, wiping out about 96 per cent of the living creatures and of course, you must remember the Cretaceous that was when the dinosaurs died, probably due to an asteroid colliding with the earth.

Because they're not with us any more, we tend to underestimate the dinosaurs, but they were the major terrestrial group for 120 million years and filled every conceivable evolutionary niche. Mammals in their days couldn't do better than be small, insectivorous creatures.

Only with their demise could the mammals, lucky survivors, begin rapidly to evolve and fill the gaps they left. Among these mammals was the ancestor of the primates from which 6,000 species evolved some 183 of which, including us, survive to this day.

And here we are, only about a lakh years old as a species, and only about 10,000 years old in terms of civilisation -- if you take it as the beginning when we settled down and began to produce food. We should have a bright future.



The average vertebrate species has a life of two million years and so we are young. There is no natural extinction due for millions of years.

But still, we have the Sixth Extinction. The world, before we began tampering with it, was more diverse in its life forms than ever before. Taking the atheistic view of Richard Leakey humanity has evolved with more free will, more ability to be flexible in its actions than any other species. This we are now abusing in our position as temporary tenants of this world, one species among many.

Even if we are ultimately doomed to extinction and extinct, as I read on a T-shirt recently, is for ever, that cannot excuse us from our actions now. We exist in the present and our duties and responsibilities lie here. Leakey has chosen to act through seeking political power, but his chief concern remains that we husband as carefully as possible all the world's resources to minimise the Sixth Extinction. For, by impoverishing the environment, we impoverish ourselves.

SHE'S GOT WHAT IT TAKES

Laila Rouass, the latest veejay for Channel V, is a woman of many parts, as Vaishali Honawar finds out

"I need to do at least three things at a time," says Laila Rouass, "or else my brain starts feeling dead." So among the other things she has studied are business, finance and journalism

"I have written for some magazines in the Middle East and for an Asian newspaper based in London on subjects like Asian women in marriage, AIDS and Asian supermodels. I've also written a couple of scripts," she says

She is 23 and has the world ahead of her, and quite a bit behind her already. Laila Rouass may be the newest face on Channel V, but she is no newcomer to the arclights, either. She has been modelling since 17 for such names as Vidal Sassoon, Chanel and Gianni Versace in the fashion capitals of the West

She landed in India four months ago for the first time, though it is the land of her mother — she is Goan, "my father is Moroccan and I was born in London," she laughs She came to act in a television serial, City of Dreams, being made by Firoze Nadiadwala "It is about Bollywood and I play a star, Sheena She's a bitch — some kind of an animal!"

She is working alongside veterans like Saeed Jaffrey and Persis Khambatta but, then, she has trained in drama since the age of 13, too Her aunt is a ballerina, another aunt is a dance teacher and a third is a filmmaker, so you could say it's in the family.

Two months after she came to India, Channel V happened — like all good things, unexpectedly "I was shooting for the City of Dreams in the nightclub, Cellars, when a guy from Channel V approached me and asked me if I wanted to be a veejay Now, I had been watching Channel V in my hotel room, but I was not very familiar with what was going on. Also, I was not sure if he was serious," she says

So she got the executive director of City of Dreams to check out the genuineness of the offer and once convinced, went in for the screen test "It's an adventure, an experience," is how she looks at the break. "One gets to taste different cultures I love this now"

She has already been appearing in The Vibe on Channel V with veejay Luke Kenny since mid-August — "breaking in slowly," as she puts it "When I veejay, I try to be spontaneous and just me — not another Ruby or Luke or Sophiya or Javed. I hope people will appreciate that"

The big thing — her own programme — should have happened by the time you read this "It will be called Fashion Police and it will be about street fashion — what Asia is wearing We'll be talking to people on the streets and we will cover all areas of fashion — beauty, hair, clothes"

Something else she is looking forward to, is the Indian Top 10 countdown which she will be hosting in the coming months Her own taste in music runs to "all types", her favourites being funk, soul and alternative music. "But basically, I just like good music, whatever it may be, even pop. Like Michael Jackson may be categorised as a pop musician, but he's also a very talented artiste Then there are some singers I just like to watch — like Madonna"

She has not heard any Indian music yet, not even the current craze, A R Rahman "I have an uncle who just loves Hindi film music, but that's the only time I've really heard Indian music' She has heard a few Indian pop stars, but has found the music too commercial, though she's quick to add that it is just a personal point of view

As a Channel V veejay she will be based in Bombay and that is not going to be difficult, for she likes the city and would rather stay here than in Hong Kong, given a choice. "I am yet to get used to the poverty, but I want to learn to deal with it and not ignore it I'd like to help in any way I can — do bigger things through charity, not just here, but anywhere in the world."

Laila loves films "passionately" and watches them all. "But not horror movies — they don't scare me at all." She likes European movies because they are quite educational. "European movies tend to be much deeper than big-budget Hollywood films."

She has watched some Hindi films, too, but "I've not really understood what's going on." She has had a few offers to act in

Hindi films which she has not taken up yet. "I don't speak any Hindi," she laughs, "but probably, they could dub my voice."

She adds: "I'd like to get into films, but I want to take one step at a time and not see too far ahead."

Meanwhile, she has taken up some of the modelling offers that have come her way, including an ad for Tips and Toes cosmetics and pictures for Gentleman and Femina magazines.

She finds the modelling scene here "very interesting because unlike abroad, modelling is a fairly new thing in India". "It's very exciting to be in something which is just being recognised as a respectable profession

"Also, people are more open to new ideas and ventures and you have the chance to express yourself—something you wouldn't be able to do in London where people are more set I think I'm here at the right time"

Abroad, she feels, Asian supermodels—particularly, Indians—have not been given their due "There are so many beautiful Indian models, but most agencies in London don't have any Asian girls in their lists because there is an attitude that Asian girls are not allowed to model

"That's not true, specially when you have had a Miss Universe and a Miss World It would be great to see an Asian doing Chanel and earning millions."

She has a very high opinion of Indian models and finds them "as professional as the ones I've met abroad, and as beautiful" "Any unprofessionalism one sees is backstage and that's the only thing I would like to change"

Indian men, she thinks, are very open and have a great sense of humour She also loves dark-skinned guys, "so it's the perfec' place for me!" ■

The Dead End

The quadrangular wire net
Gives through it a vision of a mossy green wall
When the sun shines on it on a quiet monsoon afternoon,

A small sapling, born out of some mysterious excreta,

Swings in sympathy with the songs of chirping birds,

Perhaps in anticipation
That it will give shelter to them all—
One day.

The long lost memories of bygone afternoons Gather in the mossy green
Alas!

The little saplings does not know Where its roots are going to be
The soft clay has long been converted Into impenetrable brick walls

The bewildered rootlets futilely search for
A little water shelter
Amid the crevices

The defeated attempts To fight the indiscriminating sunscorch
Is over
The winter wind has taken its toll

The soft green is now brittle brown
The tiny leaves have been snatched away by the harrrowing wind

Only a tuft of dead roots remain—
Swinging with the winter chill—
Like the bewitching fingers of a fortune-teller
Forecasting reality

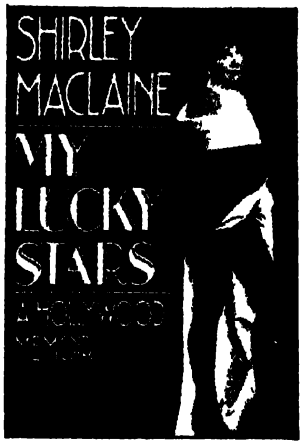
Pocahontas She is the daughter of the powerful Red Indian chief, Powhatan Driven between duty and destiny, Pocahontas life is transformed forever when she befriends the handsome British soldier, Captain John Smith

Through Smith's eyes, she learns to fish for her dreams which lie "just around the river bend", and in turn, teaches the young captain all about the ways of the forest and of the native American way of life

When the fragile relationship between the Red Indians and the British suddenly cracks up, Pocahontas bravely saves Smith's life by giving up her own



The film is an adventure story in animation fusing historical facts with the romance of folklore and legend

The vibrant voice of Captain Smith comes from who else, but Mel Gibson, and Linda Hunt, the Academy Award-winning actress, infuses magical life into Grandmother Willow, a 400-year-old mystical spirit guiding Pocahontas whose voice is, in fact, that of Irene Bedard, the native American performer

Director Mike Gabriel known for the memorable genie in Alladin has researched exhaustively in filming the story

The musical score is by Alan Meken of The Little Mermaid and The Beauty and the Beast fame

Crystal Clear: If you thought grey was the colour to let you down at parties, you may think again.

Gianni Versace's Paris collection is a stunner, as the model struts around in a pale grey suit under a see-through dress reminiscent of gossamer sheets of crystal draped seductively around the waist.

The suit for its part, clings tightly, leaving the bosom amply bare. Matching kid gloves and silver stilletos add precision and style to the wearer. Freshly shampooed hair left to flow loosely at the shoulders gives that rare touch of elegance and jiva.

Hum Do, Hamare Nil

■ In spite of the fact that the world has come a long way since the days of Manu and his chauvinistic strictures, the idea of a complete woman is yet to be severed from motherhood ('It's Our Life', August 13).

In Indian society woman's lib means, at the most, a swanky washing machine in the kitchen and the reminder she is in no way inferior to man

But in reality she is constantly made to understand her only function is to beget children Rarely does she get an opportunity to test her maternal instincts Whether they are natural or forced down her throat by a male-dominated society.

What could be more sane if couples found complete fulfilment in each other? Shouldn't their love be an end in itself?

It is not essential that couples have children They could adopt a needy child if parental instincts were that strong

Aami aabar kandbo-hashbo,
Ei jeebon jowarey bhashbo,
Ami bajrer kachhe, mrityur majhe
Rekhey jaabo nishana

(I shall laugh and cry again,
I shall be swept along the tide of life,
I shall leave my mark in the face of thunder,
In the midst of death)

Salil Chowdhury has been true to the words he penned for this inspiring number that he himself composed and got Hemant Mukherjee to render (Aami jhorer kachhey rekhey gelam aamar thikana — 1961) This defiant streak with which the composer began his career in the Forties did not desert him almost till the very end

Composer, poet, lyricist, writer, film director, music conductor, Salil Chowdhury was virtually a one-man entertainment industry Sensitive, humanistic, romantic, revolutionary and passionately fond of intellectual arguments, he embodied the best of Bengal's post-Rabindric cultural ethos

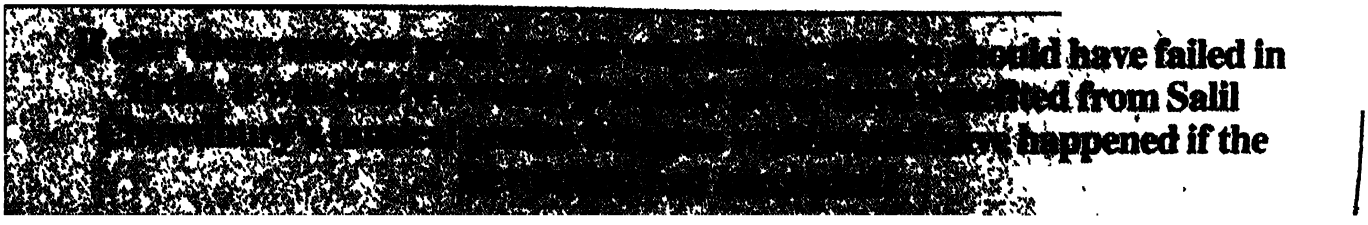
Unlike many of the contemporaries, however, he did not believe that the only culture the rest of India was capable of generating was agriculture

Probably, it was his early initiation into Marxism which bestowed this wider vision His mission was to take his cultural moorings to a wider audience, interact with different milieux and create a fusion of ideas

In the arena of music, Salil was among the first Indians to recognise and assimilate the awesome diversity of traditions into a common idiom Further, he did not confine the scope of his search to within the geographical boundaries of this country, although he was sensitive enough never to directly plagiarise, he always blended

The move to Bombay in the early Fifties and the enviable critical acclaim combined with commercial success that followed, did not make the man lose his commitment to art Too creative to be bound by the shackles of monetary consideration alone, Salil composed and indulged his other creative talents essentially because he wanted to — not because he dreamt of a bungalow in the Juhu-Vile Parle Scheme, or a bagaanbari at Barasat

Barring Bappi Lahiri — whose ravenous appetite for money and cacophony is legendary — it must, indeed, be said for the Bengali composers of Bollywood. They never became full-time devotees of Mammon Be it Ram Ganguli or Kanu Roy, Sachin Dev or son Rahul (who died with Rs 5 in his bank locker), Hemant Mukherjee or Salil Chowdhury, none could dream of asking for the kind of fee comparable to what even a Nadeem-Shravan (leave alone A.R. Rahman) command today



But even by the standards of the Fifties and Sixties, Salil Chowdhury was a very modest man while many of his contemporaries who were immodest had much to be modest about He also was an inseparable part of Calcutta's bhadralok culture, a trait he could never exorcise from his personality, despite decades of association with Bombay

The revolution, which Salil Chowdhury wanted to struggle towards, eluded him, as it eluded the entire Communist movement If ever there was one good reason why the Revolution should have failed in India, it was that we would probably never have benefited from his musical genius Imagine what would have happened if the Revolution had succeeded!

Salil's creativity would have been straitjacketed into composing sterile military bands or setting to tune the mediocre penmanship of some Communist leader

Instead, even when he adapted revolutionary martial music, he imparted it with a soul, for example, the classic Dharti kahe pukaar ke from Bimal Roy's Do Bigha Zamin which was based on a Soviet military tune whose machismo he tempered through the introduction of an Indian classical element

But the revolution obsessed Salil Chowdhury, specially, in his early years That probably explains his intense fascination with Sukanta Bhat-tacharjee, the best specimen of the Ye aazadi jhoothi hai generation fostered by the CPI's Ranadive line of the late Forties The effort Salil put in to create music for the rebel poet's works of social protest could only have emanated from a revolutionary commitment

Runner chhutechhe tai jhum-jhum ghanta bajchhe ratey does not lend itself automatically to a hummable tune structure Salil composed in a way that the rebellious message to the working class, couched in the person of the dak runner, would not be drowned in melody When the stanza conveying the message came, Salil gave melody a break, getting Hemant to tunefully elocute

Runner, runner ki hobey e bojha boye, ki hobey khudhar klantite khoye khoye,
Runner, runner, bhor to hoyechhe, aakash hoyechhe lal,
Aalor sporshe kete jabey kobey ei dukkher kal,
Runner graamer Runner, shomoy hoyechhe notun khabor anar (Runner O Runner, what is the point of carrying this burden, what is the point of being fatigued by endless hunger?
Runner O Runner, it is getting to be dawn and the sky has a reddish glow, when will darkness of the night fade away at the touch of light?
Runner, the village runner, the time has come for you to bring news of change)

His attachment to Sukanta was also evident from the difficult compositions he attempted for the poet's Abaak prithibi abaak korley tumi,
Jonmei dekhi khubdho swadeshbhumi and the more directly rebellious Bidroho charidikey bidroho aaj

As a participant in the CPI-sponsored tebhaga movement in Bengal, Salil stayed underground for some years But even in the midst of the peasant struggle and the acute material discomfort of being, his musical creativity refused to take a revolutionary vacation

He assimilated the virility of folk music to compose simple yet powerful melodies like Dhaan katar gaan, Nouka baoar gaan, Joarer gaan and Palkir gaan

His empathy for the kisan woman and subsequent commitment to women's issues (despite a controversial private life) was most eloquently expressed in a song he penned and composed himself — Shono ek gaayer bodhur katha tomai shonai shono This 1949 number was also his first major commercial hit, despite his having been underground at that time, necessitating friend and fellow IPTA activist Hemant Mukherjee to arrange the music for its recording

My personal favourite among Salil's early Bengali numbers, however, is Dhitang dhitang boley (1954) The sheer vibrancy of its rhythm, accentuated by the spectacular use of the drum, places the composition way above many others of its genre both on account of its vitality and simplicity of message

E desh tomar amar, ei amra bhori khamar
Aar amra godi shopno diye shonar kamonay
Aay re aay, lagan boye jaye,
Megh gur-gur korey chaander shimanay
Parul bon daake Champa chhutey aaye,
Borggera shob haanke komor bendhe aay
(This country belongs to you and I,
It is we who fill up the silos with grain,
And it is we who build our dreams in the longing colours of gold
Come on, come on, time goes by, the clouds rumble around the periphery of the moon Sister Parul calls, O Champa? come running, the burghees threaten, come prepared)

The moon entwined by clouds was a recurrent theme in Salil's repertoire of imagery Much later, in the early Seventies, he wrote and composed a fascinatingly orchestrated Bengali number, sung racily by Hemant despite advancing age But again, personally, I find this to be one of Salil's engagingly catchy numbers

Shono, kono ek din
Akash-bataash jurey rimjhim, baroshay
Dekhi tomar chuler mato megh shab
Chander mukher paashe chhorano,
Mon haralo haralo mon haralo,
Mon haralo haralo mon haralo
Shei din (Listen, one such day,
While it was raining across the skies and the wind in the monsoon,
I saw clouds like your tresses
Sprawled across the face of the moon
It was that day,
I lost myself to you)

One wishes Salil Chowdhury could express himself in Hindi, too While his musical message reached almost all parts of the country as the multi-faceted composer set even Telugu numbers to music, the rest of India was denied access to his poetic abilities If only he also had the power of Sahir Ludhianvi's pen

And, indeed, it is a pity that Bombay's revolutionary poet and Bengal's revolutionary composer never came together Perhaps, their idioms were too far removed But it is an abiding pity, nevertheless Maybe, B R Chopra who never strayed from

India will remember Salil for Madhumati, if nothing else. The effortlessness of his compositions was simply breathtaking and revealed the range of his creativity. Seen today, the erstwhile classic may appear a little contrived, but its melodies will haunt forever

Sahir could have brought them together, but that was not to be The only BR Films production for which Salil was engaged was the Rajesh Khanna-Nanda starrer, Ittefaq, but it was a songless venture (he did the background score)

India will remember Salil for Madhumati, if nothing else The effortlessness of his compositions was simply breathtaking and revealed the range of his creativity The sweeping nine Filmfare awards (still a record) which Madhumati fetched, stopped short of doing full justice to the film Seen today, the erstwhile classic may appear a little contrived — what with rebirth being its theme — but its melodies will haunt forever

Probably, no composer has worked harder to produce a musical score Salil Chowdhury, it is said toured Kumaon for six months, mingling with the hill people, to come up with authentic melodies that would blend with the setting Thus emerged Daiya re daiya re chadh gayo paapi bichhua Julmi sang aankh ladi, Ghadi ghadi mora dil dhadke, Toote hue khwabon ne, Suhana safar aur yeh mausam haseen and other memorable numbers that still form the staple of nostalgia music on radio and TV

In a television interview, Salil recently demonstrated the effortless ease with which he composed He revealed how he just related the mukhda tune to Shailendra once he had finalised Daiya re daiya — just four strains and the perceptive poet instantly came up with the perfect lyrical fit

Salil was a composer's composer, because unlike his market-driven counterparts, he never set prose to music The tune was sacrosanct and had to precede the words The situation could then be adapted

Madhumati powerfully drove home Salil's forte — unorthodox experimentation, that flew in the face of conventional commercial wisdom Besides fusing apparently contradictory musical heritages, he also experimented frequently with voices, specially male

Few modern music directors apart from Khayyam have done justice to less domineering male voices as that of Talat Mehmood Shankar-Jaikishen rarely used him (barring the notable exception of Ae mere dil kahin aur chal), even S D Burman only experimented with him hesitantly (Jalte hain jiske liye)

Later composers like Laxmikant-Pyarelal obviously found Talat completely out of sync with current tastes, although Bombay's most durable duo did get Talat to render a lilting duet once with Lata (Mohabbat ki kahaniyan sunane lagi hain jawaniyan in a long forgotten film, Woh Din Yaad Karo)

Laxmikant-Pyarelal told Raju Bharatan at that time that they would project Talat in an altogether new light as they had done with Mukesh after Milan But alas, that was never to be

Salil Chowdhury, on the other hand, used Talat superbly, both solo and in Lata's company Itna na mujhse tu pyar badha hardly needs recalling, nor for that matter does Aansoo samajh ke kyon mujhe (both, Chhaya) But Raat ne kya kya khwab dikhaye and Jhoome re nacla ambar jhoome from Ek Gaon Ki Kahani and Aha rim jhim ke ye pyare pyare geet liye (Usne Kaha Tha) certainly merit mention as some of Talat's most uncharacteristic, yet successful numbers

Salil took Talat away from his all too predictable vocal quivering which had convinced Bombay composers that he was fit only for slow, mournful ghazals and little else

The one male singer Salil did not seem too comfortable with was Kishore Kumar He was rarely used and whenever the song demanded a deep voice, the composer seemed to prefer the nasal intonation of Mukesh to Kishore's forthright soulfulness Still, the rare Kishore-Salil tie-ups made history — be it Chhota sa ghar hoga in Naukri or the much later Koyi hota jisko apna from Mere Apne and Guzar jayen din or Champavati tu aaja (with Lata) in Annadata

Perhaps, the one thing that distinguished Salil Chowdhury from his contemporaries (including the highly revered Dada Burman) was his utter disregard for the star system when it came to engaging singers Who else would have exprimented with the Hemant clone Dwijen Mukhopadhyay, in Ae dil kahan teri manzil in Maya or Dil se dil ki dor baandhi in Chhaya which was a transcreation of the Hemant number in Bengali, Duran ta ghurun, oi legechhe paak?

These were probably experimentations which made an irate Shankar-Jaikishen, who smarted for years for having been dropped by Raj Kapoor

With wife Sabita and two daughters

Salil Chowdhury was a composer's composer, because unlike his market-driven counterparts, he never set prose to music: The tune was sacrosanct-and had to precede the words. The situation could then be adapted for Jagte Raho in Salil's favour, go one step further to briefly flirt with another Hemant clone, Subir Sen, for Badi Bahen (Mann rangeela pyar ka raahi) and Aas Ka Panchhi (Dil mera ek aas ka panchhi)

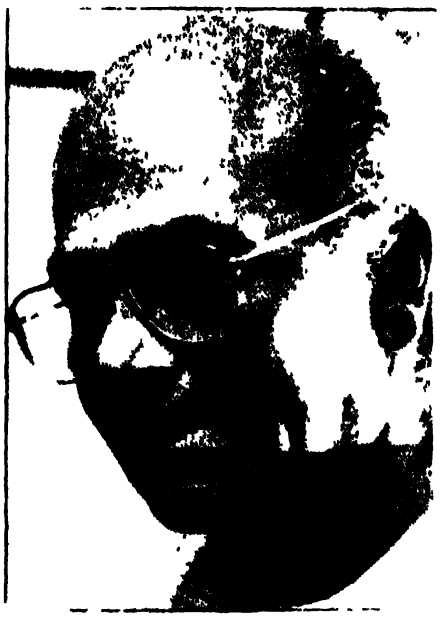
In later life, Salil Chowdhury boldly introduced Yesudas to render the fast paced superbly catchy Jaaneman, jaaneman tere do nayan in Chhoti Si Baat although Ravindra Jain got the better part of the credit for getting the Malayali singer to playback for the same hero, Amol Palekar, in Chitchor (Jab deep jale aana) Similarly, Salil occasionally experimented with his second wife, Sabita, too, but without appreciable success

Somewhat surprisingly, given the nature of Salil's generally rhythmic, vibrant compositions, Mukesh was a great favourite It Zindagi khwab hai for Jagte Raho was understandable, given that it was an RK film, the use of Mukesh for Suhana safar and Dil dhalak dhadal for Madhumati was not a logical corollary since Dilip Kumar was never hung up on the singer, as such



Yet Mukesh's only National Award came for the unforgettable rendering of Kaise baan unhi dekha hai,/ Ye jo man ki seema rekha hai / Man todne lagta hai picturised as a background number on Dinesh Thakur in Rajnigandha

In the late Sixties and early Seventies, in the post Shankar-Jaikishen years, Salil seemed to have suddenly re discovered Mukesh with Anand Purveyors of both Bengali and Hindi music remain confused as to who was better singing Kahin door jab din dhal jaaye (Amay proshno korey neel dhrubotara) Mukesh in Hindi or Hemant in Bengali?

Yet another Salil favourite was the evergreen Manna Dey Except Shankar Jaikishen, almost no other commercial Hindi composer has done justice to Manna's mellifluous voice, but Salil was different He used Manna to playback for the hero, as opposed to the villain/comedian/father/godman/boatman, etc , which was the normal tendency of other composers Of course, the tenor of Balraj Sahni fitted Manna perfectly which explains Salil's use of the singer for Do Bigha Zamin and the magnificently patriotic Ae mere pyare watan (Kabuliwala)

It was, however, in the fitness of things that Salil used Manna to render Zindagi kaisi hai paheli in Hrishikesh Mukherjee's Anand This had to become the signature tune for tributes to the composer, currently in vogue on the radio and television

Although fully groomed in the basics of Indian classical, Salil drew much more inspiration from folk and tribal traditions, besides the great Western masters Accused of rampant plagiarisation in the wake of Itna na mujhse (Mozart's Ninth Symphony) and the pahadi melodies of Madhumati, Salil sought to silence critics with Ja tose nahin boloon Kanhaiya in Parivar, one of the few numbers ever composed in the highly complicated Raag, Hamsadhwani This classical number was rendered by Asha Bhosle, whose cause Salil never seemed to particularly espouse

Sister Lata was his firm female favourite and much of the credit for making the elder Mangeshkar a household name even in Bengal goes largely to Salil who introduced her in 1959 with Na jeyo na, rajani ekhono baki and followed it up with the all-time superhit, Saat bhai champa in 1962 That cemented an association which led to some of Lata's Hindi superhits like O sajna and Ja re, ja re ud jaare panchhi being first tested in the Bengali Puja market and subsequently translated S D and R D later did the same, both with Lata and Kishore with equally resounding success

With Salil Chowdhury ends an era not just of creative, original compositions that have enriched modern Indian popular culture, but also the close bond between Bengal and Bombay

Salil was a rebel, but he never allowed his rebelliousness to overpower his conviction that in the communication business the first commitment had to be to the audience Throughout his life, he adapted, simplified and got his melody across to Jhumritalayya as effectively as he had earlier done to Shyambazar in Calcutta

With S D and R D , Kishore, Hemant and now Salil gone, the last tenuous bridge of popular culture is guarded alone by Manna Dey, and lately by Kumar Sanu, for Bappi Lahiri does not count and the likes of Swapna Mukherjee (an expatriate, anyway) are not steeped in the erstwhile creativity of Calcutta

In that sense, Salil Chowdhury's demise drives yet another nail into the bulging cultural coffin of what was once second city of the Empire

Revolutionary, romantic, populist, creative, carefree —Salil Chowdhury was all this rolled into one Had he marketed himself aggressively, he would have been written about much more, probably won many awards and called in as expert to address symposia But he chose to be just himself a modest man whose awesome talent could have well justified immodesty

At the risk of emulating a cliched signing-off number, one cannot resist Yogesh's prosaic, yet profound, observations which fit this great adda enthusiast

Kabhi dekho man mein ye jaage
Pichhe pichhe sapnon ke dhaage
Ek din sapnon ka raahi
Chalu jaaye sapnon se aage kahan
Jinhon ne sajaye yahan meley
Sukh-dukh sang-sang jheleyen
Wohi chun kar khamoshi
Yun chale jaaye akele kahan,
Zindagi, kaisi hai paheli haaye
Kabhi to hansaaye, kabhi ye rulaaye

'One of the seven notes of music has been lost'

BY NAUSHAD

In age I was older to Salil Chowdhury, but as an artiste he was greater than I

I do not remember the exact year when I first met him, but I think it was during the time he was composing music for one of Bimal Roy's films Later, at one of the meetings of the Cine Music Directors' Association (CMDA), attended by all big music directors and artistes of the time such as S D Burman, Salil Chowdhury, Hemant Kumar, Roshan, C Ramchandra, Shankar-Jaikishen, Mohammad Shafi and also a small artiste such as I, I was struck by his personality

I remember he spoke beautifully of his experiences in the world of music, enthralling me We would meet often after that, usually at my house He treated me with love and respect and would call me 'Naushad*bhai*' I, in turn, would call him Salil*babu*

As a person I found him very loving and I never heard anyone speak a bad word about him We would not meet very often except, perhaps, at CMDA meetings and at recordings, but when we did, we would talk only of music

On the days that we did not meet, I was in touch with him through his music I knew him only through his music and it was through music that I understood him

Salil*babu* was a member of the communist party and he stuck to its principles He propagated the folk art of Bengal and Rabindrasangeet and even sang some folk music, some of which I might still have with me, somewhere One of his songs, Doli chali, was drawn from folk music or Rabindrasangeet

Besides being a great music director, Salil*babu* was also a great poet, a great writer, and possessed the art of afsanangari — writing beautiful stories and songs It was easy to see that he possessed a vast knowledge of every aspect of music It was not as if he could only sing and compose, but he also had a good knowledge of orchestration

Today, music composers create a tune and then employ an arranger to orchestrate it, but Salil*babu* would arrange his own music He could also play the mandolin and the guitar beautifully

Salil*babu* had an exact understanding of harmony and an impressive and deep knowledge of Western music If one listens closely to his orchestration, one realises that he would use the oboe quite a lot and in some of his compositions he even used the alto saxophone beautifully

I think he did superlative work for all the Hindi films he worked on But, perhaps, Madhumati and Do Bigha Zameen are two of his most remembered works The folk song he used in Madhumati — Chhadh gayo paapi bichchua — was beautifully composed Other songs in that film such as Suhana safar aur yeh mausam haseen and Aaja re pardesi are remembered by people even today

But no matter which film Salil*babu* composed for, his music always had individuality In fact, this was the most special quality of Salil*babu*'s music — it had its own distinct brand, a seal of his quality, so to say The moment one heard one his tunes, even for the first time ie would instantly recognise it being composed by Salil Chowdhury

It is a very difficult art and a quality very few people possess Which is why I first said that while he was younger than I in age, he was greater than I as an artiste

Among Salil*babu*'s last works was the music which he composed for a television serial, Daraar. One of his compositions for this serial is a nazm in Urdu, penned by Naqsh Lyallpuri which I have not heard But all those who have listened to it have been raving about its beauty and sensitivity

Salil*babu* was himself planning a serial which unfortunately will never see the light of day

The best tribute to Salil*babu* would be, I think, if the musicians today listen to his music to take a lesson from it and absorb its beauty His music had originality and whatever he composed had a distinctness, a uniqueness a quality that we miss more and more in today's film music The more they listen to Salil*babu*'s music the more they will learn from it and it will guide them

During his life, it was not just his music, but also the functions of the CMDA which kept Salil*babu* busy We elected him as its president to succeed Anil Biswas sahib and he spread the CMDA's ideas far and wide

Unfortunately, in the years that followed, there was a dispute between the members of the CMDA Salil*babu* formed a separate association comprising S D Burman, R D Burman, Shankar-Jaikishen and some others while others including Madan Mohan, C Ramchandra and myself stayed back with the old body

A few days after that Salil*babu* visited me at my house and I told him that I did not feel good about the fact that we should be functioning as two separate organisations when we had a similar cause He agreed with me, worked for and brought about a reunification He continued to work for the CMDA until the very end

Some time back, he visited me to discuss the functioning of the CMDA Both Salil*babu* and I were also part of another society called the Indian Performing Rights Society (IPRS) and through this society we help artistes — writers, music composers — to get their royalty

Earlier, music composers and writers would not get any royalty after having composed a song for a film as the copyright for the song would automatically rest with the producer But the world over, there is a rule that if a song is used for commercial purposes — on the radio, in hotels, and so on — then its performing rights rest with the music composer and writer

This issue kept Salil*babu* occupied and through the IPRS he worked for the introduction of an amendment to the law allowing similar performing rights to Indian music composers and writers, which came into force on May 10, this year He was planning to set up a branch of the IPRS in Bengal as well

But so far as he himself was concerned, Salil*babu* could not care less about getting his royalty In fact, the last time we met, he was telling me how he had not prepared the statement for his royalty for years now

Next month, at the CMDA meeting, we plan to pass a condolence motion for Salil*babu* and also make the statement of his royalty which will be paid to his family Finally, I would like to say that an artiste lives forever through his art, and while Salil*babu* may have passed away from this world, the music which was his identity to all of us is immortal

I will always pray that his soul finds a place in heaven and that his family and friends find peace, too With his death, one of the seven notes of music has been lost to us

'The score for Madhumati is one of the best ever in Indian films'

BY SHIV KUMAR SHARMA

With Satabdi Roy

Despite being a classical musician first, I have always been very fond of film music

Before I settled down in Bombay, I used to live in Jammu, but I would often come down to this city for concerts At that time, one of the film music composers who caught my attention was Salil Chowdhury, particularly the number he had composed for the film, Parakh which went O sajana barkha bahaar aayee

I later met him for the first time in Bombay What struck me about him was that he had his own ideas and his own style of working He was a very versatile artiste, too, being a poet, writer and composer

Salil*da*'s score for the film Madhumati, I think, is one of the best ever in Indian films Sometimes one finds that a particular song from a film becomes a hit, but in the case of Madhumati each and every song was a rage

What impressed me most about Salil*da*'s work was the distinctiveness of his music Of course, in those days each musician had his own distinct style Salil*da* created his own style which was influenced by folk music, Rabindrasangeet and Western classical music There is this Hindi film

With daughter Antara

song, Itna na mujhse tu pyaar badha, which he had adapted from some Western symphony It was not just the sort of blind plagiarisation you find in the music industry today, but an intelligent adaptation

Today there is a lot of westernisation and lifting of tunes with no one bothering to contribute his own mite

Salilda's own special contribution to music was his use of the oboe in his compositions In fact, it was one of his favourite instruments

His use of obbligatos was marvellous, too, and he would often use counter-melodies — where different instruments play different tunes at the same time — beautifully

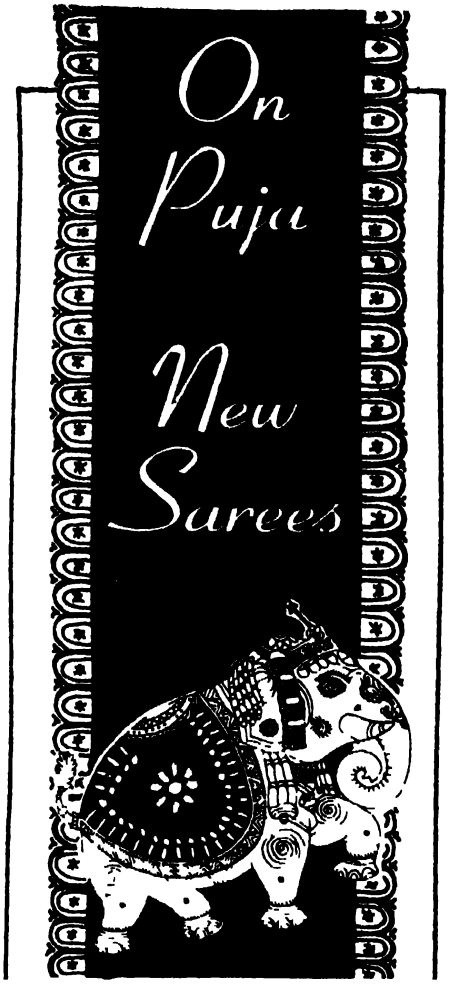
For example, he would have three or four flutes playing different tunes and harmonise them beautifully He had an exact idea of how to give music his own interpretation

He also had a very good knowledge of orchestration and Western notation which was a great advantage He was always very clear about what he wanted his musicians to play

While playing for him I, perhaps, did not have as much of an opportunity to play my own tunes as I have had with other music directors, but I found it extremely satisfying nevertheless to play for a music composer who knew exactly what he wanted

Unfortunately, I did not have too many opportunities to work for Salilda, I played just a few songs for him and didn't have too long an association with him either

I remember that once the Cine Music Directors' Association (CMDA) struck work for three months over a dispute between producers and music directors I was called in by the CMDA to handle the situation and it was during this time that I got a chance to see a very different aspect of Salilda's personality



He had a revolutionary background and had his own committments, his own philosophy Most of the other music directors joined hands with the producers to desert the CMDA cause, but not Salilda He continued to fight for the rights of the musicians and was a guiding force in their struggle He felt strongly that music directors should get their due

Other than this the only time I used to meet him was at recordings and I found him to be a very soft, friendly person, a bit reserved but very humane He was not an extrovert or a talker or a happy-go-lucky sort, but a very serious, committed, sensitive person

He was also very strong and committed to certain values And he certainly was one of the greatest music directors we have ever had

'Even the layman could tell his tunes apart'

BY HARIPRASAD CHAURASIA

When I entered the film industry, there was one music director, Mr Salil Chaudhury, who impressed me as a genius

Immediately after coming to Bombay, I was working with All India Radio. Salil*da* used to be very fond of the flute and used to play it at one time. He heard my music and when he came to know that I had just come to Bombay and that I was a different kind of a musician with a different kind of style, he invited me to meet him.

I did so, and, after talking for a while he asked me whether I would like to play in his film compositions. I was down and out as the money I was getting from AIR was certainly not princely, and jumped at the offer.

After that I worked with him on almost each and every one of his compositions, since 1963. I don't remember the names of the films I worked on with him, but I can say that I worked on nearly all the Hindi films he made.

Each and every song I played for him remains in my mind as a beautiful memory.

As a classical musician and also a composer, I found it satisfying to play for Salil*da* as he would give me a certain amount of creative freedom, particularly while playing background music. Sometimes he would ask me to create a certain mood with my music according to what the film needed. I could also see that he would really enjoy my music when I was playing.

Salil*da* loved classical music though his own music was of a very different style. But he had a deep knowledge of classical music and sometimes even used it as a base in his compositions.

There were many music directors at the time like C. Ramchandra, Naushad, S. D. Burman, Vasant Desai, Shankar-Jaikishen. They all belonged to a certain school of music, but each had his own distinct style.

Salil*da*, too, had a different quality, a certain identity. If one were listening to a song of Salil*da*'s on the radio, one would immediately identify with it. The musical intricacies of each of his compositions really set them apart. Not only musicians, but even the layman could tell his tunes apart from others.

Each of Salil*da*'s films, I would say, was remarkable musically. He was also tremendously versatile and would, besides composing, write lyrics and suggest song picturisations to producers. He had very different and revolutionary ideas in the field of music as well as other related fields.

As a person he was a very nice man. We would meet only at the time of recordings so I didn't really get to know him as anything else, but a composer. But he liked me and liked my music and I had tremendous respect for him.

I continued to play for him until the time he left for Calcutta, perhaps for his health or maybe because he did not have too much work on hand. I, too, got involved in playing classical concerts and stopped playing for films.

I myself compose music for films these days, but that is just one or two movies at a time. Two years back, I remember, I was playing at a concert in Calcutta and as he happened to be present he came to listen to me. After the concert he came backstage to meet me and told me that this was the first time he was hearing me play classical music at a concert. "I have learnt a lot from your music today," he told me.

That, in fact, was the last time I met him. It was a shock to me to hear that he had died. He was so young — he used to look really young.

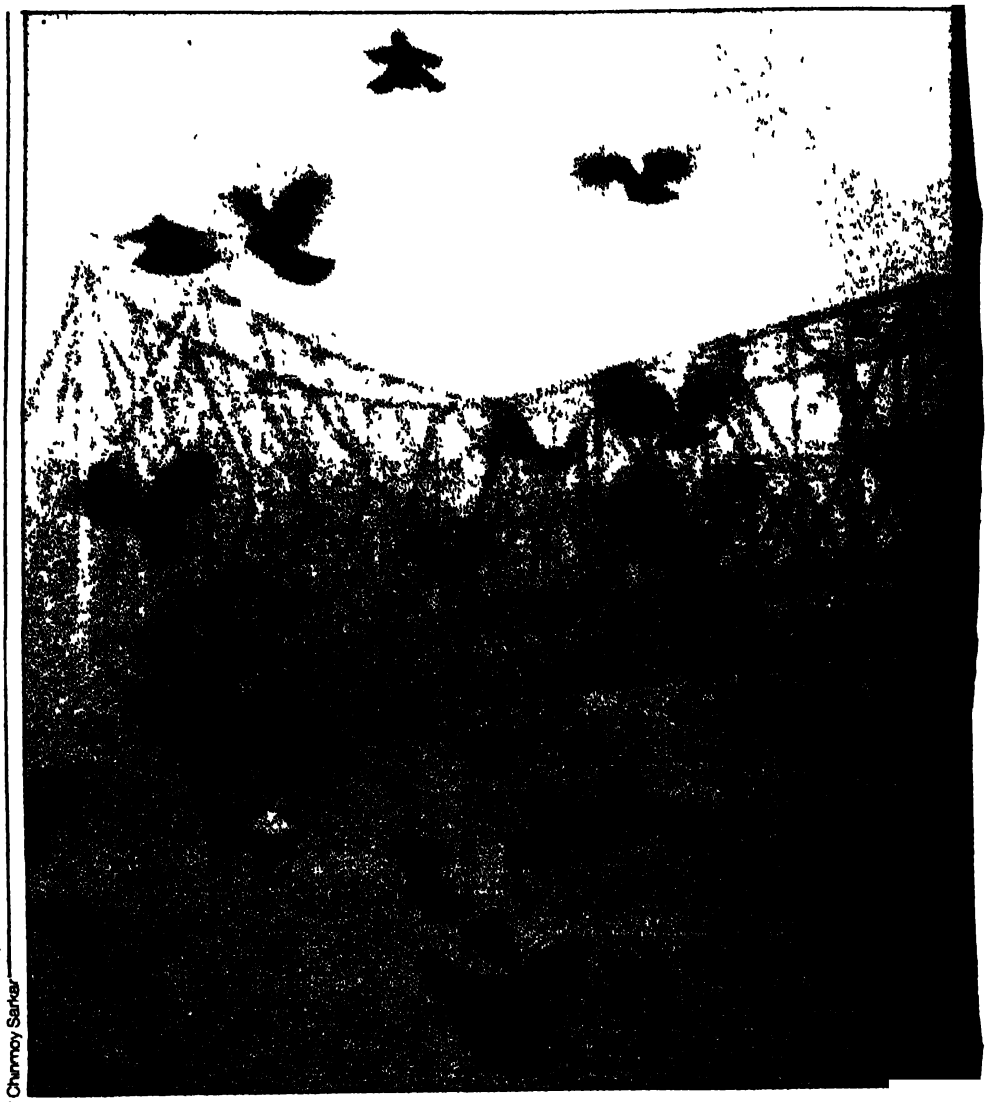
POETRY

Selected by Jayanta Mahapatra

Poem



Take a walk with me to the lake,
It's dark and nobody's around;
You feel your heart is going to break,
And your tears fall on the dewy ground
I'll show you a girl alone on the bench,
Gazing into the starry skies,
Like a moon draped in silken-white
She sits surrounded by fire-flies
If you wish to go and speak to her,
She won't look into your eyes,
For eyes they cheat, they hurt and lie
Unlike her starry skies

A little way down, a stone's throw from the lake
There's a man selling
Teardrops on the street,
While his lady waits for him
At their ramshackled retreat
The skin clings to the bones
Of her body already half-dead,
And she feeds imaginary gold-fish
With soggy salt and bread.
Waiting anxiously at the window,
She sees her man hurrying home in the rain,
Once more they unite in their happiness—

The King and Queen of Pain.

A minute's walk from there
In a building on the 2nd floor,
There's a room which you can enter,
For its owner never shuts the door
He lies all day on his dirty divan,
Dreaming of summer and springs,
But it's a broken bed on which he's lulled to sleep
By the music of the mosquito 's wings.

In Calcutta

The city sprawls unending like its hovels
Humanity amorphous swoons
We crawl with it, begging for alms
Calcutta explores moods of behaviour, human negligence, the onslaught is against time: the hidden myth

Everytime you are in Calcutta,
You say: "... just two, three days"
City of disbelief, these few days
I relive tempestuous moments desiring to love and be loved
What ails the heart? It must suffer
Your heart may be golden Calcut ta, but impurities surround you like your brazen speech, your ribald utterness like your teeming thousands· poor, uncared for, unsheltered
Let us worship the derelict
Let flowers bloom for you,
restoring heavens,
This touch will extinguish leprous hands

We gather a prayer, when alone with you .

EASTERN BYPASS!

Ritu Kumar was the one who dressed up the Miss UK aspirants in London recently, scoring yet again on behalf of Indian designers.
Samita Bhatia takes a look*

Twenty willowy (and very English) women walked the ramp in exotic Eastern silhouettes in leather and silk; an Oriental fantasy in exquisite prints expressing the Indian statement

At the Miss UK pageant, were the aspiring queens, entrants for the Mr UK title and 20 child-ushers

And the person draping them? Our very own Ritu Kumar, of course After the Tarun Tahiliani and Jemima coup (so what if there was a snag in the weave eventually), Ritu Kumar has done India proud

She had no inkling as to what lay in store for her when she designed the wardrobe for the two prettiest young things on this globe, namely, Aishwarya Rai and Sushmita Sen "Through them," says Ritu, "I was able to display the riches of India's regenerated and evolved textile crafts to the world " They went on to win the crowns and she basked in reflected glory, to become an international name in fashion circles

Is this Ritu Kumar's Big Break? "I'd say that it's a big break for India " This was proved beyond doubt in London recently

Ritu Kumar

Because, for the first time, an Indian designer was sought out to dress the participants for the grand finale of the Miss UK pageant

Though it came as a surprise to Ritu herself, the organisers called upon her to design garments for a complete section of the Miss UK pageant featuring traditional heritage and contemporary Indian fashion

It was a complete reversal of looks, as Western wear was forsaken for a traditional 'Indian, Indian' silhouette The East certainly met the West, and with amazing results! The charity gala was to conclude with the crowning of the new Miss UK and a special tribute to Miss World

"Designing for girls as tall as between 5'10" and 6'3" is a different ball game altogether," said Ritu, a trifle tired just before her departure to London "And I designed the 80 outfits 'blind'. Though measurements were faxed to me, I still had to manage without really knowing who would be wearing the garments or what their body structures were"

Is this any indicator of the world noticing Indian fashions and fabrics? "There is much interest in our fashions from the Western point of view as the Indian silhouette is very much in the forefront now," she feels

The show was a rich tapestry of Indian history There were the vibrant colours of tie and dye from the barren sandscapes of Rajasthan Fretwork designs from the sandstone palaces of the Fort city of Jaisalmer on silk with headgear harking to the nomadic camel herders—a rhapsody in black and white There was also a resonance of Royalty and the Mughal court—gold on white

A kaleidoscope of leather, crinkled chiffon and silk Contemporary and exotic travelled cheek by jowl

Aishwarya Rai did not just give away the Miss UK crown, she also added sparkle to the show by opening Ritu's show and donning the showstopper—a bridal dress—at the very end

As she pirouetted prettily in the yards and yards of Rajasthani influences, Ritu had an elaborate plan up her sleeve for the groom—Mr UK A traditional achkan in gold brocade and churidaar ('traditional rouched trousers' to the Brits) with a turban in gold tissue.

The 20 kid ushers were cutely dressed in silk khadi kurtas, coordinated waistcoats and handprinted chunnis for the girls and churidaar-kurtas with waistcoats in hand printed leather for the boys

The ensemble Ritu presented in London included designs from her highly

TO LONDON, TO LONDON...

Come October and Diwali and North Audley Street in London, will be the locale for Ritu Kumar's first boutique outside the country.

Ritu hopes that the boutique will infuse the modern consciousness of the West with traditional wisdom and skills of the East.

The boutique will present a range of India's craft silks brought to the point of perfection: garments, accessories, leather, furnishings, paper, reeds and a slice of the total Indian identity. "There'll be one of a kind tribal jewellery, old temple saris, antiques collected from remote interiors of India and a complete India experience," says Ritu.

A multifaceted showcase combining the best of Indian designs and Western culture with a special collection of merchandise, accessories and gifts, appropriately titled 'East Meets West'. An art gallery situated on the lower ground floor which will exhibit contemporary Indian and Asian artists.

Prices, Ritu promises, will not be sky-high, even by English standards.

acclaimed Tree of Life line and her Karabagh collection

Last year Ritu presented the latter, a collection of traditional and modern handbags and coats in leather, and a soft furnishings collection of cushions and quilts in silk. It was an experiment fusing traditional and modern techniques with materials accessible to the contemporary designer.

Ritu had diverse materials at her disposal, playing on a uniform design theme synthesised out of images from the Cholamandal coast, Kashmir, Sanganer and Farroukhabad.

Earlier in 1990, Calcutta, the Tree of Life celebrated 21 years of Ritu. An audio-visual tableau contextualised the major textile crafts and fashion forms of both traditional and modern garments. The 'Tree of Life' show has also travelled to China and the UK, where it got extensive coverage through BBC Network East.

Miss UK 1995 pageant had a few other firsts. An Indian designer had never before been invited to dress the contestants. And the Mr UK selected at the show will tread a similar path in February 1996, when the first ever Mr

World contest will be held in England

As Ritu stole the show that evening, a certain Shauna Gunn, the new Miss UK, walked away with a £25,000 cash prize, entry into Miss World 1995 with a chance to receive a guaranteed income of £50,000 Mr UK won £10,000; entry into Mr World 1995 and the chance to receive a guaranteed £25,000

And it's 'Beauty with a Purpose' all the way Miss World and Miss UK pageants have raised as much as $100 million for charity, mostly for disabled children In the past, the Miss UK pageant has been donating their annual fund raising to Variety International Lifeline Appeal which provides life saving surgery for children in countries having inadequate medical facilities

This year, too, the proceeds for Miss UK too have gone to Variety Club offering £750 (Rs 37,500) per table, to be spent on needy children

Besides a collection of 80 outfits put together in record time, Ritu made another contribution to the show — gifts that were part of the raffle at each table Silk scarves for the ladies and hand crafted gift sets of leather wallets, key fobs and glasscases for themen — valued at £120 (Rs 6,000) These being part of Ritu's Karabagh hand pain ted range

For the exclusive sit-down dinner where 600 of England's creme de la creme rubbed shoulders, Ritu's creation was introduced at the fund-raiser as being 'synonymous with style, sophistication and glamour"

Ritu has come a long way since she began it all — with a few printing blocks and a small workshop at Serampore ■

Pisces

February 19—March 20

Joint finances, loans, mortgage, funds, investments and hot passion is what the week is all about The moon-Pluto conjunction means plenty of movement, say immigration, import, export, and a shift or at least a change of scenery Tensions will definitely ease

BIRTHDAYS

September 24: The new moon, says Ganesha makes you think big, act straight, be purposeful with the result that victory will be yours.

September 25: Moon-Venus conjunction gives you good money and excellent tastes. Love be requited in full. It could well be journey time.

September 26: Moon, the mind, conjuncts Mercury, news and messages, and thus it depends all upon communication and contacts. Expect hidden help.

September 27: Moon-Mars conjunction gives you energy, but also rashness and impetuosity which could lead to accidents and mishaps. This year a little tact is required.

September 28: Financially, a topping year. Your ardh and behaviour will make others welcome you and love you. And that is what you deserve.

September 29: Mercury, communication, conjuncts Venus, art and beauty, and that is one of their finest combinations you could ever have for glory and genuine happiness.

September 30: Moon sextile Mercury-Venus means sweetness and light can conquer the world for you is the message of the stars. Be flexible.

Owing to pressure on space, 'Junior Whirl', Gillian Wright and Ruskin Bond's columns could not be carried this week— Editor

NOSTALGIA

A couple of Bengali non-film songs written some decades ago

Gaanyer bodhu

(Music and lyric: Salil Chowdhury; singer: Hemanta Mukhopadhyay)

Let me tell you the tale of a village bride, listen,
It is not a fairytale, no, it isn't,
The tale is a garland,
Dew-drenched buds of which
Had blossomed in the spring of life

Surrounded by green, she had Only a little hut,
But endless dreams swayed
When she sighted the paddy

At dusk when the peasant returned
And rested on the wooden seat,
She would open her heart out to her man,
Let me tell you that tale

The village, shaded, all of cooing doves
At the passerby would give tender looks,
Beckon him, welcome him to its fold,
And swishing a blue water lily,
Drifting down on a coloured balloon,
The fairy would lull to sleep the village

Bees would hum on the blooming flowers,
The sky and breeze carry the scent of ripened paddy,
An invitation to the festivity all the year
In Shravana, Baisakh and in Ashar

The village bride would blow the conch shell, and Lakshmi would fill the granaries of all

Alas, Yama then came in the form of famine,
Came the witch, the demon, the ghost,
And came the hundreds of snakes
Who danced, the vitiated dance enveloping the village

Oh, tens of hundreds of lives were lost
At the chants of the crooked
And the doings of the exploiters,
All essence of life was sucked away by the evil

Oh, where has that misty evening gone,
That aromatic air, that rhythmic life
Of yours, O beautiful village bride!

Where is that golden horizon,
Those hearts full of golden dreams!
I carry the deep, deep sorrow
Of the peasant and his bride

Even today, if you see a village
With rows of crumbled huts,
Be sure it is the grave of all
Hopes and dreams of that village bride

Path harabo boleyi ebaar...

(Music and lyric: Salil Chowdhury; singer: Hemanta Mukhopadhyay)

I have descended on the path only to lose my way,
Been long puzzled by the riddle of the straight path
Was subdued and restrained by a thousand don'ts,

Don't know when she returned
After calling me again and again
I wept and wept to sight her,
And closed my eyelids to get her
Been long puzzled by the riddle of the straight path,
I have descended on the path only to lose my way

Among the known and familiar
Have failed to know anything,
In the midst of the unknown now,

I continue my search
Haven't heard that song
She sang the other day,
Which had turned my heart to gold
When the song's radiance touched me

Have searched for her in vain
In the world of ragas,
I have tuned the sitar
Only to get dissonant
Been long puzzled by the riddle of the straight path,
I have descended on the path only to lose my way

. .And two of his Hindi all-time film hits

Toote hue khwabon ne.

(Film: Madhumati; music: Salil Chowdhury; lyric: Shailendra; singer: Mohammad Rafi)

Splintered dreams of mine,
You have taught me this
The heart, the heart did gain
What the eyes were to lose,
Splintered dreams of mine

I keep the fevered search on
But can't gain even upon gaining,
Why she sulks I know not,
She is the throb of my heart
What my desires were,
And what has come forth,
The heart, the heart did gain
What the eyes were to lose

On the rebound came my lament
After striking the stars
Of a ravaged world and Off the silent shores
But now this restiveness
Is of no use to me,
The heart, the heart did gain
What the eyes were to lose

Koi hota jisko apna...

(Film: Mere Apne, music: Salil Chowdhury; lyric: Gulzar; singer: Kishore Kumar)

Wish there was someone o' mine,
Whom I could call my own, O friends,
Not close, maybe, far be it,
But someone I could call my own

Wish there was no sleep in my eyes,
And only tears were afloat in them,
And I stayed awake even in my dreams
Wish there was one who would adopt my sorrows,
Wish there was someone, some mate

Some forgotten promise,
Some past memories,
My lonesomeness recalls all night
Wish there was some comfort,
Wish there was someone my own

SALIL CHOWDHURY passed away on September 5. Teaching us enough through his music and poetry We reproduce here his First Person published in the Magazine dated November 21, 1993.

What is your idea of perfect happiness?

As of now, it is my ability to compose a musical note that will unite my countrymen and inspire them to make India among the world's leading nations

What is your greatest fear?

That India may some day be ruled by fanatics who will silence the voice of all reason, and intellectuals will be singled out and shot.

Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?

The great masters of both Western and Indian music and their selections of records and an old gramophone which my father possessed. Philosophically, the dialectical and historical materialism of Marx and Engels

How would you like to be remembered?

I don't think I have any right to tell others why and how to remember me

What do you dislike most in others?

Crude and vulgar show of pomp and arrogance by those in the higher echelons of society

What do you dislike most in yourself?

My laziness and lack of stamina to stand up and protest against all injustice

What is your most precious possession?

An inner voice which helps me put the right notes when I compose.

What objects do you always carry?

My dreams and unsung melodies.

What makes you most depressed?

When cacophony replaces symphony

What do you dislike most on your appearance?

My bald head which used to be so full of thick, black hair, although my wife says I look better now

What is your favourite word?

The bottomline is....

What is your favourite journey?

Sitting on an elephant and passing through the Kaziranga forest, and saying 'hello' to bisons and rhinos I used to do this as a child

What is your favourite dream?

That all men should be equal

What is your nightmare?

Fascism.

What or who is the greatest love of your life?

I have been blessed with so many loves that I have lost count of them But I don't know which is the greatest Maybe, it was my mother's that turned the iron chain of sorrow into gold I keep on searching for it like the madman in Tagore's Paras Pather

What is your source of sustenance?

A very high target in front of me which I always set for myself and where I never reach.

On what occasions do you lie?

I lie like my father. He was a doctor and used to lie to terminal patients that 'you will be all right'.

What is your greatest regret?

That even after 46 years of Independence most of my countrymen are illiterate and below the poverty line, and that I can hardly do anything.

What has been your happiest moment?

When my first child was born It gave me the feeling of creating a human life I felt like God.

What has been your happiest moment?

When my first child was born. It gave me the feeling of creating a human life. I felt like God

How would you like to die?

While composing, sitting on a stool and resting my head on the piano keyboard

What brings tears to your eyes?

A good poem or melody, pangs of separation or joy of union, and human empathy like Mother Teresa says, 'I will take charge of all those orphaned at the Maharashtra earthquake.'

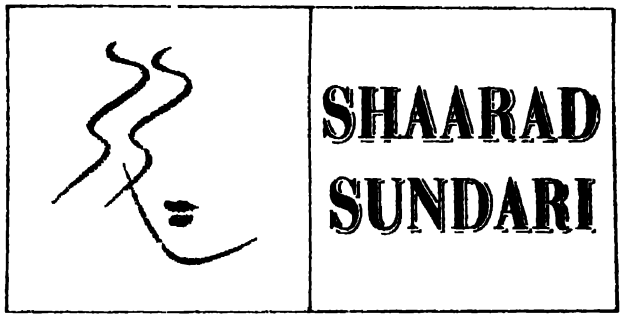
How do you relax?

By switching over from music to poetry, from poetry to painting, and playing chess or having a quiet booze.

What do you envy most in others?

What I will never achieve in this life, like being an Olympic athlete, a scientist, a cosmonaut, a Beethoven or an Angelo.

How would you like to be remembered?



I don't think I have any right to tell others why and how to remember me.

How would you like to die?

While composing, sitting on a stool and resting my head on the piano keyboard.

POST MORTEM

Salaam, Imran!

■ Pakistani politics has always been in the doldrums and when people find a charismatic figure, apparently clean, they repose their faith in him ('Khan Saheb', August 20).

Tired of Benazir Bhutto and her bete noir Nawaz Sharif's theatrics, the people are desperately seeking a change. And debonair Khan seems the best choice at the moment.

With his assiduously crafted image of a gentleman with a mission, Imran should enter the hot waters of politics with extreme caution and, in fact, take a leaf out of Amitabh Bachchan's book who who had to pay for his political ambitions.
Debabrata Mohanty, Balasore

■ The subcontinent is tired of the same old political rhetoric. People like Imran Khan and Amitabh Bachchan bring a fresh new air of hope (not that they always succeed in their missions).

But they enjoy greater trust and confidence of the people than all the politicians put together.

How about cricketers like Little Master Sunil Gavaskar coming forward?
Rajib Chatterjee, Asansol

Imran Khan: Populist politics?

■ The master of the crease is indeed a brilliant achiever! Look at the transformation of his image: from an English spouting Brown Saheb to a patriotic Islamic hero.

Many thought his marriage with the blonde heiress, Jemima, would cause his popularity to wane at home and dilute his chances of donning the Prime Minister's mantle.

But the cricketer proved everyone wrong and is now a serious contender for the hot seat in Islamabad.
Khandakar Mohidul Haque, Calcutta

■ Calculating and shrewd as he is, Imran has spruced up his image with a definite purpose: to get closer to the masses.

As a cricketer he had everything; money, fame, glamour and a bevy of belles. The thing he needed was a political platform to gain power.

And what better way to woo the masses than to build a cancer hospital and pioneer an education movement?
Dipankar Kolay, Jhikra (Howrah)

■ Imran will make a perfect leader of the masses. He is a crusader. He is a man of principles and determination. The result is the well-equipped cancer hospital.
Reyaz Ahmad, Gaya (Bihar)

■ In a world where selfishness is seen as an abiding quality, it is wonderful to have men like Imran Khan who go out of their way to build a hospital.
Anup Kumar Garai, Calcutta

■ Some time back Imran Khan announced he would not dabble in politics. And now he becomes the Wazir-e-Azam in waiting, holding durbars and making sifarish and crying, "Be Pakistani, wear Pakistani".

Now, to be a true Pakistani he has to indulge in some India-bashing like his predecessors; declare India its foe, create trouble in the Kashmir Valley and instigate agents of disruption.

On the contrary, he could prove to be a very different PM and erase all the bitterness that exists on the two sides of the border.

Superstars as MESSIAHS

BY K. NARESH KUMAR

Extracted from Indian Cinema Ebbs and Tides by K. Naresh Kumar; Har Anand Publishers; Rs 250

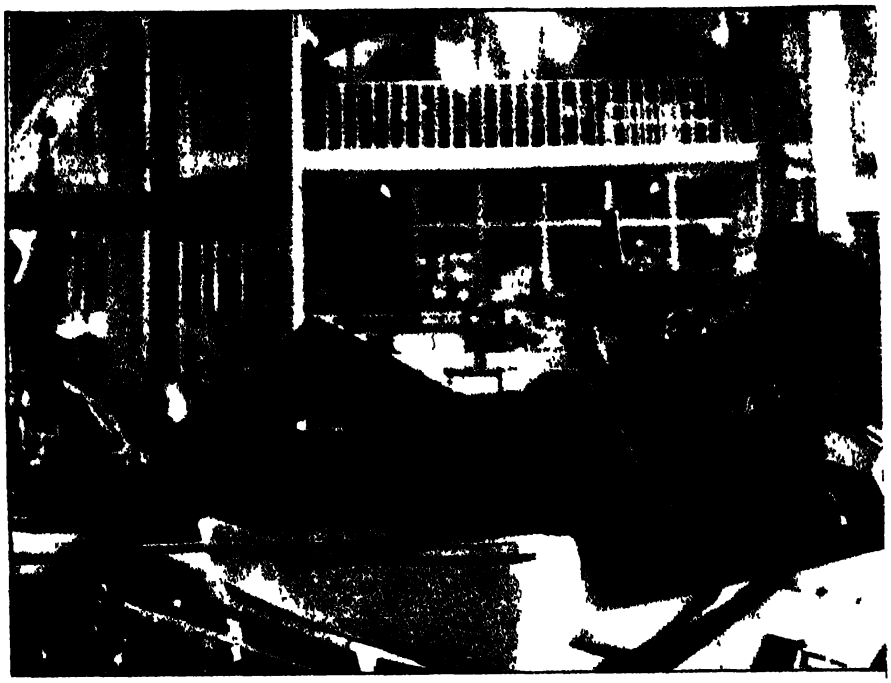
The southern cinema might be the repository of excellence in practically anything that it dishes out Be it cinematography, music, thrills, choreography or even the treatment, its directors mete out to the subjects, they handle in their ventures. But while technological progression of this industry has wowed the nation, from the viewers' point of view, the ills that have plagued the medium over the last few decades are still very much alive Which would mean a very careful, even kid glove treatment to the images of its superstars and consequently producing films which are unabashedly defying and propagandist whenever a big hero like Rajnikant or Chiranjeevi in contemporary times stars in them

Stratified, stereotyped movies have been the bane of mainstream southern cinema in all its languages, barring Malayalam moviedom to an extent The main reason none wants to upset the fans of any of these megastars who are otherwise professional, no-nonsense types

It is revealing indeed to comprehend what this has done to big-budget extravaganzas in southern cinema. There are no more multi-starrers starring the recent crop of top actors, the image of theirs as a do-gooder, eternally winning and wooing type is kept intact other than minor tinkering, and above all the ambience of the film itself is one that of a loud, shrill, message-laden one Care is of course taken to show that their demi-gods are infallible and this means the traditional, feudal, chauvinistic mind set reinforcing macho aggression and virility is retained in its pristine form.

And anyone who attempts to make cosmetic changes either ends up with a dud on his shoulder or ensures scathing reviews in the local press that his film which downgrades the aggression of his "action hero" is as good as a

NTR with Meenakshi Seshadri: Godly hero



Films Division documentary

And under the established "guidelines" anything goes Even if in current times, with feminine identities all around asserting themselves, Tamil superstar Rajnikant is tolerated if he endorses bigamy under a flimsy pretext of a lost-and-found screenplay in his thunderous success Veera routinely, Chiranjeevi disrobes and denudes his heroines and fellow female dancers in his Telugu blockbusters and if he does not "manhandle", then the dance director ensures a "rain song" dream sequence Kamalahasan play upto the lover boy image quite practically even if that means appearing naked above the torso and having his heroine zip up his trouser at a departmental store All this when he is not shown peddling lavatory humour, a sickening stereotype which has continued right up to his latest release Nammavar, loosely based on the Hollywood film Class of '84

The very fact that such mind-numbing insensibilities have continued as part and parcel of an average superstar movie means the fans want it And there are millions all over the south for each one of the above star Taken in unison, they are practically

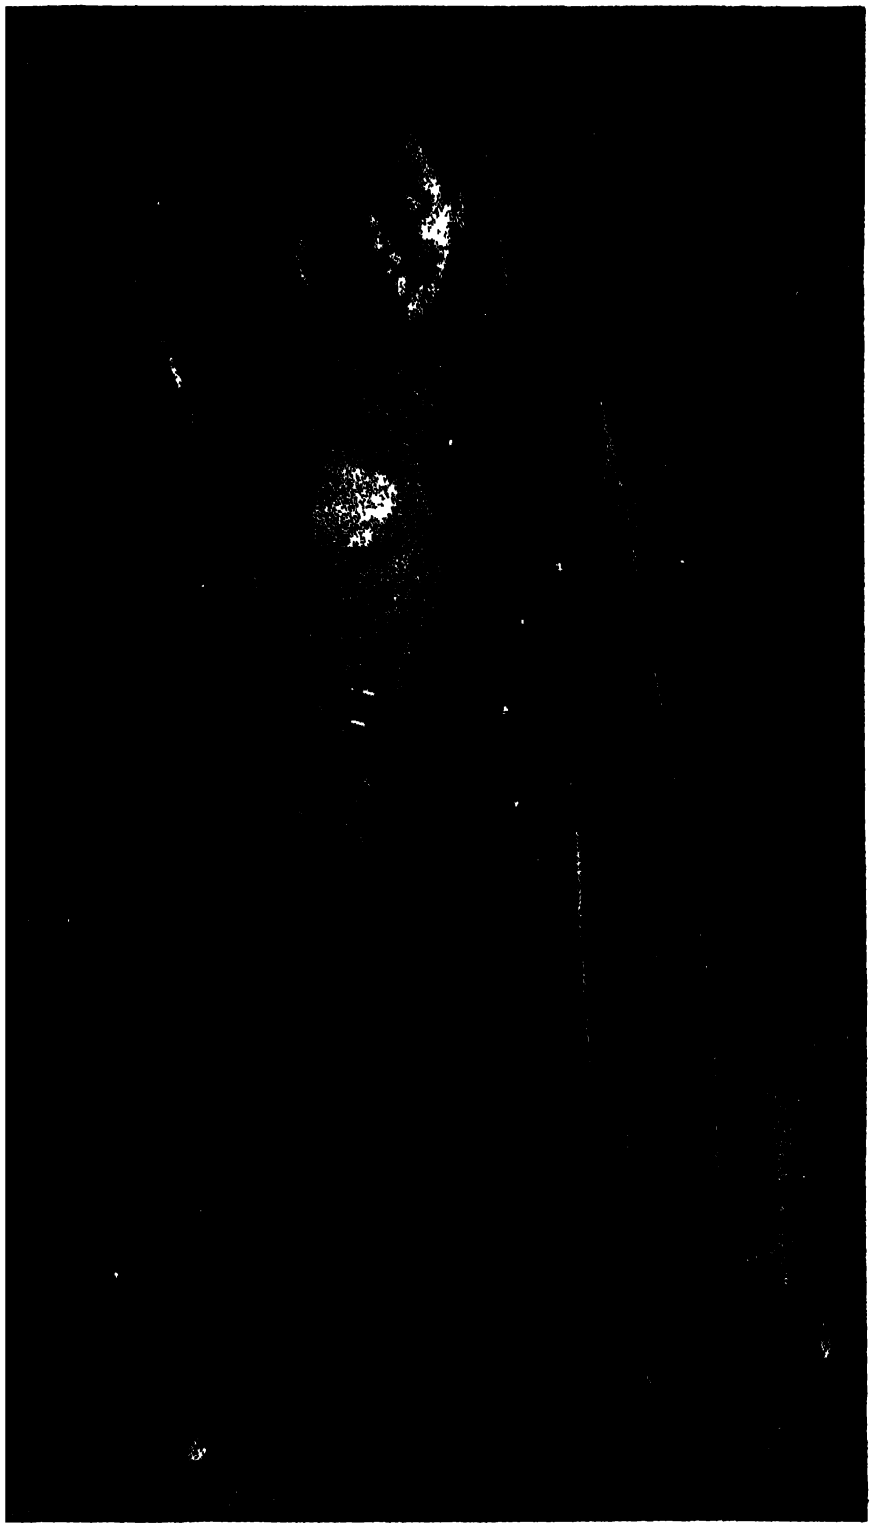
everything for their annan/anna as the case may be They can be a captive base for furthering one's political ambitions, a springboard for a commercial leverage and consequent control over the fortunes of a film and above all as the thespians like Sivaji Ganesan and MGR were never tired of saying, they can even be called "blood brothers" or "children", however erratic and undisciplined they were

And this indiscipline is the basic fact behind a dynamic director's shying away from running through this vice-like hold and breaking the cast-iron image barrier Above all, nobody dares to have eggs on his face But there are those "die-hard" optimists, surreptitiously encouraged by the heroes themselves, to attempt things differently, without a care for the box office response K Vishwanath and Singeetam Srinivasa Rao in Telugu, K Balachander in Tamil are some who dared to take on the public and their track record, as can be expected, has been terrible, from the commercial angle



Initially, to begin at the beginning, the stars wanted such adulation, and that too an assured, almost Pavlovian, response to their on-screen antics M G Ramachandran, the guru of the fan club movement in recent times, had such a committed backing that his fanclub number touched an astounding 3000 and the card-holding types easily touched 20-30 lakh youngsters Uniformly hailing from lower middle class milieu, these impressionable, semi-literate Tamilians took up the decoration of the theatres wherever his films were released, regulated crowds, provided refreshments to the womenfolk who flocked to see their thalaivar and above all, if need be, made the whole activities self-generating by donating blood to keep the show going And once inside the theatres, they were responsible for the hysterical wolf-whistles and cacophony, a must on the opening day of any new film starring their idol

The other luminary of those times, Sivaji Ganesan, too, had the same set-up Only that they were considered more aware and literate and were thus lesser in number to MGR fans But while the former managed to channelise their frenzy into a long political career and a successful one at that, Ganesan fans were more his supporters for his phenomenal histrionics and noth-

ng much more than this The acklustre political presence of Ganesan and how fans could do not much other than being the errand boys of the local Congress unit at one point of time is a painful fact which cannot be ignored by the veteran actor himself

Nearly three decades after all this got institutionalised in southern cinema the things remain very much the same Only that the old order representing MGR and Sivaji Ganesan in Tamil, N T Rama Rao and A Nageswara Rao in Telugu and Dr Rajkumar in Kannada have been replaced by Rajnikant, Kamalahasan and the latest crop of actors in Tamil, other than Chiranjeevi, Nagarjuna, and Venkatesh and Balakrishna in Telugu apart from a few more up and coming ones like Dr Rajasekhar The same frenzy, bigotry and intolerance continue albeit slightly diluted and the adamant, uni-track mentality to see nothing wrong in their screen idol is a continuing passion

Kamalahasan Peddling lavatory humour

MGR with Jayalalitha Guru of the fan club movement

When MGR and Sivaji Ganesan costarred in Goondukkili in the Fifties, their only co-starring film then, violence broke out in the theatres between the fans of these respective actors And this was the reason why after a few films, their successors in Madras moviedom, Kamalahasan and Rajnikant, mutually agreed to stop acting in multi-starrers Even if a reputed star acts with anyone of the above two in recent films, the fans want him to accept a secondary, marginalised presence alone So much so in the Mani Ratnam film Dalapathy (now dubbed in Hindi) the Malayalam megastar, Mammootty, was given the smaller, action-laden role and ultimately killed as he threatened to encroach on the superstar status of the other actor, Rajnikant Which would have meant a straight rejection by his adoring crowd all over Tamil Nadu

From the psychological point of view, this is called a "symbiotic syndrome" wherein the average cine-crazy youngster looks upto these screen superstars as a Messiah and a panacea for all the social problems he faces While doing a story on the self-immolation syndrome in Tamil Nadu, a few years ago, this writer had the opportunity of browsing through exhaustive studies made by a practising psychologist of Anna University, Madras, who traced out its fallout to the construction of temples for consecrating the screen idol and retaining them as gods forever to the craving for a simple darshan in flesh and blood of the favourite star who has played such wonderful roles on the silver screen

As far as the worshipped were concerned, it gave them a multi-fold dimension of being elevated to such high pedestals to satiating their penchant for being larger than life, a common feature of southern cinema and political life The political success was an added attraction whenever they ventured into public life and to quote a recent example, Rama Rao and his "godly" roles which he played made him such a popular hero that whenever his fans from Andhra Pradesh visited Tirupati, the story goes that they used to visit his house in Madras to seek a "balcony darshan" of his replete with makeup a la Lord Krishna

The other popular stories of the Sixties vintage are those of how the fans of MGR donated blood to save his life when he was shot at by a fellow artiste, M R Radha, and how some self-immolated on hearing about this incident This adulation, an extreme emotion of the sentiment-excessive southerner, has meant in recent times ticking of posters beseeching the current demi-god Rajnikant to enter politics and vanquish the existing political personalities, a development which has been "officially" lost on the superstar himself who does not want any such diversifications

But in the mainstream cinema too, the scars of such soffocating, syrupy affection have refused to heal As

Mammootty. A megastar

Murali, a Tamil film hero and a fairly popular one at that told a film magazine in Madras recently "The only way to cut down production costs and come out with different kinds of films is to introduce the multi-star concept back into our movies This way there can be everything for everybody" While the concept as such is laudable, whether the frenzied fans will make it happen is of course a million-dollar question After all, there can be nobody better than their own icon

A classic case of "old wine in new bottle", it may be But this is precisely what their popularity has come to mean to The fan club after all is a vicious stranglehold and a permanent incarceration for any successful star in southern cinema ■

PARA TROOPERS

Is Calcutta's para culture coming back in the real sense?
Soumya Bhattacharya reports that the benighted city has been showing some definite signs of self reliance and a collective civic sense

Illustrations: Subrata Chowdhury

MAYBE WE ARE NOT YET LIVING ON THE MEAN STREETS OF BROOKLYN OR DOWNTOWN 'LOS Angeles where gun toting thugs call the shots.

But the image of Calcutta as the 'cleanest' metropolis in the country is fast eroding, as the common man feels more and more insecure to be out on the streets

A fragile police and administrative system tries in vain to grapple with the rising crime rate; women feel threatened to walk on the streets in the evening with the sniggers and catcalls of small-time Romeos making life a daily torment

And beyond the apparent reality of the life of the beleaguered common man lies a tangled web of muscle power and politics that looks down on the proceedings like an omnipotent Big Brother — hawk-eyed and deadly.

The citizens of Calcutta are hard put to sustain their faith in the law enforcers any longer With custody deaths becoming a staple diet along with the breakfast cereal and the morning cup of tea, vigilante squads are coming up in every other neighbourhood to combat the threats of theft, burglary and other crimes that have grown to be as common as the Pujas organised by local clubs

Shaken out of their sense of complacent security, jolted out of the sense that "such things could never happen to us," Calcuttans are steadily realising that unless they take charge of their own lives, no one else will

"We have lost all faith in the police," says 82-year-old Prasad Bose ruefully. Bose, himself a former chief of the state police, has been on both sides of the fence. Now, the balding, wizened, but ramrod straight and fighting fit man, is the president of his local Progressive Youth Forum in Lake Town.

Everyday, Bose remembers, he used to see the police was a silent spectator to the crimes that grew like shrubbery in the locality. Theft and burglary were becoming all too common. Snatchings, and even razor slashing of women's backs by motorcycle/bicycle ruffians, were carried out with utter disdain every dusk.

And the role of the local police, he recollects, used to be "virtually nil"

"It was in the mid-Eighties that we finally decided to form the vigilante squad that would take care of the security of the area." Every night, six paid security guards from a private security organisation used to patrol the locality in batches of two

Facing page: An artist's impression of 'Greenman of Bhowanipore', Rabin Pal

The timing in summer used to be 10 pm to 4 am and in the long winter nights, between 10 pm and 5 am

"The residents of the neighbourhood used to go out separately in batches to supervise the work of the security guards We used to make sure that they were working properly and were not caught napping"

As an inevitable fallout of the tightened security, the crime rate in the area went down perceptibly

In the mean slums of Belgachia, where fear stalks the labyrinthine, unpaved lanes, another vigilante squad was formed by the locals in March 1985 Moinuddin Qasim, the maulana of the local mosque, is the president of the local Aman or Shanti Committee that is responsible for the security of the impoverished citizens of the locality

Sitting on a mattress of a cramped room of the mosque, Maulana Moinuddin says "The locality had become hard to live in There were too many hooligans throwing bombs every day" This, though, was not the only menace before the people

Rackets trading in illicitly distilled liquor, satta, drugs and fisthights made life one long muse / for the people of the slum Antisocials, who infiltrated from outside, brandishing swords and revolvers, took over the locality And the people could scarcely fight back

The Aman Committee was formed to put an end to that terror With a strength of 700, the members of the committee started going out on the streets every night armed with lathis, whistles and torches The slum was divided into five units, with 10 members in four of the units and 15 in the fifth unit which comprised the largest area

The decision paid rich dividends Manawar Ali, one of the members of the committee, says that the guards not just brought back peace and order in the neighbourhood, but made their presence felt by handing over drug pedlars and antisocials to the police

Although they are loathe to speak about it in so many words, the Aman Committee did not let those they caught go scot-free "Yes, we did beat up a few people when we caught them threatening people in our locality" a security guard admits rather bashfully

Although the Aman Committee, which boasts of being a democratic organisation and holds free and fair elections every three years, says that members cut across party lines, residents of the dingy slums observe otherwise

Residents say that it is the members of the committee, backed by the CPI(M), who have let loose a parallel reign of terror "Their word is law You do not question them about anything You just do what they say," said an old lady, who owns a small shop in the slum

In almost every quasi vigilante squad that has mushroomed in Calcutta and its fringes, it is this power game played by politically backed, influential persons that has usurped most of the authority of the area And it is these people that wield the clout in the neighbourhood

Vigilante squads had come up in Salt Lake, too, but they were dissolved after the residents were assured that community policing would see to their security But even today, despite the patrol cars that cream across at night with their revolving lights and wailing sirens, vast stretches remain unpatrolled

Worse still, many residents remain unaware not only of their efficacy, but even of their presence

Says P Choudhury, a resident of Block BD of Salt Lake "I have heard the police jeeps more than seen them, but I am not sure they are worth

'They now not only know their own rights, they are quite aware of ours, too!'

Says R.S. Rawat, former deputy commissioner (headquarters), Calcutta Police

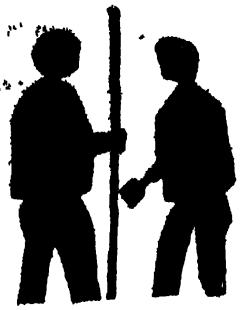
They are the ones blamed for the collapsing law and order problem They are the ones who have failed to provide enough security Yet, the city's law enforcers are squarely shifting from their own shoulders the responsiblity of growing insecurity among Calcuttans.

R.S. Rawat, deputy commissioner, headquarters (since then posted as DIG, Jalpaiguri), 'admitted that the number of so-called vigilante squads is rising in the city. "But that is nothing unusual, nor new. It happens all over India. In fact, it is very popular in Delhi."

Rawat, however, admitted that "adequate covering by police of all areas in the city is just not possible". Resistance groups in villages, he said, worked together to provide security for beleaguered villagers

"In such cases, we give them torches and lathis," Rawat said Making it clear that he had nothing against such self-styled resistance groups or vigilante squads, Rawat observed that it was not feasible providing them with torches and other accessories on their nightly rounds in the city

"It is different in the city where you have street lights," he explained.



Rawat felt that one of the reasons giving rise to such groups was that "people trusted themselves to guard their own localities" Agreeing that political muscle-flexing and using such movements as a breeding ground for local hoodlums was possible, Rawat said that it "was inevitable that this should be so"

"There is always a tendency for locals in any area to group along party lines. If you have been born and brought up in a certain area, you tend to know the people of the locality and their political affiliations. The first thing that you do when there is a theft or any other trouble is to run to the local political leader and seek his help.

"This obviously leads to politicisation of the groups in a number of cases," Rawat said.

Cases of lynching in the city and the state, Rawat was forced to confess, was very much on the rise. Rawat said that the strictures of the

The club culture in the upmarket neighbourhoods, has also consequently altered in its shades and nuances. Apart from fighting against crimes and drugs, the clubs are now much more politically correct and environment conscious. Clubs in these areas uphold social causes. They make sure that residents do not lack in civic amenities anything "

Much further south, in the Left bastion of Jadavpur, local clubs had sprung up even before the appearance of police stations in the late Sixties and the early Seventies Jadavpur, then, was a refugee colony, with scarcely any resources, let alone security The clubs gradually usurped the role of law enforcers and 'do-gooders' of the entire area

Even today, with a proper police and administration, the clubs remain the sole controlling authority in the locality

"They interfere in everything, so much so that our independence is often jeopardised," regrets S Dasgupta, a housewife "They have the last word in disputes between landlords and tenants as well as a feud between husband and wife And whatever they say, goes "

The all-pervasive powers of the local club members often take a nasty turn when they decide to take the law in their own hands A recent case was reported when locals, in their zeal to play good samaritans, bludgeoned to death a woman found guilty of stealing clothes.

Interestingly enough, it is in the lower middleclass and poorer areas that the local clubs wield this enormous clout In the relatively upmarket neighbourhoods of the city, the residents are relatively free from the menace of having their lives run by party cadres.

Indeed, in areas like Lake Gardens and Jodhpur Park, where the apartments of the affluent lie cheek by jowl with the dingy slums of the rail colonies, it is the people from the slums who rule the roast "They often terrorise people of our neighbourhood They are the ones who hold sway here," a Lake Gardens resident observes

What contributes to this phenomenon in upper middleclass neighbourhoods is the studied indifference of residents People in these localities keep much more to themselves and do not seek help from neighbours in times of trouble There, the highhandedness of the so-called local toughs takes a different form

Members of the Sevak Baidya Milan Samity, a Congress (I) controlled local club on Motilal Nehru Road in south Calcutta, for instance, say that they do "wholehearted social welfare" "We give clothes and food to the needy, books to school children and see to it that the entire area is kept free from garbage," notes Kartick Singh, a member, with a touch of pride

Yet, those living in the area, beg to differ about the exploits of the members "They are just a bunch of hooligans who extort money on the slightest pretext and have fun at our expense," observes a local resident

Actually, the entire club and para culture that was so distinctive of Calcutta, has fast eroded with people becoming more and more self-centred In fact, many of the much touted security programmes of some of the local organisations were squashed when residents refused to fork out the cash necessary to keep such movements alive

Lake Town, New Alipore, Jodhpur Park and Lake Gardens are merely some of the places where the moribund movements could not be resuscitated for lack of funds "Some people

Human Rights Commission had made people acutely conscious of their rights. "They now not only know their own rights, they are quite aware of ours, too!" he said.

"Lynching is a serious, punishable offence and we try and make the law take its own course when it is necessary." But the main cause of lynching, he felt, was mob fury that even objected when we used to flash torches and enquire if everything was all right They said they felt bothered," remembers a member of the Lake Gardens People's Association, whose vigilante programme died an early death a few years ago

Calcutta has changed a good deal over the years So, inevitably, has the flavour of any neighbourhood Gone now are the cemented porches in front of houses The congregations of old men in north Calcutta and Bhowanipore, discussing lives of neighbours that were not quite hidden behind frayed and flapping curtains, are no longer to be seen Life itself, it seems, has turned inward on itself, picked up pace and left behind the days of idle chatter, evening teas and card and chess games

The club culture in the upmarket neighbourhoods, has also consequently altered in its shades and nuances Apart from fighting against crimes and drugs, the clubs are now much more politically correct and environment conscious

Clubs in these areas uphold social causes They make sure that residents do not lack in civic amenities The Concern for Calcutta (south division) in New Alipore, epitomises many of the aspects of this new club culture Members of this organisation are increasingly aware of the need to keep their locality clean This includes not just keeping in touch and badgering the civic employees, but also raising the civic sense and the levels of awareness of the residents of the locality, some of them immune to good sense Now, the locality has a regularised garbage collection system, for instance

Says Somenath Mukherjee, a member of the organisation "We are in constant touch with the proper authorities We try to ensure that the street lights are always working" Adds J K Majumdar, another member "If anything goes wrong, like the poor condition of roads and lighting or the mushrooming of tea stalls near residences, we immediately inform the local councillor or authority concerned"

With water scarcity hitting the area from time to time, members of the club also try to keep in touch with the local borough committee and the chief engineer to get things done Another major drive launched by the residents of the area has been against eve-teasing and the drugs menace, though they admit much more needs to be done

"With a number of girls' schools and co-educational schools in the locality, many of the young women used to feel threatened while returning home after classes got over," says Mukherjee The residents of the organisation got in touch with the police

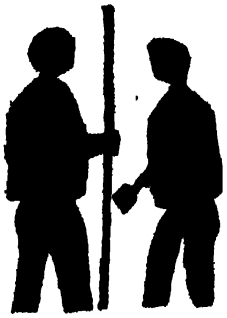
MOB MENTALITY

While Calcuttans are trying, in their own way, to impart a semblance of law and order and security to their localities, lynching, the ugly side of the same coin, is becoming more and more of an everyday event in the city and its suburbs.

Brutal, gory tales of groups of people taking the law in their own hands, of violent mobs going completely berserk, is becoming so commonplace that even the media is giving it less importance in terms of column inches.

Scenes on Calcutta streets do not yet resemble a shot from Jon Singleton's Boyz 'n the Hood. But as the stories of people, presumed guilty or innocent, mercilessly hacked, burnt, stoned or beaten to death get more and more common, the incidents get relegated to snippets on the inside page, tucked away between advertisements, often overlooked by the average reader

But like most good, which often contain in them germs of the worst evil, lynching has become the essentially helpful self-policing system carried to brutal extremes. With a number of the so-called vigilante squads in various localities oriented along party lines, members cash in on opportunities to take revenge for past incidents.



According to a recent survey, there have been as many as 28 lynchings in the state in only 45 days between March 15 and April 30.

and made arrangements for constant police patrols towards the afternoon and evening "The menace was curbed to a large extent," he remarks

The Cricket Association of New Alipore was also formed by the locality youngsters inspired by Pulak Das and inaugurated by Prasanta Sur, MLA (Tollugunj constituency) They roped in former Test player and Ranji Trophy record holder Ashok Malhotra as chief coach and the brilliant Bengal player, Srikant Kalyani, as assistant coach Within three months, they had an impressive team of 175 kids including "10-year-old aspiring Test cricketers" as Malhotra put it

They have set out two concrete pitches in the Children's Park, will get corporate houses to sponsor the venture further and have already got the state sports minister Subhas Chakraborty to commit "equipment and enthusiasm" to the association which promises to produce at least 10 more Ashok Malhotras and Srikant Kalyanis

It is not just the clubs which have changed colour over the years, putting a concern for Calcutta at the top of their agenda. There are even people, who at the expense of their own time and money, have gone out of their way to make the city a better place to live in

It is not just the clubs which have changed colour over the years, putting a concern for Calcutta at the top of their agenda There are even people, who at the expense of their own time and money, have gone out of their way to make the city a better place to live in Rabin Pal, the altruistic 'Greenman of Bhowanipore', is one such person

Over the last 12 years, having spent Rs 20,000 Pal has seen to the greening of the half-km stretch between Townshend Road and S P Mukherjee Road in Bhowanipore by planting 27 different kinds of trees A clerk in a small-time paint factory, this has become Pal's passion A bachelor, Pal has poured most of his meagre income into this scheme

Every morning, from 5, he spends more than three hours looking after his own garden on a public thoroughfare He buys the seeds, makes the bamboo cages to hold the saplings, erects boards with names of trees painted on them and sprays insecticides

It is not as if he did not counter any opposition while going about his job Often regarded as a freak, Pal had once objected to a youth steamrolling over newly sprouted shrubs and been severely beaten up in the bargain! Today, though, he has been accepted as a quirky but passionate individual who cares more for his city than most people

Calcutta has changed a lot over the years And if the club culture of the bygone days is no longer there, it has been replaced with something more in tune with the times The club culture of today cares for Calcutta in its own way Having thrown off the yoke of yesteryear, it is undoubtedly a positive change

And in a city like ours, where even a little change can change a lot, it is an alteration for the better ■

And the numbers have steadily increased.

Apart from the city proper, Dankuni, Akra, Sodepur and Mathurapur, are just some of the names that flash across the lynching map of the state.

A 12-year-old boy was beaten to death in May in Sodepur In an almost unprecedented incident of a lynching for a lynching, a 30-year-old man, suspected to be part of the mob that attacked the boy, was lynched the very next day

Yet, however much one may try to implicate the police, it is undeniable that lynching is more an expression of pent-up fury of an unruly mob than anything else. The fury might be there because of the role of the police in the past (thereby indirectly making them responsible), but once a mob is on the rampage, there is precious little that the police can do.

They are, perhaps, most crippled by a communication gap, by the lack of right information reaching them at the right time. A senior police official remarked that people seldom want to inform the police and subsequently invite danger to themselves.

What cannot be denied, though, is that apart from political equations and identities, a complete lack of faith in the police and the administration among the people has contributed to the increase of such atrocities and human rights violations.

Looked at this way, neither the police nor the administration can evade responsibility for the lynchings that are becoming almost a way of life in the city and its

'GIN' IN THE GULF

Bikram Vohra on the great Indian arsenal*

I live in the Gulf with 1,467,000 other Indians and we work with people of all nationalities including the British The imbalance in salaries between them and us are evened out by the use of our secret arsenal

The same one that lost them the jewel in the crown

The Great Indian Nod or the GIN, as in Djinn or genii Same impact

Perfected and refined over centuries, the Indian nod has subalterns and burra sahibs in paroxysms of agony as they try to figure out whether we mean yes or we mean no

What is crystal clear to us in each swing of the head is a complete mystery to the Brits and, to this day, is the single largest reason why they seek succour in gin and tonics It is also the generic root of the English habit of saying, "I say because they haven't a clue what we are saying when we nod"

"So, Ramaswamy, do you think this is a good idea?"

Swing head left to right in slight elliptical mode

"Is that a yes?"

Head bobs more vigorously and then shifts into a compass orbit for extra emphasis

"Is that a no?"

Head shakes like enthusiastic terrier after a bath and then does a few figure eights

By then Cuthbert Dickenson is crying into his files and looking for a dash of Gilbeys so he can dive into it

Over here, in the Gulf, we do have more exquisite situations where Indians have Brits on their staff

So, the boss calls them in, sits them down and then goes into his nod routine, a nod here, a nod there, some more nods and a general closing the meeting nod which has Her Majesty's citizens in a bit of a quandary

Off they go for lunch and John says, "That was a yes, wasn't it?"

"No," says Nick, "it was a maybe "

"Rubbish," says Robert, "it was a definite no, if he was saying yes, he would have gone right to left, he went left to right

"True," says John, "but if you remember last week, he nodded in slow motion east to west and we all thought it was a yes, but what he really meant was, he didn't think the idea would fly

Now, while all this is going on between the Brits and us in the offices, the nod turns into a missile when handed to all the support staff, thousands of whom also reside in the Gulf Houseboys, teaboys, messengers, drivers, onsite labourers all nod away the sanity of their bosses with maddening regularity

"Will you pick up madam from the school?"

"Nodnodnod "

"Did you pick up madam from the school?"

"Nodandnodandnod and shake of head "

"Don't worry, I'll pick her up myself "

Most mystifying to the Westerners is how we understand the inflection in each nod

"Teach me," he says, "please, pretty please "

"No way," I say, "that's how we keep you blighters in place, it is our secret weapon "

"Feel like a game of squash," he says, already defeated

I nod A little shake of the head, a dip and a whirl of the neck

He sighs

"Is that a yes," he says, "or can't you make it?" ■

CHACHI'S MURDER

Chachi died at 6 pm on Wednesday the 5th of April, and came to life again exactly 20 minutes later This is how it happened

Chachi was, as a rule, a fairly tolerant, easy-going person, who waddled about the house without paying much attention to the swarms of small sons, daughters, nephews and nieces who poured in and out of the rooms But she had taken a particular aversion to her 10-year-old nephew, Sunil

She was a simple woman and could not understand Sunil He was a little brighter than her own sons, more sensitive, and inclined to resent a scolding or a cuff across the head He was better looking than her own children All this, in addition to the fact that she resented having to cook for the boy while both his parents went out at office jobs, led her to grumble at him a little more than was really necessary

Sunil sensed his aunt's jealousy and fanned its flames He was a mischievous boy, and did little things to annoy her, like bursting paper bags behind her while she dozed, or commenting on the width of her pyjamas when they were hung out to dry On the evening of the 5th of April, he had been in particularly high spirits and feeling hungry, entered the kitchen with the intention of helping himself to some honey But the honey was on the top shelf, and Sunil was not quite tall enough to grasp the bottle He got his fingers to it but as he tilted it towards him, it fell to the ground with a crash

Chachi reached the scene of the accident before Sunil could slip away Removing her slipper, she dealt him three or four furious blows across the head and shoulders This done, she sat down on the floor and burst into tears

Had the beating come from someone else, Sunil might have cried, but his pride was hurt, and instead of weeping he muttered something under his breath and stormed out of the room

Climbing the steps to the roof, he went to his secret hiding place, a small hole in the wall of the unused barsati, where he kept his marbles, kite-string, tops, and a clasp-knife Opening the knife, he plunged it thrice into the soft wood of the window frame

"I'll kill her!" he whispered fiercely, "I'll kill her, I'll kill her!"

"Who are you going to kill, Sunil?"

It was his cousin Madhu, a dark slim girl of 12, who aided and abetted him in most of his exploits Sunil's Chachi was her Mami It was a very big family

Chachi," said Sunil "She hates me, I know Well, I hate her too This time I'll kill her"

"How are you going to do it?"

"I'll stab with this," he showed her the knife

"Three times, in the heart"

"But you'll be caught The CID are very clear Do you want to go to jail?"

"Won't they hang me?"

"They don't hang small boys They

Madhu produced pencil and paper, went down on her hands and knees, and screwing up her face in sharp concentration, made a rough drawing of Chachi. Then, with a red crayon, she sketched in a big heart in the region of Chachi's stomach. 'Now,' she said, 'stab her to death!'

send them to boarding schools."

"I don't want to go to a boarding school"

"Then better not kill your Chachi At least not this way I'll show you how"

Madhu produced pencil and paper, went down on her hands and knees, and screwing up her face in sharp concentration, made a rough drawing of Chachi Then, with a red crayon, she sketched in a big heart in the region of Chahchi's stomach

"Now," she said, "stab her to death!"

Sunil's eyes shone with excitement Here was a great new game You could always depend on Madhu for something original He held the drawing against the woodwork, and plunged his knife three times into Chahchi's pastel breast

"You have killed her," said Madhu

"Is that all?"

"Well, if you like, we can cremate her"

"All right"

She took the torn paper, crumpled it up, produced a box of matches from Sunil's hiding place, lit a match, and set fire to the paper In a few minutes all that remained of Chachi were a few ashes

"Poor Chachi," said Madhu

"Perhaps, we shouldn't have done it," said Sunil beginning to feel sorry

"I know, we'll put her ashes in the river!"

"What river?"

"Oh, the drain will do"

Madhu gathered the ashes together, and leant over the balcony of the roof She threw out her arms, and the ashes drifted downwards Some of them settled on the pomegranate tree, a few reached the drain and were carried away by a sudden rush of kitchen water She turned to face Sunil

Big tears were rolling down Sunil's cheeks

"What are you crying for?" asked Madhu

Chachi I didn't hate her so much"

"Then why did you want to kill her?"

"Oh, that was different"

"Come on, then, let's go down I have to do my homework"

As they came down the steps from the roof, Chachi emerged from the kitchen

"Oh Chachi!" shouted Sunil He rushed to her and tried to get his arms around her ample waist

"Now what's up?" grumbled Chachi "What is it this time?"

"Nothing Chachi I love you so much. Please don't leave us"

A look of suspicion crossed Chachi's face. She frowned down the boy But she was reassured by the look of genuine affection that she saw in his eyes

"Perhaps he does care for me, after all," she thought, and patting him gently on the head, she took him by the hand and led him back to the kitchen

DELUGE BACK HOME

I left India 45° in the shade, parched and shrivelled, and have now returned.

Sensing my return, my dog resolved to avenge two and a half months of neglect by developing a particularly virulent type of eczema

A creeping paralysis had crept over other parts of the household The phone was dead, the gas cylinder was leaking, the vi'eo was jammed, the satellite connection non-existent, the front door wouldn't open, the booster pump had given up, and well, you get the idea

But the bright spot was that the monsoon, which I had been loathe to leave along with the height of the mango season, had come late It was still waiting for me Without incurring any expense, I found our house beautified by miniature waterfalls, springing from upstairs drainpipes into buckets and watering cans tastefully arranged around the house The whole building was surrounded by a moat after every downpour, which never grew deep enough to flood us

The canvas roof of my old jeep had split, leaving it even more delightfully air-conditioned than before, only a patch of canvas over the driver's seat intact

What a marvellous monsoon vehicle it is! Five minutes after setting off, it manages miraculously to draw water from the heavens which buckets down the wiper-less windscreen and through the ignition until I wonder why Kevin Costner and Co didn't make Waterworld in India

On the wettest day, when my gallant steed stalled and wouldn't start again, I sat under the tattered canvas watching the rain falling like stair-rods and splashing into the lake which had been a bus stop It struck me then that The Webbs must be revived

The Webbs was to be the world's first underwater soap opera The plot was simple — earth man falls in love with water girl — a sort of mermaid, the kind of tale that has fascinated people for centuries Their love faces many problems, not least from the fact that the boy cannot stay underwater for more than 20 seconds without going up for air

The underwater world was originally envisaged as a kind Fifties' America — the kind of place Doris Day would be at home in — and a tank had been identified for the filming

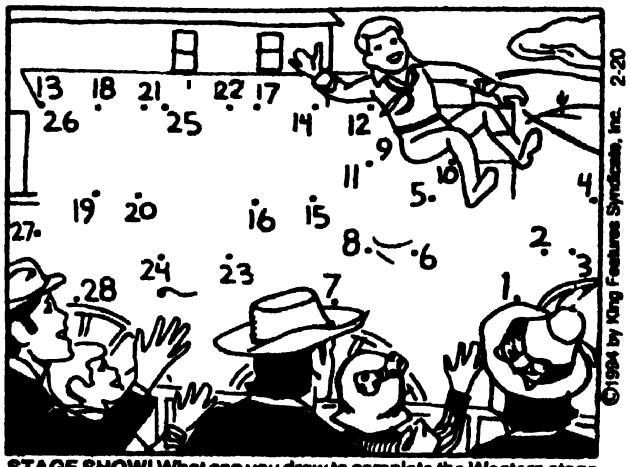
The director had come to the conclusion that no 'take' could be longer than 15 seconds and that the dialogue would have to be dubbed The most crucial thing would be that the bubbles coming out of the actors' mouths would be in sync with the dialogue

Alas, David Benedictus, who had commissioned the series, left Britain's Channel 4 before he could see it through, and this great idea still remains to be made flesh Perhaps, this is a challenge for Doordarshan

What a marvellous monsoon vehicle it is! Five minutes after setting off, it manages miraculously to draw water from the heavens which buckets down the wiper-less windscreen and through the ignition until I wonder why Kevin Costner and Co. didn't make Waterworld in India

Eventually, I managed to restart the jeep, and asked a taxi driver who was clad in nothing but a plastic bag hat, underpants and a kirpan, if there was any way I could reach home Not, he said, before the flood receded

I sat back and tried to remember the highway code My driving license had been stolen just before I left and I had no record of the number which was essential to get a replacement A part of homecoming was also, therefore, becoming a learner again



I swotted up the clauses prescribed and during a long and gloomy morning at the RTO, I and a student had tested each other until we were word perfect We had both passed the test But I had left less puzzled as to the reason why Delhi driving was so chaotic

First of course, has to come the inadequacy of public transport — specially the lack of a good rail and tram network Secondly, a learner is tested on various peculiarities of left-hand drive vehicles but is not tested, and therefore, never has to learn, less arcane knowledge like, for example, what to do at a roundabout or a pedestrian crossing

The rain ceased and the sky lost its deep elephant-grey clouds When the road, though littered with dead vehicles, was passable, I bade farewell to the taximen and in first gear at no more than ten knots an hour, proceeded, grateful for the rain, and for its ceasing, and remembering these lines of Robert Louise Stevenson

If I have faltered more or less
In my great task of happiness,
If I have moved among my race
And shown no glorious morning face,
If beams from happy human eyes
Have moved me not, if morning skies,
Books, and my food, and summer rain
Knocked on my sullen heart in vain
Lord, thy most pointed pleasure take
And stab my spirit broad awake

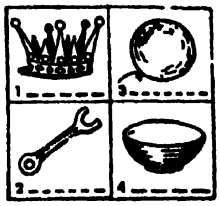
TRICK TAKES SOFT SOAP

THREE toothpicks, a dish of water and some soft soap are required to perform this magic trick carefully place the three toothpicks in the water to form a triangle (see small inset above)

Now, gently stick an index finger straight down into the water at the centre of the triangle Alakazam, not! Nothing happens, the triangle remains intact



Next, coat the same index finger with soap, and again gently insert it into the triangle

Alakazam, zot! This time the toothpick triangle immediately disbands

MODERN MISSION

The Swaminarayan temple in a London suburb is both a religious and architectural marvel Rajlakshmi Bhattacharyya on the vision in white

Inside the temple's haveli

"What Canterbury is to Anglicans and Westminster Cathedral to Roman Catholics, Neasden will become to Britain's 1.3 million Hindus."

So wrote The Guardian on what looked like a vision in white—a Taj Mahal so perfect in proportion and dimension that it seemed to bridge atma and parmatma straightaway.

The temple lies in the grimy suburbs of London—in Neasden. Flanked by industrial sheds that are in a Wembley, the Swaminarayan Hindu Temple is the 'fulfilment of a dream for Pramukh Swami Maharaj, the key inspirer of the edifice.

Officially opened on August 20, a colourful pageant was floated across from Hyde Park through Piccadilly to Trafalgar Square, marking the inaugural celebrations of the Mandir's existence. The temple covers an area of [illegible] and is being described as the biggest temple outside India [illegible] ancient Hindu [illegible] stone by stone [illegible] of the Taj Mahal.

Obviously inspired by the ancient Hindu

The temple at Neasden; (inset) Pramukh Swami Maharaj

...Shiva Parvati, ... Sita-Ram, ... Hanuman, Ghanshyam Maharaj apart from Akshar Purushottam resi de. The ... carving mirrors the mountains, woods and centuries-old rock-cut caves.

On the ground floor of the temple is an interactive exhibition to explain the basic tenets of Hinduism to those unfamiliar with the faith

The mandir, which in future would be a major tourist attraction for the drab Neasden suburbs, is secular, being open to people from all religions and faiths, be they Christians, Buddhists, Hindus or atheists.

Living in an era where agnosticism runs rampant, how ironical that the number of religious structures coming up continue to be in inverse proportion to people's declining faith. Is it because, religious belief has never been a precondition for an architect to produce a convincing work of architecture as Le Corbusier showed at Ronchamp? For too often, they are meant to impress, for reasons that are entirely ornamental

Yet, by creating an aesthetic monument steeped in spirituality, the Hindus of the Swaminarayan temple have given both lyric and mystical expression to God's own abode on earth ■

... Akshardham ... Augus... then, has ... the way for cream-coloured Bulgarian limestone for the outside, Italian Carrara marble and white Ambaji marble for the inside, Burmese teak and English oak for the temple's haveli (courtyard) architecture.

The haveli, adjoining the mandir is replete with halls for prayer, conference, marriages, exhibition and sports, other than the extensive library, health clinic, vegetarian kitchens and parking facilities for 550 cars.

The local pink sandstone, used to carve the Akshardham (or "cultural nucleus") at Gandhinagar in Gujarat in 1992 could not be used in Britain for it was felt the stone would quickly crumble in the damp of the English weather. The architects decided on a hard variety of limestone (about 2,828 tons) from Bulgaria.

The unavailability of craftsmen in Britain coupled with the project's alien nature meant that skilled labour — stone artisans, mainly, had to be chosen from India.

In a massive cross-continental effort, the stones were shipped to Kandla and 15,000 people were set to carve those broad chunks of marble and limestone. Each carved block, given a special computer number, was packed into cases and sent to London where it was unwrapped, polished and assembled like a huge jigsaw puzzle

But of course, had it not been for the volunteers, 100 full-time and over 1,000 part-time dedicating themselves towards the completion of the project with the aid of a few local contractors, the temple would have remained a distant possibility.

People from a wide cross section — bankers, students, pharmacists, doctors, engineers and solicitors worked relentlessly with often as little as three hours of sleep per day.

Funds for the mandir were raised through voluntary donations from the local Indian community and an eco-friendly can recycling scheme. Older children of the Mission's school collected used cans and paper which they sold to support the project.

The Mission's inaugural celebrations at Picadilly Circus

Modern technological forms were evolved in constructing the shrine when the temple's architect, Sompura, along with Triad Architects, Austin Truman Associates and the Mission's own in-house architects modified the structure to suit rigid codes of building regulations extant in Britain.

There are now two lifts for the disabled encased in marble, fire escapes, and fire-resistant wood for the haveli. The temple has an entirely stone-built structure — a cantilevered dome, though the normal stipulation requires the use of steel or lead

Considering the rapid fluctuations in the English weather, an underground heating has been introduced and the entrance covered to ward off the heavy downpour of rain.

Every part of the mandir is symbolic. It faces the north-east which is where

SANDCRAFTED

Manmohan Mahapatra is a sculptor with a difference: his medium is sand

As the sea roars in the distance and the sun bathes the beach with its mellow rays, a silence descends on a corner of the sandy stretch where a vision of priceless beauty emerges from the nimble fingers of a gently-bent figure. Curious holidaymakers peer into the sand, amazed.

An exquisite sand statuette, like the stone figures adorning the facades of the Konark temple, rest against the beach surface; serene and glacial.

Like John Keat's 'Ode on a Grecian Urn' Thou silent form, dost tease us out of thought as doth eternity: Cold Pastoral!...

The lights of fishing boats flicker in the horizon and the gentle evening breeze turns ferocious. The bent figure straightens, dusts his hands and with the crowd melts in the gathering dusk; his creation left at the mercy of a jealous sea.

Manmohan Mahapatra has a strange hobby: sculpting figures out of sand and shingle. A hobby that took him to the Harrison hot springs in Canada where he won the Sculptors' Choice Award at the World Sand Sculpture Championship last year.

As a child who grew up on the beach at Puri, Mahapatra was fascinated watching children build sand castles. The artist in him prodded him to experiment with bigger and more intricate forms in sand. And once he managed to put together a complete figure, it became a passion with him.

The beach became his workshop, the sand his medium, and the people's applause his inspiration.

Coming from a family where art is a tradition (the Mahapatras are the resident artists of the Jagannath temple) Manmohan Mahapatra was always in quest of creating something unique.

Once he perfected his craft after nearly 15 years of profound devotion, Mahapatra decided to impart his artistry, which had already caught the imagination of the local people, to others He opened the Academy of Sand Art Culture in 1987. Soon he had a string of youngsters flocking at his beach academy.

But the artist in him would not let him rest contented with just local recognition. He yearned to spread this new art form beyond the shores of Orissa.

And then Dame Fortune smiled. He got an opportunity to try his luck at the world championship in Canada.

The journey from the Bay of Bengal to the beach at Harrison hot springs was like a dream. "In 1990, I went to attend a sand culture workshop in Bombay where I met a famous sand artist from Switzerland, Benno Kaiser," Mahapatra recalls, his face brightening. "We worked together and when he went back, he recommended my name to the authorities at the Harrison hot springs."

Mahapatra was the only Asian competing with some of the world's finest sand artists for the world title The competition is hosted every year between September and October on a lakeside beach where there is no tide which gives an opportunity to the beach masters to fashion larger and more detailed forms.

Mahapatra's sand crafted Radha-Krishna caught the fancy of all Vancouverites, mystique and oriental, matchless in its beauty and aesthetic allure. Mahapatra returned, happy that his dream had been fulfilled.

Most people are foxed as to why such bewitching masterpieces have to be destroyed. "For me the entire process — the ecstasy of creation and agony of destruction — is a part my research and understanding I am I my craft," sand sculptor.

Mahapatra does not believe his art is impermanent. "It is imprinted in the memory," he says "I love creating something new everyday and I love to see the sea devouring it."

■ The vainglorious attempts to project and analyse Anish Kapoor's complex mind seemed a bit out of bounds with reality ('The Tingle Factor', August 27).

Is Kapoor really that accomplished a painter that his land of birth is not ready to receive his aesthetic message? Or, is he another product of pseudo-modernistic predilection?

Are his creations honestly comprehensible works of art or are they just what they appear to be — heaps of rocks, wood and multi-hued blotches of ink?

It is natural to be curious about modern art trends, but to read into Anish Kapoor's art is a difficult exercise lacking as they are the life force By projecting the dubious merits of artists, we are insulting our sense of judgement
Vishnu Pillai,
Calcutta

■ We are wont to acknowledging the excellence of a person and his creation after he wins recognition abroad

Very few connoisseurs at home were aware of Anish Kapoor till he became a big name in London Pather Panchali, in the Fifties, evoked little interest in Calcutta But the moment it won appreciation overseas, cine buffs flocked to movie halls to see the film

Now that Anish Kapoor has become a high-profile sculptor abroad, art lovers and cash-rich corporate houses will make a bee line for his chiselled forms
Dipankar Kolay,
Jhikra (Howrah)

■ An Indian becomes famous abroad, yet none in his homeland see the works which have made him famous

Most of the sculptors interviewed said they had heard of Kapoor, but not seen his sculptures

Imran Khan: A cricketer and a crusader

Kapoor's association with India has been feeble and having lived in the West and imbibing its culture and ethos, his expressions of art naturally appeal to the West's sense of aesthetics

From the pictures of his sculptures I could find very little Indianness in them although he is said to be drawing heavily from Indian mythology and religion

He is an Indian in name only There is nothing Indian in his art
Somnath Mukherjee,
Calcutta

■ Anish Kapoor is undoubtedly a bigger name than M F Husain although the two are celebs of two different worlds.

No wonder there is a streak of envy in the latter's assessment of the former.
Arta Mishra,

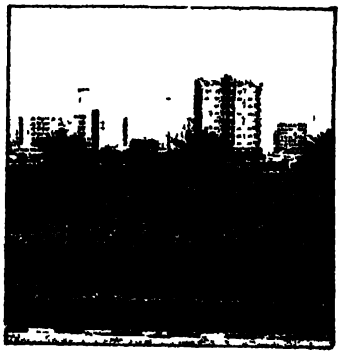
Winner all the Way

■ It is very rare that a sportsman occupies the centrestage of national politics ('Khan Saheb', August 20).



Pele was a national hero all right, but he never enjoyed the kind of hype Imran does. It is time Indian cricketers forgot benefit matches and did some good work for their motherland

It would sound Utopian, but if the two neighbouring countries had sportsmen at the helm, a bonhomie of sorts could exist between them
Debasish Chandra,
Kharagpur

■ It is a matter of great pride for the people of Pakistan what Imran Khan has achieved both on and off the field People will derive inspiration from his iron determination

India has produced players of Imran's might, but not a social crusader of his calibre.

COVER STORY

PETRO CITY

As the Champions Trophy gets under way in Sharjah this week, lensman Kamal Julka focuses on some of the breathtaking spots of the desert Emirate while Lokendra Pratap Sahi establishes that it has now developed an identity all its own

DUBAI HAS ALWAYS BEEN PROJECTED IN A GLitzy fashion. Indeed, it is as much a product (and a very fine one at that) of petro dollars, of the foresight of the many Sheikhs and of the sweat and tears of an expatriate labour force, as it is of slick marketing.

Another sister Emirate, Abu Dhabi, too, has held its own by virtue of being the United Arab Emirates' nattily executed capital. But Sharjah, among the more conservative of the seven Emirates, has not exactly been an outpost in the Gulf.

And though Sharjah may well have suffered in comparison (even oil was struck there much later), specially with Dubai which is a mere 20 minutes drive away, over the years it actually has evolved an identity of its own.

It may not possess Abu Dhabi's wealth and may not be as chic as Dubai, but Sharjah

Sharjah's ruler Shaikh Sultan bin Mohammad Al Qasimi

A view of the lagoon

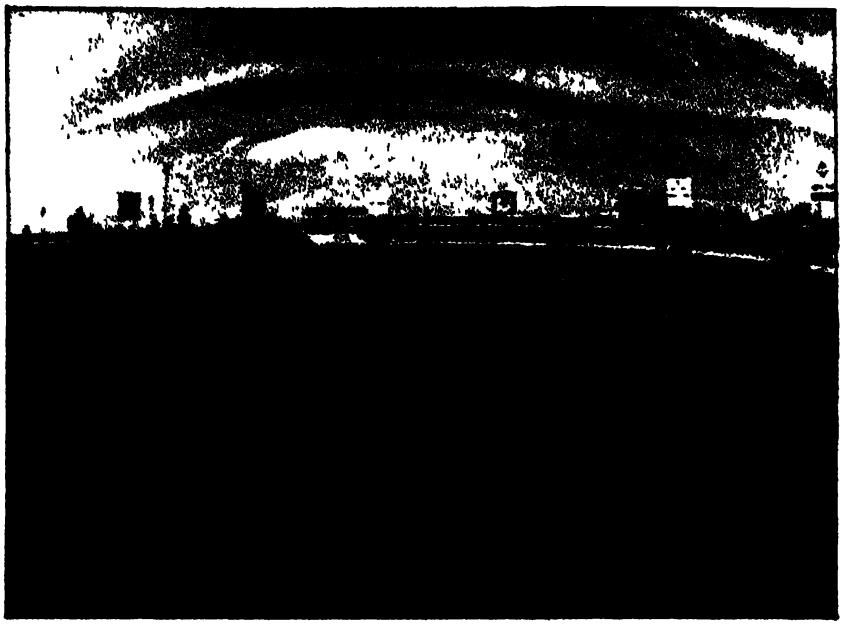
has had its share of dream merchants and, today, is definitely not a poor cousin of either Abu Dhabi or Dubai

Beaches and boulevards (well yes, the greenery has to be seen to be believed), a captivating lagoon, super markets and 24-hour departmental stores, chocolate parlours, a floating (dhow) restaurant, swanky showrooms with gleaming BMWs and Ferraris

Sharjah has all that and more Only, there is no liquor (even though, ironically, the 'dry' Emirate apparently is a transit point for smugglers operating from Ajman to Dubai) And that, perhaps, is one reason why the tourist boom is not reverberating in the manner it should in Sharjah

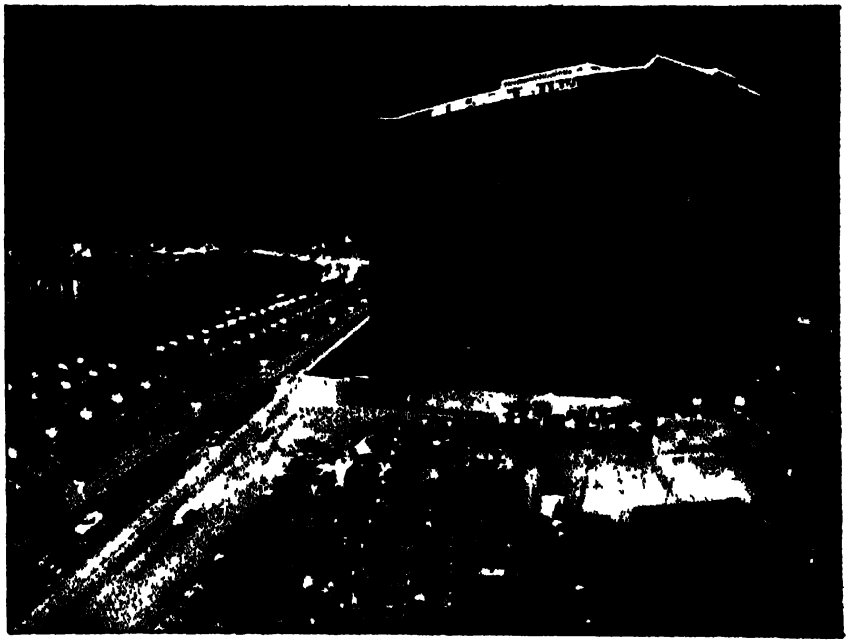
"Let Sharjah be declared wet, as it was till 12-15 years ago, and we'll give Dubai a run for its money," was how a local, who frequently motors across to Dubai for a "refill" and the occasional evening of belly dancing, put it

Still, pretty appropriate is the welcome which greets all visitors, "Smile, You Are In Sharjah"

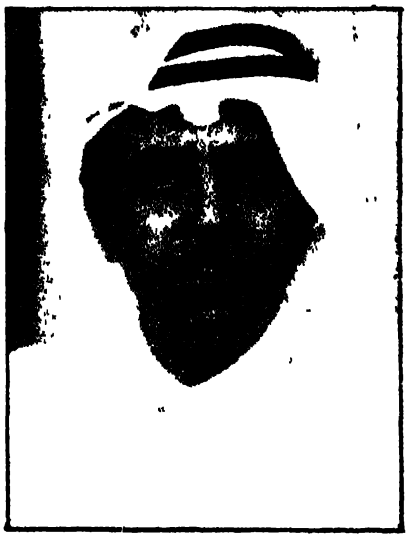


Of course, Sharjah's principal claim to fame is its association with cricket From a centre for purely tamasha matches back in the early Eighties when the accent was on shopping, partying and accepting gifts from overawed Sheikhs (not necessarily in that order), it has now emerged as a vibrant and popular neutral venue

The immaculately maintained Sharjah Cricket Stadium, which remains a major tourist draw, has already displaced that ampitheatre extraordinary, the Melbourne Cricket Ground, and the Sydney Cricket Ground as the centre to have hosted the maximum one-day Internationals Sharjah's tally of 90 is five better than both the Australian centres.



And it is largely to one man, expatriate Pakistani Abdulrehman Bukhatir, that credit for putting Sharjah on the cricketing (and international, one may add) map goes Bukhatir has been well served by organisational wizard



Abdulrehman Bukhatir

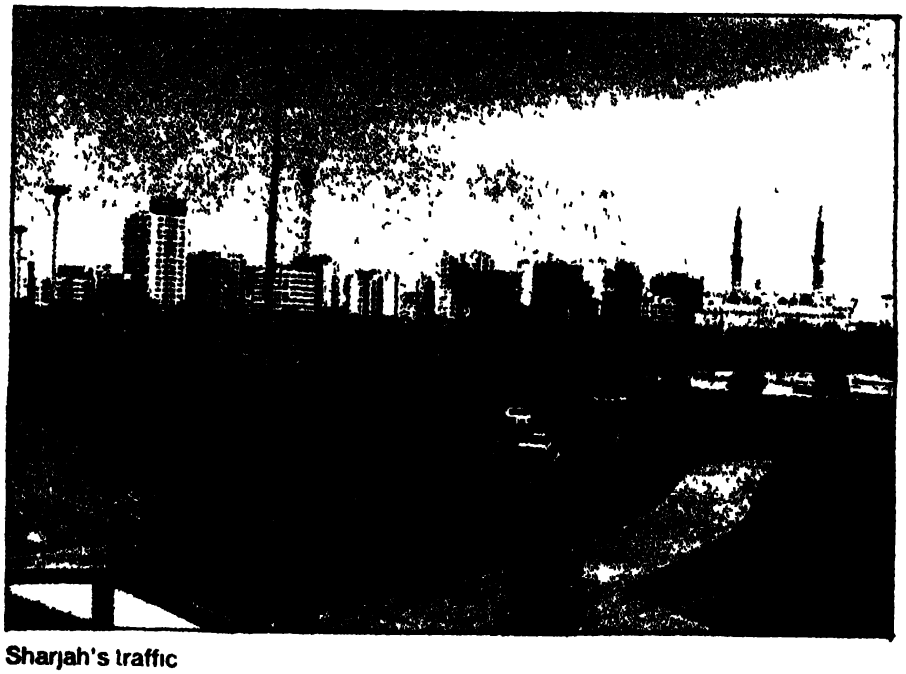
Qasim Noorani and suave operator Asif Iqbal

The Cricketers Benefit Fund Series, Bukhatir's brainchild, will again be in the news this week as the Champions Trophy gets under way. And while India is not participating this time, enough action is assured with world champions (and the region's numero uno crowd-pullers) Pakistan, the West Indies and Sri Lanka in the fray.



The Indian presence in cosmopolitan Sharjah (as in the rest of the Emirates) is considerable, with the ubiquitous India Association running schools and organising cultural shows. Nothing pleases them more than an Indian victory, particularly over Pakistan. And, nothing devastates them more than an Indian loss, specially at Pakistan's hands.

Pakistanis, too, are to be seen in impressive numbers (most taxi drivers, for instance, are Pathans). But owing to the strict laws and an impartial administration, the tension in the stands, where India-backers invariably are in a minority, never extends beyond the Sharjah Cricket Stadium gates. And just as well.

Problems at home (read India and Pakistan), though, do find an echo among the expatriate community. And, yes, locals insist that tension was palpable in the days and weeks immediately after the December 1992 destruction in Ayodhya But it was not between Indians and Pakistanis Sadly, the trouble was within the Indian community

Sharjah's traffic

"The administration had made it known that any disturbance would be firmly put down So, that way, we were not insecure In fact, at no time, were we threatened by either local Muslims or Pakistanis

"However, a section of our own brethren, from the Malabar region chiefly, felt that some of us Hindus had funded the Babri Masjid's demolition They even organised a demonstration, which led to a bit of stone-throwing " recalled a Gujarati gentleman, who requested anonymity

Geeta, the hugely popular vegetarian eatery which would regularly be patronised by Indian cricketers and mediamen, became a 'victim' of intra-community differences And soon after that demonstration, it was shifted from Revenue Street to a more central location in the Al Aroba (or Rolla) area, which teems with expatriates

Playing safe, the proprietors also renamed it Geetar Clearly, the 'r' was consciously added The change in location notwithstanding, the eatery continues to attract a wide clientele and it is not unusual on weekends (Thursday and Friday nights) to see burqa-clad patrons who have liberally helped themselves to either an Amouage or Boucheron spray, flocking to Geetar

That Shaikh Sultan bin Mohammad Al Qasimi, Sharjah's ruler and a member of the UAE's Supreme Council, is well disposed towards Indians has given the community much confidence And while the Sharia laws are choking, with stiff penalties awaiting any breach, state-encouraged discrimi-

CLASSIC MATCHES AND DEEDS

☛March 22, 1985 (India 125 in 42.4 overs; Pakistan 87 in 32.5 overs)

India beat Pakistan in an astonishing match. Imran Khan took six wickets for 14 runs, when India were put in, yet still ended up on the losing side. The batsmen were undone by an overdamp pitch in the morning which turned sharply as soon as spin was applied. Quite easily the most talented innings was the 47 by season's debutant Mohammed Azharuddin. Gavaskar held four brilliant catches, three of them diving efforts at slip. India's total was the record lowest total for a team batting first and winning.

☛April 18, 1986 (India 245/7 in 46 overs; Pakistan 246-9 in 50 overs).

The first Australasia Cup final was won by Pakistan off the very last ball against India. With four runs needed to win, Javed Miandad struck Chetan Sharma's final delivery for his third six.

India, put in to bat, were given an excellent start by Gavaskar, Srikkanth and Vengsarkar who put on 200 for only one wicket. However, they slumped from 216 for two to 245 for seven when Imran and Wasim returned to attack. Pakistan's requirement of just under five an over drifted to nine with 10 overs remaining. But Miandad and Quadir picked up the rate in their fifth wicket stand of 71 and Miandad kept the impetus going. With India's field set to prevent a four, he won the match in the most dramatic manner by hitting a six.

☛December 3, 1986 (West Indies 248/5 in 45 overs; Sri Lanka 55 in 28.3 overs)

Courtney Walsh of West Indies demonstrated one of the most lethally economical spells of fast bowling when he took five wickets for only one run in 4.3 overs to skittle out Sri Lanka for the lowest-ever total in Sharjah.

☛October 15, 1989 (India 273/4 in 46 overs; Pakistan 274/4 in 44.4 overs)

Pakistan outwitted India in a high-scoring match in which the match aggregate of 547 runs was the best ever between these two teams. India reached its highest score at Sharjah due to the splendid efforts of Srikkanth (51), Sidhu's maiden 100 (108) and Mohinder Amarnath's 88 (off 78 balls). All of Pakistan's batsmen made useful contributions and Imran's captaincy made all the difference.

☛May 2, 1990 (Australia 332/3 in 50 overs; Sri Lanka 218 in 45.3 overs)

Australia's highest total in a one-day International contained an unbeaten 117 from Dean Jones but of special mention was the 74 run knock of Simon O'Donnell (six sixes, six fours) who reached his 50 in only 18 balls (five sixes and two fours) — the record in one-day Internationals.

☛October 18, 1991 (India 238 for four in 50 overs; Pakistan 178 in 44.4 overs)

India defeated Pakistan at Sharjah after eight consecutive losses. Sanjay Manjrekar (72) and Tendulkar's unbeaten 52 were instrumental in India putting up a reasonable total and then Prabhakar and Raju struck vital blows in crucial stages to enable India to win.

☛October 25, 1991 (Pakistan 262/6 in 50 overs; India 190 in 46 overs)

Hopes were high when the two teams met in the deciding match — the final of the Wills Trophy — after India had beaten Pakistan in the first match and ran very close in the second. Pakistan's total contained a runaway third wicket stand of 171 runs between Zahid Fazal (98) and Salim Malik (87). Then Aaquib Javed wrecked India (47/4) with a 'LBW' hattrick (Shastri, Azharuddin and Tendulkar) and went on to finish with seven wickets for 37 runs — the best innings figures in a one-day international.

☛November 5, 1993 (Pakistan 284/4 in 50 overs; West Indies 285/4 in 45.3 overs)

Just prior to the start of the Hero Cup in India in November 1993, West Indies won a high scoring Champions Trophy final. When they overcame a Pakistan total of 284 in which Basit Ali's unbeaten 127 (100 runs off only 67 balls — the second fastest hundred in one-day internationals) with Salim Malik (84) produced 172 runs in 126 balls for the fourth wicket. Pakistan scored 173 runs in the last 16 overs after being 111 for three after 34 overs. The last 10 overs producing 111 runs.

Thanks to a belligerent innings of 153 from Brian Lara — the highest individual score in Sharjah — West Indies cruised to their target in 45.3 overs.

☛April 15, 1994 (India 219 in 463 overs; Pakistan 223-4 in 44.3 overs)

Sachin Tendulkar's blazing 73 in 64 balls and Sidhu (47) were main scorers for India. From 156 for two in the 31st over, India were all out for 219 losing their last seven wickets for 64 runs in under 17 overs. Saeed Anwar (72) and Sohail put on 77 for the first wicket in just 12.4 overs. Basit Ali top scored with an unbeaten 75.

nation is something the Indians do not have to lose sleep over.

With the break up of the Soviet Union and emergence of the CIS nations, as also the opening up of China, Sharjah has begun to attract the business class of tourists. Only, they may not really be spending much time in the Emirate.

Some, one was informed, halt for just a day or two, before returning with tonnes of state-of-the-art electronic equipment. Back home, they make a killing on the flourishing black market, particularly in the former Soviet Union.

Obviously the bottomline for this new breed of traders appears to be. Pick, pay and leave, often on specially chartered cargo flights which are quite common. That Sharjah is only a hop, step and jump away from Dubai, universally acknowledged as a shopper's delight, has worked to its benefit.

Indeed, it is an advantage well deserved ■

FIRST, THE GOOD NUDES

Suman Bhuchar met former model Catherine Bailey, whose photographer-husband David Bailey has published a controversial, coffee-table book of photographs

The most disturbing photograph of Catherine Bailey shows her naked in bed lying alongside another naked woman Both are blindfolded — while three hooded men stand menacingly behind them

Another equally disturbing photograph shows her wearing a crown of wires, with the whites of her eyes showing and blood trickling from her mouth

These are just two of the black and white photographs from David Bailey's The Lady is a Tramp, which depicts pictures of his 34 year-old wife, Catherine, a former model, taken over a period of 10 years

The lady in question describes the book as "a mixture of art and tart" and is curious about it making way to India "Is the book being sold in India?" asks Catherine Bailey

Published by Thames and Hudson, with an introduction by the author, Fay Weldon, it costs £40

Some of the photographs fit the description of a "modern family album" more cosily They show Catherine with her young children, playing on a beach or in the bath She calls them "snaps" The ones of her during pregnancy or childbirth have a touch of a biology textbook

Catherine claims that the pictures were not taken with the intention of producing a book "They are a mixture of everything, including personal ones"

The nudes have excited comment, not all favourable What is one to make of the photograph of her kissing another woman? Another of them entwined together? Or the one of her sitting on a lavatory seat? There are also a series of more straightforward girly pin-up pictures, as well as elegant fashion and beauty photographs

At her husband's studio, Catherine appears relaxed enough in Tee-shirt and trousers With her hair tied back in a plait and no makeup, she looks like a fresh-faced girl She is tall, with dark brown hair and brown eyes She has a touch of a Latin

She calls the book "an album about women — how I think women are great generally"

At one point, her husband sticks his head in With his greying designer stubble, he is instantly recognisable

Catherine Dyer, "an ex-colonial", was born in Zambia, came to England in 1970, grew up in Winchester, educated at a convent school and then entered modelling She met her husband while modelling for him and became his fourth wife They have three children — Paloma, Fanton and Sasha

He had been married to the French actress, Catherine Deneuve, and the model, Marie Helvin, (who also came in handy for another book)

She and Bailey have been together for 13 years — she calls him "Bailey" She now looks after wardrobe on films She is angry with women journalists who have taken her to task for "letting the side down"

"I am a true feminist because I am true to myself," she says

She insists she has not been exploited and had control over the choice of pictures which were published Some, she admits, made her feel uncomfortable (such as the ones of her giving birth) "But that doesn't mean I don't like them"

Her critics, she adds, are the ones letting other women down because they conform to a "mould" — "I am pissed off with them Being a feminist is about being almost anything you want — proud of being a mother, of going to work if that's what you want to do Women are pulled down by other women"

She has an explanation for the 'lesbian' pictures She says, "When I did them, they were about women exploring themselves as females Obviously people are going to be titillated by them because those who see the pictures have their own interpretation"

She says she is "shocked" by the adverse reaction to the pictures from "square" people "They are actually beautiful pictures"

She did not decide which photographs her husband took "He's the photographer so I can't tell him what to do"

So in what circumstances were they taken? And what is it like living with so famous a photographer?

'I am pissed off with them. Being a feminist is about being almost anything you want — proud of being a mother, of going to work if that's what you want to do. Women are put down by other women'

"He's not a photographer one minute and a husband the next He's both, and being an artiste is not something you can turn on and off"

Bailey did not always follow his wife around with a camera Some were posed in the studio "Others were on the spur of the moment"

Bailey does not always work with black and white film, his wife says "He prefers it"

One of her favourite pictures is of Fenton shortly after birth "It lets me remember the emotion of how you see a baby for the first time, you either think it is the most ugly thing you've seen or the most beautiful"

Catherine calls Fay Weldon a family friend who has written the text, "non-judgemental" She explains, "She is a true feminist—she doesn't expect anybody to take on a particular role"

Weldon, author of The Life and Loves of a She Devil, observes "The Lady is a Tramp because she is all things to all men She behaves out of order, does what she wishes, and so gets a certain reputation"

She adds "Here we have a collection of photographs to admire, and to make the reader uneasy One woman in so many guises Is it possible? Is it

What is it like living with so famous a photographer? 'He's not a photographer one minute and a husband the next. He's both, and being an artiste is not something you can turn on and off'. Bailey did not always follow his wife around with a camera. Some were posed in the studio. 'Others were on the spur of the moment' seemly? Is it what makes men love women - -the plurality of selves within the one feamle body?"

For £39 95 (Rs 2,000) Indian readers can find out soon

BARELY SUSTAINABLE

Yes, there are times when it seems that there is not much to be grateful for in life, but from now on, console yourself with this thought at least you are not David Bailey's wife

Poor Catherine! The luscious former model and mother of three, who is the priapic snapper's fourth wife — after Rosemary Bramble, Catherine Deneuve and Marie Helvin — has hardly got a minute, or an inch of her body, to call her own

Imagine this You've just given the kids their tea, popped a wash in the tumble drier and before you get the time to switch on the kettle for a well-earned mug of Cadbury's Options, the old man is on the prowl with his box Brownie

Then it's knicks off and legs akimbo, naked as an egg and flat on your back on a rock in the great outdoors Snap snap snap Then it's into the rubber hotpants for a snog with a spikey-haired blonde woman, both of you fetchingly attired in dog collars Snap snap snap Then it's into the stockings and black lingerie for a scrummage on the fitted carpet and a quick bout of nipple-licking with a brunette Snap snap snap

Why has Catherine done all this? Reportage or titillation? Is she bisexual or is it art?

"I don't think if I was bisexual it would be anyone else's business," she tells me

Over the past years, Mrs B could not even take time out to have a baby or two without hubby weaseling into the delivery room, taking photographs Now they have all been included in a grand and swanky book — The Lady is a Tramp Portraits of Catherine Bailey — and at £39 95, it may cost you more than the coffee table on which it is destined to gather dust

It is an odd book, full of photographs, that are, by turns, beautiful, disturbing and quasi-pornographic But can anyone explain what it is for?

The Lady is a Tramp because, "even now and then, she wants to be," writes Fay Weldon, the author of the book's lurid accompanying text, a tortured seam of cabbage-brained piffle about nothing in particular But the words, of course, are a specious attempt to give respectability to this pageantry of pubic hair, kiddie pix, and high fashion shots Is it lechery masquerading as art? Or am I another, as Bailey put it, uptight, insecure woman journalist who just does not get it?

It is not nearly so dark-hearted as some of his previous collections -- Trouble and Strife, Nudes 81-84 and If We Shadows— which featured woman trussed up like chickens with their faces scratched out

New man old Bailey insists that he is totally pro-women — except "at that time of the month" If Catherine Bailey has no problem with her life being laid bare for the sake of art, why should anyone else? In a Sunday newspaper interview, she said she felt privileged and flattered She told Fay Weldon "I know exactly what I am doing I am always in control"

If she is always in control, there must come a point where she exercises it, when she says no No? "No Photographs don't work like that Most of these are snaps, nothing is ever set up"

Are there any pictures of you that are too private? "No, I don't think so"

You have never said, no, hang on, I don't want this one published? 'No"

No then

Jan Moir (The Guardian)

CONTROVERSY

MAN, WOMAN AND CHILD

Reader reaction to the Magazine cover story, 'It's Our Life' (August 13), has been overwhelming. As the debate continues we publish a final selection of letters in addition to the ones already printed in our earlier Post Mortem pages

■ If couples do not want to have children, why do they enter into matrimony ('It's Our Life', August 13)? They should have just remained single and promoted their careers.

You have couples where the husband lives in Varanasi and the wife in Delhi. What sort of marriages are these where they do not even live together?

They are all medically sound and yet harbour some quaint notions of individualism.

M S Quraishy,
Calcutta

■ At least the couples are honest to admit they would not be doing justice to their children because of their demanding careers.

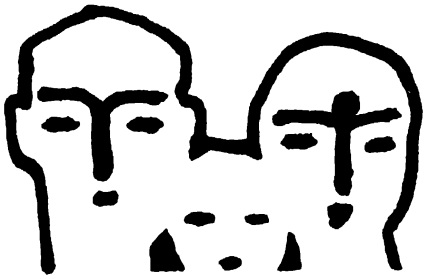
D Chatterjee,
Calcutta

■ Hats off to this new breed of courageous couples! Why do men and women hanker for children? To take care of them in their winter years? To carry forward the generation? To prove to society they are not impotent? To crystallise their unfulfilled desires through their offspring?

Frankly, we need more couples like the ones interviewed.

Debasish Chandra,
Kharagpur (W B)

■ Congratulations to the couples who are showing so much responsibility to Mother Earth.



Reena Bhattacharya,
Asansol (W B)

■ I have dug out a remark of H W Lonie published in the journal, Foundry, 1961, which reads "Research isn't practical. Neither are babies. They are costly, noisy, dirty and have no practical values. They net no return on the investment for 20 years, and even when they do, they are a liability rather than an asset. There are many reasons for not having babies and for not doing research. The results of yielding to those superficial reasons are the same in both cases. A dim and declining future climaxed by extinction."

Debashis Ray,
Calcutta

■ All the couples reveal some socio-psychological compulsions for being childless. They seem to be driven by the constant fear of not being able to cope with the pressures of career and child rearing.

Samrat Datta,
Champahati (W B)

■ The couples appeared to be enlisted members of a robotic society, subservient to the anti-human aims of profit and efficiency. The cover story was a reflection of a reality that a section of Indian modern society has become a subject of super-industrial manipulation, which has given rise to a social system in which individuals want to be alone.

Ranadhir Chakraborty,
Calcutta

■ Remaining childless despite being medically fit is a form of barbaric narcissism.

Jaya Mitra,
Jamshedpur

■ When the couples have not experienced what it is to be a parent, the choice, they claim they are exercising, is no choice at all.

The parent-child relationship is totally different from the child-parent relationship. They have known the latter, but not the former which is a more superior bond, savoured regardless the heartache.

The couples are thinking as children and not as parents, not knowing the tenderness at babyhood, the sternness at childhood and that final happiness when the child matures into a fine adult.

One does not go through 20 years of worry and heartache just to possess an heir or to pass on the family name or perform one's last rites.

And certainly not to have one's child commenting in print that those who have children belong to the "cattle class".

Children don't just mean changing nappies, mixing cereals or attending parent-teacher meetings. It is a total experience enriched with love and emotions.

Neelam Munshi,
Calcutta

■ If the couples can afford to stay childless they could have stayed single, too. They should not have entered into this farce called wedlock. They would have made excellent live-in partners (in any case some of the couples do not even see each other for days).

What have the couples achieved and for whom?

Biswajit Biswal,
Rourkela

■ If by bearing children we belong to the cattle class, do they not belong to the robot class?

Suneeta De,
Durgapur

■ Thank God these couples have decided to remain childless or they would have produced another bunch of society-hating drug addicts!

Saheli Banerjee,
Calcutta

Aries

March 21 – April 20

Ganesha says, if at all it is possible, the partnership and bonding trend of the last 15 days will be even stronger and more effective, be it personal or professional or business links. The strong influence of Mars also favours marriage, ceremony, ties, publicity, conferences and meets.

Taurus

April 21 – May 20

Last week's shifting of gears mentally and physically continues unabated this week too. Chop and change will be the way it goes. Uranus regained direct motion on the 7th helping you in matters connected with loans and finance. Expenses will mount. Get ready to travel.

May 21 – June 20

Once again a time to show your paces because Mars connects superbly with Neptune. Mars is energy. Neptune imagination. therefore, you should succeed in carrying out your plans. Children and education are highlighted this week too.

Cancer

June 21 – July 20

Mixed results. Be ready for a little opposition or rather differences of opinion. Be tolerant but put your foot down on fundamental and moral values. October does favour changes in the home, as well as important job offers which will continue right through December. It will change your life.

Leo

July 21 – August 21

Communication, contacts and journey, as said earlier, will be there this week also. Inspiration and exultation could seize you and as these are happily infectious, you may expect excellent cooperation from those around you. Children, research and new projects are foretold.

Virgo

August 22 – September 22

Finances and family are the duo ruling your life. It would be a good policy to be tolerant and caring instead of carping and nit-picking. In all fairness, many Virgoes are generous and loyal too. You will be wining and dining in style. Complications can be cleared partly.

Libra

September 23 – October 22

Time to get engaged, be married, travel, move and manoeuvre to advantage, make plans, meet those who matter and thus make your presence felt. Monetarily, you are definitely entering into a better phase. This will continue right through November.

Scorpio

October 23 – November 22

As said earlier, keep an open house for friends, relatives, wellwishers, as it will give you satisfaction and will turn out to be good business as well. You win both ways. From October 10, Venus enters your sign, and thus by the end of the week, you may expect pleasing events.

Sagittarius

November 23—December 20

Like the previous week, now also you will notch major achievements and that should make you happy. Birth of children, grandchildren, religious rites, gigantic projects, fanfare and publicity, good news from distant places is probable. But expenses persist.

Capricorn

December 21—January 19

Once again a busy week, because everybody wants a part of you, as said last week. Now you will be in a position and in a mood for fun and games as well and that should round your life beautifully. Sweethearts and friends will play ball with you. Do mix business and joy.

Aquarius

January 20—February 18

Practical jokes and horseplay fuse with hardwork and pleasing results, thanks to the moon's excellent placing in your third angle of valour and ventures, points out Ganesha. New job assignments, contracts and commitments are destined for Aquarians who definitely make news.

Pisces

February 19—March 20

As said earlier, October through December is loan and money time. From October 10, you can make a better and easier time of it, thanks to Venus zooming away in your angle of luck as it is technically called. November should be particularly pleasing. Be positive.

BIRTHDAYS

October 8: The full moon trines Jupiter giving you thrust, direction and luck, the three significators of success. Travel, love, and marriage complete the scene.

October 9: Moon square Uranus-Neptune could make you edgy as a result of undue stress and complications. Learn not to mistake the woods for the trees.

October 10: Mars sextile Uranus, an excellent formation, assures you of money and comfortable living. Changes in the home make you feel important.

October 11: Moon-Saturn sextile leads to gains and stability as Saturn represents solidity and security, and the moon stands for opportunity. Why not be a bit daring?

October 12: Moon trine Mercury means good news and success in all creative pursuits. The result of past efforts and your own finesse will now begin to show.

October 13: Moon-sun trine always shows happiness and favourable circumstances, but not always great money. It is certain that you will be loved and cherished.

October 14: Mercury is in stationary positioning which leads to a few difficulties or misunderstandings in messages and news. Goods could be lost.

RUSKIN BOND'S  COLUMN

THE COLOUR OF DARKNESS

I had the train compartment to myself up to Rohana then a girl got in The couple who saw her off were probably her parents, they seemed very anxious about her comfort, and the woman gave the girl detailed instructions as to where to keep her things, when not to lean out of windows, and how to avoid speaking to strangers

They called their goodbyes and the train pulled out of the station As I was totally blind at the time, my eyes sensitive only to light and darkness, I was unable to tell what the girl looked like, but I knew she wore slippers from the way they slapped against her heels

It would take me some time to discover something about her looks, and perhaps I never would But I liked the sound of her voice, and even the sound of her slippers

"Are you going all the way to Dehra?" I asked

I must have been sitting in a dark corner because my voice startled her She gave a little exclamation and said, "I didn't know anyone else was here"

Well, it often happens that people with good eyesight fail to see what is right in front of them They have too much to take in, I suppose Whereas people who cannot see (or see very little) have to take in only the essentials, whatever registers most tellingly on their remaining senses

"I didn't see you either," I said 'But I heard you come in"

I wondered if I would be able to prevent her from discovering that I was blind Provided I keep to my seat, I thought, it should not be too difficult

The girl said, "I'm getting off at Saharanpur My aunt is meeting me there"

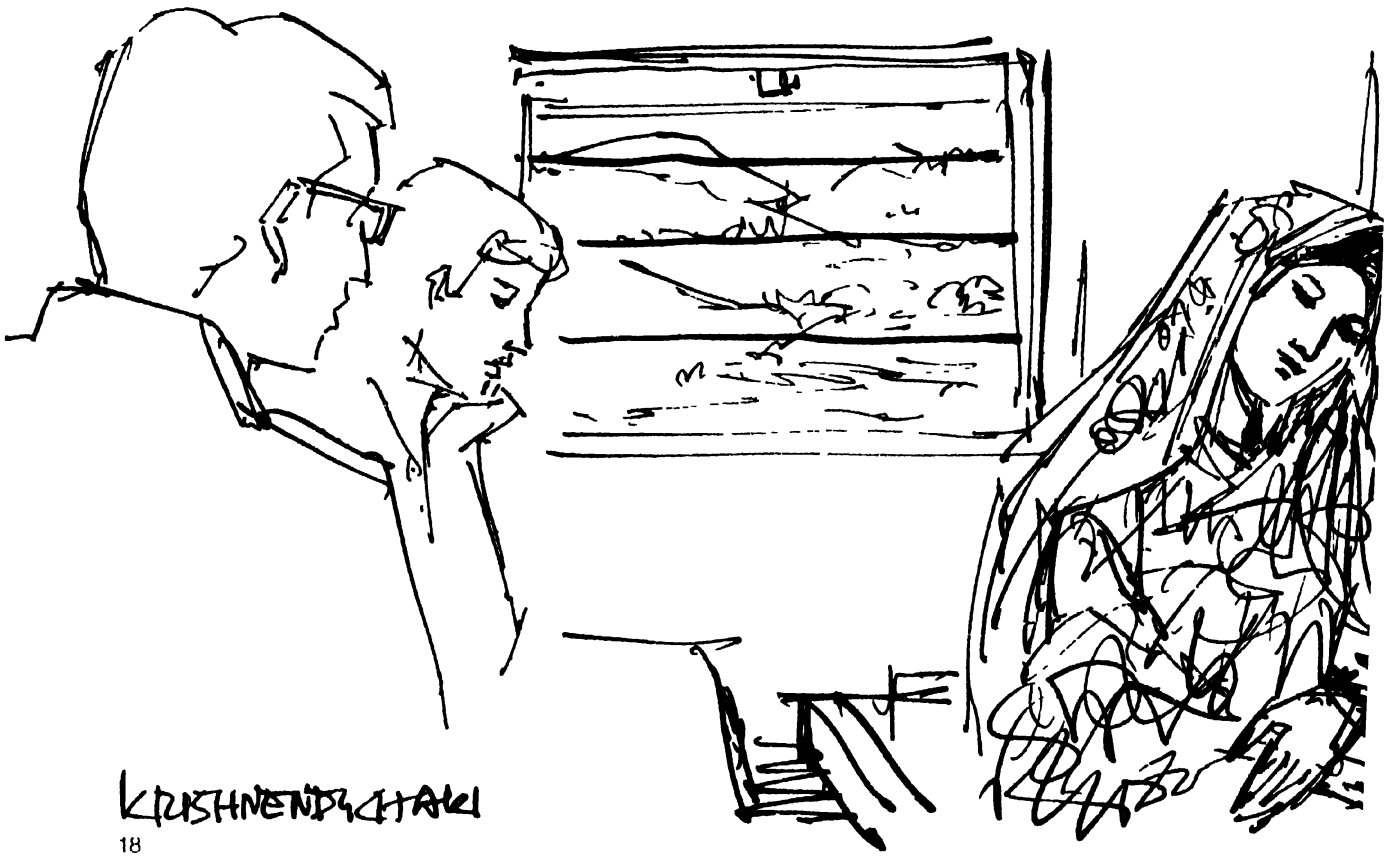
"Then I had better not get too familiar," I replied "Aunts are usually formidable creatures"

"Where are you going," she asked

"To Dehra, and then to Mussoorie"

"Oh, how lucky you are I wish to go to Mussoorie I love the hills Specially in October"

"Yes this is the best time" I said, calling on my memories "The hills are covered with wild dahlias, the sun is delicious and at night you can sit in front of a log fire and drink a little brandy Most of the tourists have gone, and the roads are quiet and almost deserted Yes, October is the best time"



She was silent I wondered if my words had touched her or whether she thought me a romantic fool Then I made a mistake

"What is it like outside?" I asked

She seemed to find nothing strange in the question Had she noticed already that I could not see? But her next question removed my doubts

"Why don't you look out of the window?" she asked

I moved easily along the berth and felt for the window ledge The window was open, and I faced it, making a pretence of studying the landscape

As I was totally blind at the time, my eyes sensitive only to light and darkness, I was unable to tell what the girl looked like; but I knew she wore slippers from the way they slapped against her heels. It would take me some time to discover something about her looks, and perhaps I never would. But I liked the sound of her voice, and even the sound of her slippers

I heard the panting of the engine the rumble of the wheels, and, in my mind's eye, I could see telegraph posts flashing by

"Have you noticed I ventured, "that the trees seem to be moving while we seem to be standing still?'

'That always happens ' she said "Do you see any animals?"

"No, ' I answered quite confidently, I knew that there were hardly any animals left in the forests near Dehra

I turned from the window and faced the girl, and for a while we sat in silence

"You have an interesting face ' remarked I was becoming quite daring, but it was a safe remark Few girls can resist flattery She laughed pleasantly, a clear, ringing laugh

'It's nice to be told I have an interesting face I'm tired of people telling me I have a pretty face

Oh so you have a pretty face, thought I, and aloud I said "Well, an interesting face can also be pretty "

"You are a very gallant young man," she said "but why you are so serious?"

I thought, then, I would try to laugh for her, but the thought of laughter only made me feel troubled and lonely

"We'll soon be at your station, ' I said.

"Thank goodness it's a short journey I can't bear to sit in a train for more than two-or-three hours '

Yet I was prepared to sit there for almost any length of time, just to listen to her talking Her voice had the sparkle of a mountain stream As soon as she left the train, she would forget our brief encounter, but it would stay with me for the rest of the journey, and for some time after

The engine's whistle shrieked, the carrige wheels changed their sound and rhythm, the girl got up and began to collect her things I wondered if she wore her hair in a bun, or if it was plaited perhaps it was hanging loose over her shoulders, or was it cut very short?

The train drew slowly into the station Outside, there was the shouting of porters and vendors and high pitched female voice near the carriage door, that voice must have belonged to the girls' aunt

"Goodbye,' the girl said

She was standing very close to me, so close that the perfume from her hair was tantalising I wanted to raise my hand and touch her hair, but she moved away Only the scent of perfume still lingered where she had stood

There was some confusion in the doorway A man, getting into the compartment, stammered an apology Then the door banged, and the world was shut out again I returned to my berth The guard blew his whistle and we moved off Once again, I had a game play and a new fellow-traveller

The train gathered speed, the wheels took up their song, the carriage groaned and shook I found the window and sat in front of it, staring into the daylight that was darkness for me

So many things were happening outside the window, it could be a fascinating game, guessing what went on out there

The man who had entered the compartment broke into my reverie

"You must be disappointed, ' he said "I'm not nearly as attractive a travelling companion as the one who just left "

"She was an interesting girl," I said "Can you tell me -- did she keep her hair long or short? '

'I don't remember, he said, sounding puzzled "It was her eyes I noticed, not her hair She had beautiful eyes — but they were of no use to her She was completely blind Didn't you notice?"

RETURN TO AYODHYA

Convoys of trucks thunder down the highway from Faizabad to Ayodhya past small shops and houses lining the road In one sits a man known as Chumman He is surrounded by piles of kharaun, the wooden sandals which he makes and which are worn by sadhus and Hindu holy men He is an old resident of Ayodhya and he is a Muslim

It is clear from Chumman s appearance and home that there is not a great deal of money in kharaun-making although he sells some 4,000 pairs a month to a trader from Varanasi The best business he ever did, however, was thanks to Ram Janambhoomi Nyas It was he who made the kharaun for the Ram Paduka Pujan campaign when replicas of Bhagwan Ram's sandals were worshipped village to village

"They gave me an advance for the wood," he said obviously impressed by the fact "So I bought the shisham - we use shisham for kharaun - and went to Kar Sewak Puram I made them 5,000 pairs"

Chumman was sawing shisham wood on December 6, 1992, when the Babri Masjid was demolished Then home guards told him to move out quickly He had fled to Faizabad When he returned he found his house and workshop looted and burned "They did n't leave even a nail," he said

December 6, 1992 had been the last time I had passed his workshop Revisiting the holy city for the first time since then, I hoped to hear that Ayodhya's peace of which its inhabitants had been so proud had completely returned

But often things are not quite so simple Chumman said "On the surface everything is as it was, and we appear to have the same good relations with the Hindus here But in our hearts, we have lost confidence I don't have hope of that old peace returning"

'When Lord Hanuman decides, then the Ram temple will be built,' he [Mathura Das] said happily. 'He won't make it while these dogs are fighting after scraps.' 'Dogs?' I queried. 'Politicians,' he replied

Just near the road to the Dhana Pam Janambhoomi are gardens full of flowers from which garlands are made for the temples of Avodhya — and any guide will tell you there are 7,500 temples Men and women move through the chandni bushes plucking the small white flowers and there are Muslim malis These gardens belong to the Muslims Zaibunnissa, one of the women gathering flowers did not agree with the views of Chumman "Now there's no trouble," she said "It was the outsiders who caused it all"

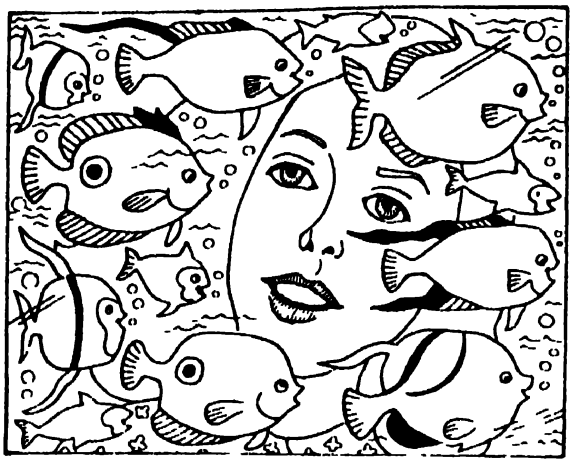
Whoever is right, the small Muslim community which had fled Ayodhya has picked up the threads of its life In one family, living behind the mound on which stands the makeshift Ram temple, three generations of women sit together to thread flowers into garlands for Hindu malis much as before

Next door to them a 75-year old tongawallah Mohammad Ali, looks after a horse belonging to a Mahant of Hanumangarhi Every morning he drives his own horse and tonga to pick up pilgrims from the railway station, takes them to bathe in the river Sarvu and then on a tour of the sacred places of Ayodhya

Everything appears as before in the lanes of city too, although a booklet containing scenes of the demolition and gruesome photographs of corpses has joined other souvenirs on sale I found busloads of pilgrims from Gaya heading for darshan at Hanumangarhi, by far the most impressive building in the city A young boy offered to escort me for Rs 2, his main skill being to fight off the monkeys which grab sweets as you climb the steep stone steps to the temple

Inside, the head mahant, Mathura Das, was facing the main shrine reclining against a cushion "When Lord Hanuman decides then the Ram temple will be built," he said happily ' He won't make it while these dogs are fighting after scraps" "Dogs?" I queried "Politicians," he replied

For the shopkeepers in the bazaar below, December 6 had been an unexpected Diwali, and many were convinced that the temple would be built as soon as the BJP came to power in the centre, perhaps at the next general election Their main concern about Ram Janambhoomi, however, was the damage to business done by the Central government's acquisition of the area



The popular shrine of Sita Rasoi was no longer open to the public, an access to the Ram mandir was restricted to six hours whereas before the demolition it had been open all day

But while to outsiders, Ayodhya is synonymous with the Babri Masjid/Ram Janambhoomi dispute, I found it was just one of the issues which concerned local people Mahant Mathura Das complained bitterly and at length of a "television disease" destroying people's religiosity "Nanga naach" (Naked dancing!),cried a paanwallah and devout Hindu in disgust, "People are watching all that and enjoying it Men are always attracted most by what is bad And now look, here in Ayodhya, this city of Ram, hardly anyone is coming to see Ram Lilas any more Jaisa khaye ann, vaisa hoye man"

AGAINST ALL ODDS

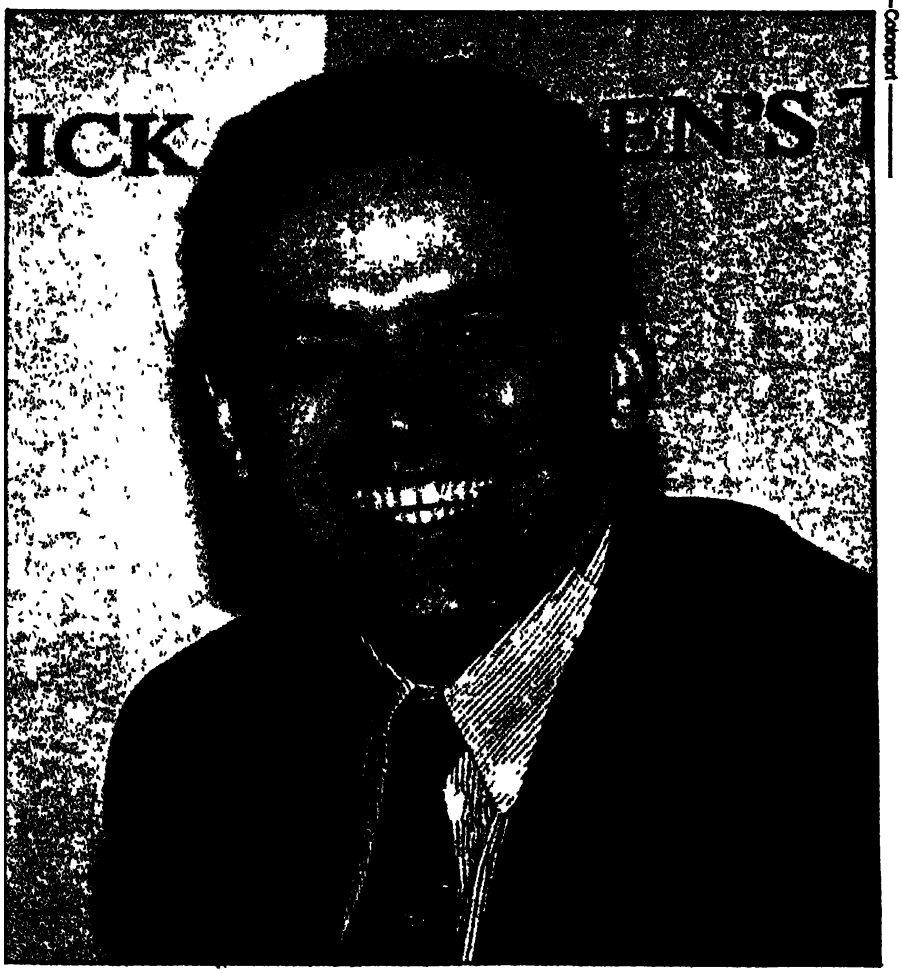
Even as Anand and Kasparov spar mentally across the 64 squares, there are new weapons being forged in the backroom Both have fulfledged teams of seconds to back up their own febrile imaginations The quality of those research teams can make all the difference between winning and losing the world championship

The concept of a second arose from the ancient and honourable practice of formal duelling 'Vhen two medieval men had a disagreement they would ask their seconds to call on each other The seconds would check with their opposite numbers and pick a time, place and weapons of mutual convenience so that the principals could slaughter each other with all due respect to convention

The chess second of course has a rather different set of responsibilities from the original concept. He is a backroom boy who does a lot of donkey work as well as creative research He also has to ensure that his principal is well prepared psychologically When it comes to a world championship match, that is vital

The need for a team of backroom boys is obvious if one considers the sheer workload involved in preparation Before going into the world championship match, both players will have studied every published game by their opponent. That would work to an opus of close to a 1,000 games itself They will also have looked at most of the 10,000 odd games that have been played in grandmaster contests in the last two years.

This is just preliminary spadework to try and establish trends and weaknesses In itself, it is enough to occupy several qualified people fulltime Kasparov, for example, employs a permanent team of half a dozen people, most of them Grandmasters of repute. So much so that GM Valery Salov disparagingly said at Sanghinagar, "Kasparov would be hard put to stay in the top five if he had to rely on himself alone."



Vishwanathan Anand: Checking out choices

The champion's seconds probe his opponent's style for patterns and weaknesses. They also check out his own games for the same features.

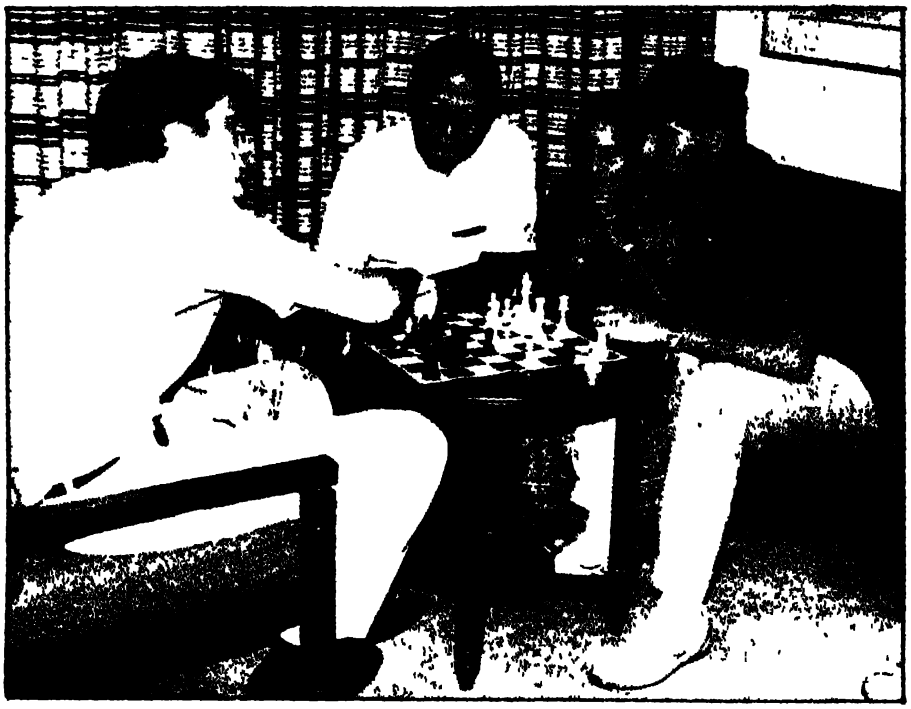
Garri Kasparov: Smelling victory?

They find new opening ideas, dissect his inspirations and also occasionally prompt radical shifts in style. The whole concept was developed by "Mr Soviet Chess" Mikhail Botvinnik who picked a player who was similar in style to a prospective match opponent and play him in a secret training match as part of his preparations It worked well enough to keep him world champion for 13 years Since he also ran a chess school that successfully produced Spassky, Karpov and Kasparov, it is not surprising that they refined the technique and developed almost the point of overkill

The only world champion since the War who has not used a regular second was the enigmatic Bobby Fischer Even he chose GM William Lombardi as an official second before his Rejkjavik 1972 match. Lombardi who is a jesuit priest in private life was one of the few people Fischer came close to trusting with his secrets

Confidentiality is after all vital — Kasparov's second GM Evgeny Vladimirov switched sides midway through the 1987 match and moved over to Karpov's camp It was no coincidence that Kasparov just about managed to retain by tying the match

Until he played his first world championship qualifying cycle in 1990, Anand had always worked alone He picked Swedish GM Ferdinand Hellers as his first match second for the contest against Alexey Dreev After that, he switched to Russo-Belgian GM Mikhail Gureyvich for the quarter final against Karpov This was a horses for courses strategy because Gureyvich is an ex-Kasparov second who has a personal hatred for Karpov as motivation



Since then, Anand has developed a semi-permanent association with American GM Patrick Wolff They are good friends and like working together Since the first Sanghinagar Match against Gata Kamsky, Anand has also been associated with Georgian theorist and International master Elizar Ubilava But it was only last November that he picked up a really big gun

Before Anand went into the second revenge match against Kamsky, infact, before he met Michael Adams in January, he decided to look for a change in style. That was when he hired Artur Yusupov, the Russo-German GM who is known as "The Wall" because of his sheer solidity Yusupov is a former world Junior champion who has twice reached a Championship Candidates Semi-finals and lost a quarter final in 1994 to Anand himself The 35-year-old is reputed to be the last living descendant of the Mad Monk Grigory Rasputin and the toughest match player imaginable

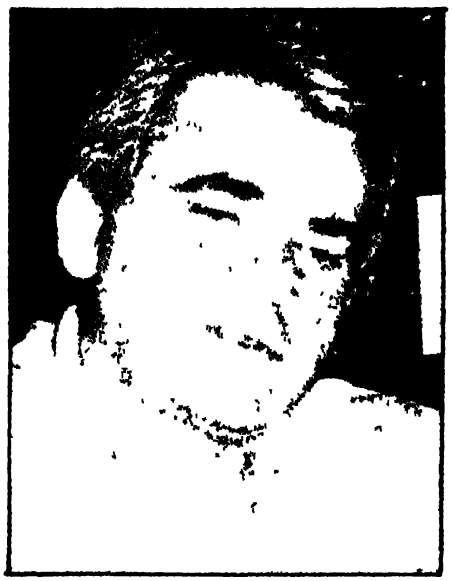
His influence became obvious when Anand won 4-0 without breathing hard against Adams It became even more obvious when he beat Kamsky comfortably in a revenge match without allowing serious counter chances The defensive solidity that the Indian was always lacking seemed to have

Artur Yusupov: 'The Wall' behind Anand

Anand (right) with his parents and second Ferdinand Hellers

finally come along with Yusupov's influence

The next serious hiring decision Anand made involved an amateur chess player Sometime before the Kamsky match he hired an old friend of his from Amsterdam Dr Albert Toby is a sports psychologist whose enthusiasm for the game far outruns his playing skills This was also a conscious effort to develop the right temperament to play a long-grinding high stake match without losing patience Thus far, it seems to have worked because he has opened with a sequence of six draws



Finally, before the match itself, Anand has hired another big gun Another amateur this time but one with rather impressive chess playing credentials Dr Jonathan Speelman is a senior wrangler at Cambridge He has also twice reached the Semi-finals of the Candidates and is known as as an exceptional theoretician Even with that array of talent backing him, the Indian ace is seriously outnumbered by the opposition He must be hoping that quality will make somewhat for a lack of quantity He is also favoured somewhat by one interesting match condition All games are being played to a one session seven hour finish This means no adjournments which remove the prospects of a serious analytical burden for the smaller team apart from being a drag on the stamina of the principal This team has evolved over the last couple of years with additions whenever Anand has felt the need It is not a strictly hire and fire situation Anand finds it impossible to work except with friends or alone Active players like Yusupov and Speelman who may both have legitimate championship aspirations of their own are unlikely to work except for someone they like and respect The charm of the 25-year-old challenger who is probably the most well-liked person on the circuit may have worked in his favour

Before the match began, Anand was being assessed as a 40 percent underdog Thus far, things have gone neck and neck which is a sign that he has done more or less the right things so far The contribution of his team to this must have been considerable although difficult to assess. However, in case the reader is thinking it would be a case of Kasparov's team or vice versa nothing would be further from the truth

Each player is completely alone when it comes to taking the really critical decisions with the clock running In the final countdown, no matter how well prepared, it is the player's skills and nerves that must carry the day.

However, the careful way in which Anand has prepared himself and covered every angle that he could possibly cover must cause a reassessment of the initial odds and it must be in the Indian's favour ■

The Dawn Breaks

On a world dark and black as death —
The dawn still breaks
On the fields of blood and tears
Where man's hopes breed like the hopeless spring
The dawn still breaks
On the starving men, the naked,

The blind and the dying,
The dawn still breaks
On the workers who sleep with Dreams of sweat on their brow,
On the raped girls, the knifed boys,
On a world as this Where no one weeps, no promises survive
Tomorrow may be peace
but not tomorrows exist
And still the dawn
breaks
On detached attachments
On bodies dead before they are dying —
And still the dawn
breaks
On the dusty graves of lost loves
Where men's souls hunger still,
Seeking no respite

Night in Cuttack

Night descends
like a long-drawn-out sigh of an old man
on this streetless city of mine
Night, in fact, never leaves this city lurking between the ancient stones of Barabati hidden by many-layered cobwebs of an intriguing past which the sun can never unravel
Night remains etched
on the dark face of Goddess Chandi
as she jealously stands guard
over the spirits of kings, soldiers and their concubines Night touches me and my forefathers
with loving fingers hiding our sins, agonies, dreams that went sour,
under a thick inky cover
Night is, it seems, in love with this ruined city of mine –
I love the night

Dipak Samantarai

Outrage

A battered boat floats along the river
As I sit on the bank, lost in thought,
Torn pieces of a red sari
whirl in the air,
To its aimless solitude I compare my lot
A few broken bangles reflect the light,
I think of the myriad hues of broken dreams, Abrupt awareness
pierces the darkness of night —
I distinctly remember hearing a scream.
A predatory eagle circles overhead,
Somewhere its victim
hides in fear,
Consciously I follow its flight —
The battered boat is no longer near

An unspoken story
Repeated over the ages
Despite the screams and ravaged dreams,
The battered boats sail hopelessly by
As the eagle swoop down in victory

SANDIP PATIL, or 'Sandy' as he is known, stunned the cricketing world when he suddenly announced retirement in late 1986. That he still had a good many years of cricket left was underlined in no small manner when he came out of retirement—at Madhavrao Scindia's behest—to guide Madhya Pradesh as a hugely successful player-cum-coach in the Ranji Trophy. In more recent times, the salt-and-pepper bearded Patil has been making headlines as the Indian Colts' and India A cricket manager. He is widely tipped to succeed Ajit Wadekar as the national team's cricket manager after the 1996 World Cup.

The Madding Crowd

■ Somehow the Magazine feels tourism means Goa ('Take Your Pick', September 3). The sun 'n' sand paradise may be an exotic destination for foreigners, but as Indians we should not be neglecting the flora and fauna that exist in abundance in some parts of North India

For instance, the Magazine could have highlighted the sylvan Garhwal hills — regions of unmatched natural splendour

Our tourism policy is shaped to cater to foreign visitors

Foreign tourism, we should not forget, brings in its wake an erosion of domestic culture and ethos Goa, a hideout for drug addicts and hippy culture, will bear this out

Of course, this does not mean that we discontinue foreign tourism as it is a big foreign currency earner

Santosh Kumar Sharma,
Kharagpur

■ Goa has picture perfect beaches and sells very well abroad But there are other scenic spots in India, equally tantalising, which could have been featured

Abhishake Saha,
Ichhapur (W B)

Goa: Hideout for hippies?

■ Last year I visited Diu and, as the Magazine says, Goa and Diu are totally different from each other For the zest-loving type there cannot be a place other than Goa No wonder it is so popular with honeymooners!

Partha Pratim Modak,
Howrah

■ With the promotion of tourism the first thing that suffers is the environment With an increasing number of visitors, more and more hotels come up and more and more waste is littered Noise pollution also reaches its peak Such cacophonous invasion is soon going to rob the places of their beauty and tranquility

Panchanana Baskey,
Baripada (Orissa)

■ Goa has been overexposed It has been the favourite destination of film producers, honeymooners and lovers of fun and feni Diu may be virgin territory, but it will very soon become another Goa

The Heart of Tully

Shobha De cuts into the broadcaster-turned-novelist and tries to show up the real Mark Tully

Photographs by Gautam Patole

In 20 years of interviewing both "names" and non-entities, I have (by my reckoning) flopped spectacularly just twice. Generous souls would say that is a pretty good average. Yes? Naah. Not when the "flops" have been smart, media savvy men like Sunil Gavaskar and now, Mark Tully. Maybe, that is the key — smart and media savvy. These guys know only too well how the game is played. They can anticipate the questions and cleverly deflect them. Making sure nothing major is given away. Gavaskar's career as a cricketer depended on how deftly he dealt with googlies. Tully's on how cannily he got others to spill the beans. See what I mean? With my right hand on my heart, I can honestly swear that I did my bit. I tried my damndest to get Tully talking. My reading of the situation shows he neatly sidestepped all the tricky stuff. Well, bully to Tully. Judge for yourself.

Read on.

Shobha De: Tell me what you feel about a four-letter word called hype. What does hype mean to you?

Mark Tully: A lot of bother, I think As far as I'm personally concerned, if you get involved in a situation where there is hype like selling a book, for instance You have to get involved in hype otherwise your publishers may get cross with you They'll say you're not working hard enough to sell your book, I won't give you an advance, or something like that So, to me hype suggests over the day something that causes a lot of bother But I suppose it's necessary nowadays

Do you think it's a misunderstood word in today's context where everything is so market-driven. Sad to say, but...

No, I don't think it's misunderstood, it seems to be a necessary evil, I think, that's the way I would describe it really

Do you go along with it? Do you think what we are indulging in right now is part of the hype?

Yes, definitely

How do you feel about it? Are you uncomfortable about indulging in this exercise or are you okay?

I'll tell you honestly, Shobha. When I was told [by The Telegraph] that I was being flown in to Bombay by The Telegraph to be interviewed by Shobha De, I felt this was not something that I should be doing.

Are you sure? (Laughs).

I felt it was charming in some ways, and like a fool in some ways. There is this problem, you know, that are you seeking publicity yourself or are you seeking publicity for a product in the sense that other people have invested in you? If you're seeking it for yourself, it must arouse some sort of uncomfortable feeling and I hope I'm not seeking it for myself

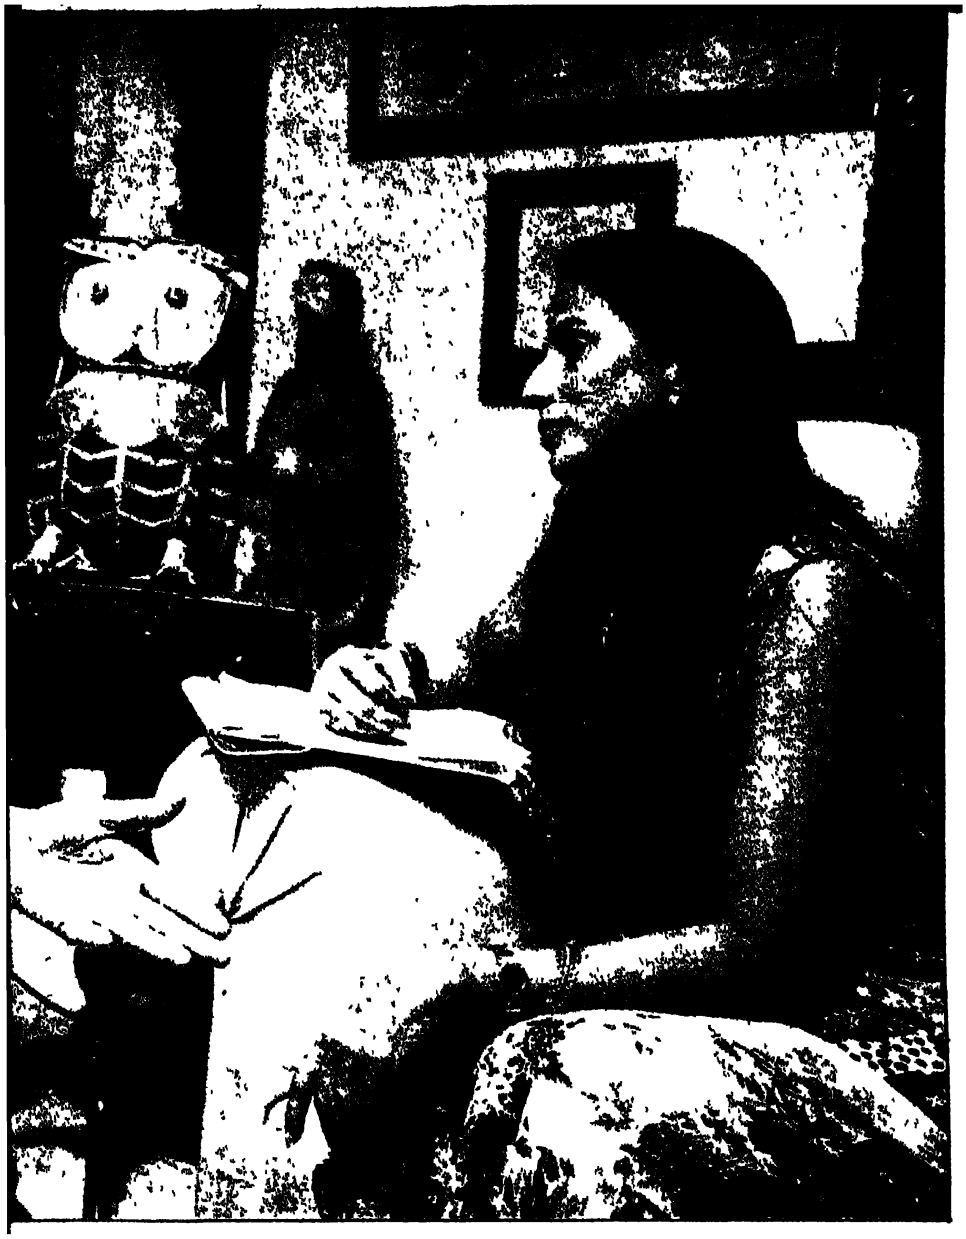
Given today's environment, how does a writer, or a painter, or anybody who has something up for public scrutiny, get heard, seen, read or viewed without creating a sufficient amount of noise?

Of course, there are people who are so well known or their work is of such quality that they don't have to indulge in hype Graham Greene is an example, V S Naipaul is another example I mean he doesn't have a major hype anyhow by the publishers But for most of us, we have to have a lot of hype It's the same as when you're doing a new radio programme, like when I started a new radio programme recently on BBC Radio in London, I had to go through a whole lot of commercial exercises Now if you say to the producer, I'm not going to do that, it's very unfair to the producer, the producer's livelihood depends on the success of the programme, and if you don't let the people know about it, none's going to listen to it So it's a vicious circle

Yeah...would you say that you have to get noticed at any cost in a very very aggressive, very competitive market. A lot of effort goes into the writing of a book and it can sink without a trace because people don't even know of its existence, they don't even know it's out there in the market place.



Yes, that's what I'm told, and I have to rely on the publicity people on this Though sometimes I wonder I mean, after all people have heard of Shobha De and they see it on the bookshelf, they will say I liked his last book, or I liked his last broadcast, or I didn't like his last book, they'll either buy or they won't buy. But that's what I'm told by the publicists

What was your experience with your first book? You did get a lot of publicity for that.

Yes, a lot of good, and a lot of bad publicity for it And one lesson I learnt was that it is true to say that all publicity is good publicity The book sold very well And I was actually quite happy about that publicity because in a way the book was an attack on certain type of people living in this country and in Britain. Basically what I would call super-Westernised ones. And they were the ones who got very angry about the book So, got ya!

How did you respond to criticism then? Did you feel touchy like most first-time authors do?

No, I always feel touchy about it I am after all fundamentally a broadcaster, I'm a guy who's spent most of his life writing one too many despatches With my first book, I was always afraid that after every 200 words or so I told myself what do I do if I find myself typing Mark Tully, BBC Delhi! So, I'm particularly sensitive about books because I know I'm not it's a new area for me, and this book which I've now written is even further away from anything I've ever done because it's fiction I've been trying to draw characters a bit as well, which is not something I do very much in journalism. I know the traditions between journalism and writing and drama, even poetry and prose are not part and

. I'm a sort of person who performs much better when I am really confident about something So when I do something new, I'm lacking in confidence so criticism matters a lot to me

Do you expect people to make special concessions because of the fact that you are Mark Tully — broadcaster? Do you secretly hope that they'll say,"Okay, old chap, that was a good try". Why should anybody be extra kind to you?

No, no, I don't think they should be kind to you. In fact it is actually no help for people to be kind to you because then you don't learn and sometimes, you know, you get a bit fed up with compliments It's all ungrateful to say this, but it's a funny feeling, you're grateful to them in one way, but in another way, it makes you feel that what's it all about, what do they really think, or are they just being too polite or something like that, or do they think you're too demanding which is even worse: they think you're that sort of person that if you don't come up to Mark and tell him what you think of his broadcast or programme you hurt him or upset him I hope they don't think that

Do you think Indians are, on the whole, very polite people but they will go out of their way to compliment a person because culturally it's expected that you're nice to people, you don't tell them what you actually feel.

Not all Indian reviewers are kind to people which is right, they are doing their job But on the whole, Indians are the most kind and the most generous about what they say about what you've done, and very friendly, and amazingly anxious to meet you, in a nice way

But do you think you would have had the same sort of reception had you been, for example, a Black journalist from the UK?

Working here?

Working here. Don't you think a lot of it has to do with the Gora Saab complex that most of India still hangs on to, I wouldn't say suffers from, but certainly it's very evident..

Well, first of all I would say I am an Indian in a way, I was born in this country and my mother was born in Bangladesh, and my father spent 22 years of his working life here I'm on my sixth generation in Calcutta, so in some ways India is a multi-racial society, you know, and there are Englishmen who are Indians, so in some ways I think I'm not just any other Gora Saab, I think I have some Indian roots and things like that I also think that, you know, this 'gora' thing can be both ways People can get very angry if they think they are being taken for a ride by White people, that they are in some sense acting in a superi or manner or anything like that So I don't think it's entirely due to that I may be entirely wrong, but then things would be jolly bad!

Is it because, like a lot of your critics feel, you've gone native with a vengeance. I mean, you've become more desi than the desis themselves.

Well, you know what I said about that All right, let's take some things Why do you wear a kurta pyjama in daily life I like if possible, specially now that I've left daily news, at time in the day to have a bath and put on comfortable clothes and have a bottle of beer with my friends Now I'm not wearing Indian clothes because I feel when you are working it's stupid but I don't feel comfortable in this dress in this country I'm sure you'll agree Kurta

pyjamas are much more comfortable than trousers

Oh, by far!

So, I don't do that to be desi I smoke Indian cigars because they are very cheap I don't mind drinking Indian whiskey because I've drunk it over the years I think actually it's something quite different, more a personal belief, and people appreciate it is that you cannot run away from what you are You're a fool if you think that if you have a basic English background you can become totally Indian I can't become totally Indian I know that, and I have no desire to pretend to become totally Indian

Somewhere deep down, do you wish to be reborn as an Indian in your next life? Your sense of identification seems to be total. You've been made into an icon here. Do you think you would have had the same kind of a reception had you been based in, say, Glasgow?

I wouldn't know I mean, I have been shown this great generosity in India I absolutely agree with that I suppose in part it is to do with my being a foreigner In part also as I always say it is because I broadcast on the BBC and BBC is so widely listened to And in part I hope it is because I have managed to fit in with the country And I've said this many times before, that one of the things that I've learnt in India is to have a great respect for Karma I believe that you are what you are In some ways, your life makes itself The wisest way to live your life is to follow your Now, I've known that I am very English in many ways I went to an English public school, I was in the British army for two years, I went to Cambridge, and there could hardly a more English university, I have lots of British friends and all the rest of it So, I've known that I cannot change my Karma

There is no debate about your competence in what you've been doing for all these many years. But the kind of celebrity status or hero worship that you've encountered in India, whether it was your association with the BBC or your own personality, or the fact that Mark Tully changed the voice of the BBC — would you have had the same success rate, the same kind of adoration and adulation had you been posted in your own environment, Australia, for example?

I don't agree with that, I don't think, I don't think I've had adulation and adoration I think I'm quite well known and, touchwood very hard, I'm reasonably popular at the moment, but you know the saying, beware when all men speak well of you You know, in England there are television reporters and broadcasters who are extremely well known and extremely well liked They are opening bazaars and opening shops and giving after dinner speeches and the rest of it So, you know, you can get well known but it's certainly true of me that it's India which has made me and I've said that publicly many times

I was in London a month or so ago, and I was at the BBC studios. The impression I got was that you're dead meat now. You're bad news as far as the BBC is concerned. They really don't want to talk about you very much or go into what happened. I know that you have spoken about what went wrong, but after such a long association, do you think it's like hacking off your own toes with an axe that you let drop from your hand?

Well, first of all let me say that I am actually more in the BBC now, in some ways, than I was before Now I have a regular Sunday morning programme on BBC Radio Four and I'm making four films for BBC One on the lives of Jesus, and I've just completed a radio documentary on Guru Gobind Singh, and I'm doing another one on Calcutta So, I don't think that I'm absolutely dead meat, as you say But I do know that some people were and are very angry about with what I said about BBC But this is rather light when I said people were angry about my book, I was not upset What would have upset me when I made that kind of, as it became well known as my famous speech, what would have upset me is if nobody had bothered That's would have upset me! That was my nightmare actually People would say, you know, it was a three-month process when I would wake up at night and sometimes think supposing it all falls flat on its face I still think, and I thought, that what I had to say was important I knew it would annoy some people

So when you stuck your neck out, you were prepared for the bad blood that it created.

Absolutely

Was it important enough for you to say it irrespective of the consequences?

I would just like to give you the background quickly to this What had happened was, there were these major changes taking place in BBC, which many of us felt were being done too hurriedly, without enough consideration for BBC's tradition, and background and particularly not without enough concern to protect radio from being swamped by television There was a controversy about the director general's tax situation as well Five very senior journalists wrote a letter to the Times, I think it was, saying that they totally supported the reforms, they totally supported the director general, and these people who were against them did not have the guts to stand up, didn't have the courage to stand up in public, but were leaking stories to the press So I had been asked that year to give what is called the Radio Academy lecture, which is quite a prestigious thing So I had a platform to stand on So I said, well, I am one of those people who have some grievance about what was happening, and I do not see why we should be insulted and called cowards by these people Had I not had that platform I wouldn't have done anything because no one would have known So, anyway, it was Karma, it was fate working that put me there, you know

But don't you think that in the long run, your career opportunities got restricted because of your taking a stand.

I don't mind so, Shobha, at all It sounds sort of grandiose, but I feel that I was put in a position to do something, I had to do it If there was no price to pay for it, in some ways it was not worth saying, not worth doing Certainly there was this hostility generated by it, if people didn't get angry about it, it's not worth doing I actually am very very surprised, in a sense, and very pleased, that I am still doing so much work for BBC It's the other way round

What do you feel about Indian journalists who are jumping into the television medium feet first, everybody seems to be hosting a show or a panel discussion or anchoring news programmes. Television is the flavour of the decade. we all know that. But it is a very, very cruel medium as well. And I think a lot of people are being shown up, warts and all. And not everybody can make that crossover successfully. What do you think of this whole trend in print journalism, where an exodus is taking place?

I think there is a complete misunderstanding in India People seem to think that television kills other media Television has not killed print media in Britain or America or anywhere else, and the print media have a very different and very important role to play, in that they are much more detailed, in many ways you need much more talent and skill to get into print journalism. You have got to write that much hard, you've got to have much more material, investigate your story much more deeply In the same way that television has not killed radio , although in this country some people seem to think that television automatically kills radio In Britain it is radio which is an expanding market, not television So I think part of this lemming-like rush towards TV is because these people think that this is the only, this is the medium of the future

Do you think this is a panic reaction? Do they think it's all over for print journalism?

In part, I'm not sure

Or is it the glamour, the fame, the money...

Yes, there is glamour, the fame, the money, perhaps the reaction that this is the medium that we've got to get into Also, the fact that suddenly television has opened up here. I think what you will find is viewers will be making their own judgments and some journalists will discover that they are not very good at television. So they will move out of it, and out of all this, and some people will emerge as new stars

Do you want to rate a few of them?

No, no, no, I don't want to rate anyone!

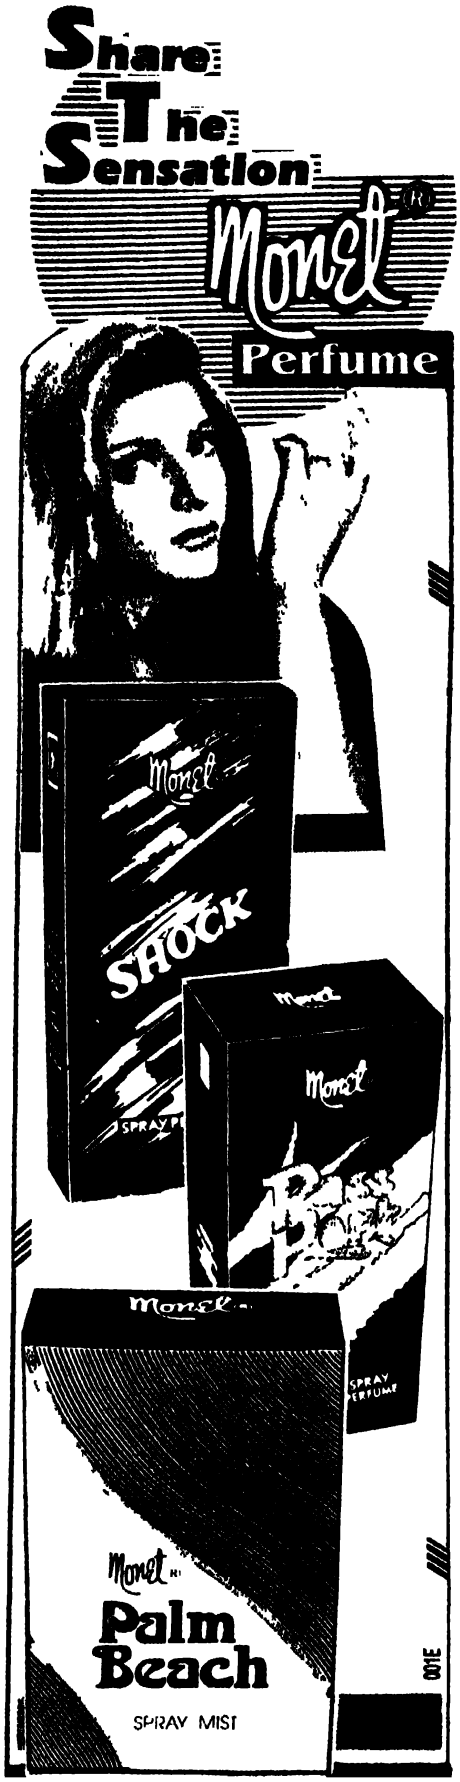
That would have been nice.

I would say one thing that two people whom I enjoyed watching those were the two I enjoyed the most, let's say

Yes, I think they're probably the best, anyway.

I wouldn't say that

You don't say it, I'm saying it! (Laughs)



That's okay!

Do you feel that the average upper middleclass Indian has a feeling that somehow you're more Indian than that person, because that person is obsessive about Western pretentions? That seems to come through in your writing.

I certainly don't think I am more Indian than they are I think it would be very stupid to say that I've said I cannot be Tully Singh?

Tully Singh or anything like that, you know. But I do dislike intensely so much that is happening in the West, I should say, it's a passionate concern that the same sort of thing should not happen in India And I find it very sad when you talk about Indian culture and that sort of thing, they say you're BJP I mean, I'm not BJP, I'm not Congress I've a lot of quarrels with both of them But to simply put it as stupidly as that, if you speak about Indian culture, if you speak about the greatness of Hinduism, you get called BJP That is extremely narrow minded and

How do you feel about the political climate right now, particularly the emergence, if one can call it that, of Sonia Gandhi, how do you see that?

I've argued this with the leaders of all the parties that we are missing the fundamental trend The institutions of this country have been so undermined by lack of reform that whoever comes into power cannot do very much unless they come in with a determination to reform the institutions of this country, all the institutions of this country After all, if you are BJP or if you are Congress, you have the same police force, you have the same bureaucracy, you have the same courts .I may be done for contempt of court if I say this, but I honestly don't think the courts or judges can be very happy about the state of litigations, about what happens in Indian courts I know many many of my friends in the IAS are deeply unhappy, and in the IPS, about the state of the IPS and the IAS They are your tools and if you don't have tools in your hands, your hand is powerless In a sense, I think all this Sonia, Wonia, BJP, Congress, is all a lot of irrelevance

This will take an organised campaign to project her as a national leader. And to talk about saving the country, do you see any absurdity in the situation, what is her locus standi?

I might put it differently Her husband, whom I knew well enough and personally I was very fond of, was a politician in a way, was brought up in a political background He had a massive majority and was not able to make major changes This is the kind of politics here You call a new neta, and say, 'Naya neta aa gaya, woh humko bachayega It's not a question of that The neta cannot do anything about the tool in his hands And that is why I think it's one of the fundamental things that needs to be done

About Sonia...

You're trying to get me to say something rude about Sonia! (Laughs)

I was angling to get you to say something about her, umm!

My own view about Sonia Gandhi is this· Personally, I have not met Sonia Gandhi When I used to see Rajiv, Sonia was never there, she didn't seem to like the press I would say that anyone who thinks that they as one individual can save the country, and Sonia, I don't think that Sonia has ever said that she can save the country People are running around saying that she can save the country I don't think that one person can possibly save this country She could bring about improvements, but

No, but she is taking a higher and higher public profile, now she is addressing meetings, she has broken her sphinx-like silence, do you think that's a good move or a bad move? The sphinx speaks, as it were?

I would take a dispassionate view of it This is a democracy Anyone is entitled to stand for an election, anyone can go into politics, and I don't see why Sonia Gandhi should be robbed of the opportunity But I would add that if she goes into it, she will have to take the rough with the smooth, just like anyone else She knows her husband took a great deal of roughs as well as smooths

As far as the corruption angle of India goes, the Western media seems to be obsessed with the scams, and the big scandals, the economy, the black money, and so on. How different is it from the way things work in other countries?

I think there is no country which is without corruption I think that has to be accepted But I think there are certain features of Indian life as it now is and as it has developed since Independence which encourage a greater deal of corruption unfortunately And it is nothing to do with the natural temperament of Indians, or anything like that But there are factors, I would name just three or four, and number one, of course, is the fact that the very institutions are not functioning very well

Number two, the government is involved in far too many things And each time it is involved in something there are opportunities for corruption by politicians and by civil servants Number three, under the British Raj, there was corruption at the lower levels But at the top level, you had people who were so well paid and belonged to a sort of biradree, if you see what I mean, whereby if you are corrupt in that biradree, you are ashamed, you are put to disgrace So, at least at the very top you had a totally incorruptible person But you look at the situation today The other day, a retired brigadier said to me, and he wasn't a corrupt man at all, and he said to me, you know, I spent 35 years in the Indian Army, more than two thirds of this away from my family, and I have a pension of four thousand rupees If I were paid at that sort of level and had to try and live a middleclass life in India, I'm sure I would be corrupt I think the marvel in some ways is that there are many honest people around, I think that's a marvel

Isn't* that a marvel! Oh, dear!

Because, you see, honestly, you look at it, you know what it costs to lead a middleclass life in this country Anyone who joins the IAS or the IPS comes from, or legitimately has aspirations to educate their children well, to dress well, to have the money to mix with other members of the middle class, and that's a legitimate aspiration And they are not paid the sort of money that will enable them to do it And their pensions are appalling!

Why is the media in Britain fixated on the sex lives of their politicians? I mean, if the Indian media were to start running stories about the sex lives of our ministers and Prime Minister, and so on, we wouldn't have a Cabinet left, would we?

You are, perhaps, more of an expert on this subject than I am! Actually, I think you're right Personally, I found this peculiar and strange situation happening in the West On the one hand, everything in terms of sexuality is enormously open When I was a boy in a British public school, my brother was sacked from the school just for going out with a girl There was no evidence that he had even kissed her, but the fact that he went out with a girl, he was sacked Now, everything has become enormously more liberal in the West We are meant to treat relations between women and men much more openly Yet, on the other hand, there seems to be this hypocritical morality that says that politicians shouldn't have affairs Why shouldn't politicians have affairs? It's up to them.

Just across the Channel, a politician who doesn't have an affair, someone in France, for example, would be considered a weirdo, an abnormal person if he didn't have a mistress on the side

This is the point I'm not saying that in Britain you are considered a weirdo if you don't have affairs But the number of broken marriages

In France, you're considered a hero if you have a mistress...

Yes, yes I don't think the French attitude is necessarily right But I do think there is a tremendous hypocrisy in the British attitude, particularly towards their politicians and their sex lives I mean, we journalists are no one to point a finger at anyone

But we do all the time, and they are all front page stories.

I know, and personally, I am one of the few journalists who believe that people do need some protection I happen to feel that if we don't want a monarchy in Britain, we should decide that in a rational and proper way Not by undermining the monarchy

But we do all the time, and they are all front page stories.

I know, and personally, I am one of the few journalists who believe that people do need some protection I happen to feel that if we don't want a monarchy in Britain, we should decide that in a rational and proper way Not by undermining the monarchy, by an obtrusive coverage of their private lives I admit that if you want to preserve the monarchy it would have been much better if Prince Charles had managed to go on living with Lady Di, and if Princess Anne hadn't been divorced, and all the rest of it I'm not saying monarchy is blameless, but I really do not think it is up to the press to destroy the monarchy and for us to haunt them this way

How do you rate the competence of the Indian press on the whole? Do you see falling standards, do you see sloppy reporting...indifference, people not thorough with their homework, what's the quality of their writing like?

I think on the whole India has a free press, it has a very large press, I think there are good and bad journalists I would say about the writing, and that is my personal view, that people try very often to be too clever in their writing Simple writing, specially in journalism, works much better I find when you meet the Hindi press their sentences seem to go on and on forever I'm not brilliant in Hindi, but I feel that people who are even good at it sometimes find it difficult to understand I'll say two things Number one, is that I think that it is a pity that there seems to be an increasing tendency for the management and proprietors to interfere in the editorial processes Big powerful editors like Girilal Jain, Frank Moraes, would find it much harder to survive today That's a great pity That seems to be a universal truth The other thing is, people should look at their copy and say, have I tried to be too clever here?

Could you give some example of someone who writes in this particular way?

I couldn't And that would be unfair

Are there any columnists who you like? Who you think don't write in a clever way, but who are accessible, whose writing you have enjoyed over a period of time?

Yes There are people The editor of The Times of India

Padgaonkar?

No, before Girilal Jain Who used to do these columns on books

Sham Lal?

Sham Lal, Sham Lal I love Sham Lal's columns I think that K Subramanian writes with great feeling and fervour about nuclear matters I like Swaminomics, there's a point of view and nicely written I always enjoy Khushwant's column, I must say! I like the way he deliberately insults people

What about Mani Shankar Aiyar?

Mani actually, I do enjoy Mani, he goes over the top completely sometimes But in a rather enjoyable way

You enjoy it then?

I enjoy it in a way But I certainly don't agree with his politics at all But Inder Malhotra's political columns are well informed And, well, Kuldip Nayar, who has a point of view

I think you've said some nice things about everybody, actually. You've covered them all All the Delhi columnists are covered! (Laughs)

I don't really feel nasty

There's nobody who sends you up a wall, nobody who drives you nuts, crazy, you can't ignore the person and you read the person, but you can't bear what the person is saying, that kind of thing?

There are lots and lots of columns which I start to read but just can't go on reading that turgid stuff That happens a lot of times, but I wouldn't say that there's a regular columnist who does that because on the whole I think it's a market situation that if the guy is that bad

There's no one who gives you fever? Someone who makes you say, Oh, God! I want to go and strangle that person?

No, not like that, really I don't think I would like to think of that really

There are some foreign correspondents who are based in India, in and out of Delhi A lot of them, I find, take the easy way out, they are sloppy, they don't do their homework, their writing is often very careless, and the BBC has been accused of that often enough, in the last few months at any rate But they seem to get away with it because we are overawed at the thought that Oh, New York Times, Oh, BBC, Oh, Sunday Times, Oh, Telegraph, you know? But I don't think their work is necessarily better than some of our worst work. A lot of times this arrogance and lack of attention to detail is obvious. Maybe they feel it's not important enough, maybe they would be more on their toes in a place like Germany but this is the Third World and they get away with it. Or am I being paranoid?

I think, first of all, India is unduly paranoid about the foreign press You go to Parliament and hear MPs saying BBC is the foreign hand that is destabilising India I've said time and time again that it is that MP who is insulting India Because he is saying that this country is so fragile that one despatch from the BBC is going to destablise the country
No, it's not that. That is something they politicise for their own purposes. But I'm talking as a member of the fraternity. A lot of the time I find thedespatchesextremelysloppyand — just careless
Let me just say this As far as the BBC goes, I would not presume to comment on the BBC since I left and it's changed a lot I don't want anyone to say I'm criticising individuals at all But I'll say this when I was in BBC, all right, it was a Third World country, but we have a huge audience in this country so we have an enormous feedback And we had in London, Indians, Pakistanis, Bangladeshis, working in the Eastern Service who went through every bit of copy that you wrote and therefore you were always under great and very close scrutiny I'm sure that still happens in the BBC I would also say that I know now three of our former foreign correspondents who settled in India, I'm not the only one There is a retired head of Reuter who is settled in India, there is another Reuter man, who when his turn comes, wants to come back to India because he is married to an Indian So, there are five foreign correspondents in India who care so much about this country and want to continue living here and have an association with it So you can't say that they are all
But it's only the disaster stories that make news.
Ah, but that's not the correspondent's fault, that is news
But who's filing those stories, I mean, there's never a positive story out of India.
No, no, I don't think that's true
Hardly ever, there is always a slant, there's always a...
There is a huge, almost a hype on the economic side, about how good India is on the economic side I mean, where would all these foreign businessmen be rushing to India without the foreign press telling them how good India is in economics?

That's a phenomenon in the last two years, but till then we've been accustomed to, you know, the worst kind of stories, the worst images, and it's not just national pride or sensitivity that makes me say so. I think people are just not interested, even the foreign correspondents are not interested, in other kinds of stories, they are too lazy and spoilt.
No, I don't think that's true at all I think it's something quite different

You have to look at news and what sells, in a sense, as news If you listen to BBC or watch BBC Television news, how many other stories will be about disasters? A large number you know This is one of the most Editors think that these are the stories people want, not just about India, about everywhere If you watch BBC Television news

It has become extremely boring, I can't watch it anymore.
I would personally feel, and again, I've said this many times, what is at fault is not the correspondents but news values
But who decides all this, in any case, they must be getting some feedback from their various correspondents.
It is merely the editors and the people sitting in London who decide that And the big bosses, the big wheels and the bigwigs
Is there something called objective journalism? Does it exist? How objective is objective?
I think it's a good question It's like saying, is there such a thing as truth? Let's take this interview as an example You are taping it, you are going to edit it
No, I'm going to send the tape tonight to Calcutta and it will be edited...
Well, someone will edit this tape Now, I could say, at the end of it, I don't think this is the truthful version of the tape You got the balance all wrong, you selected it all wrong You can say, I think I made Mark Tully look a fool

I haven't been able to, unfortunately! (Laughs) I'm trying very hard!
So, objectivity is, to some extent, in the beholder's eye
Say, you're filing a story...
Yes, you do try to be objective Again, there's something I have to say and that is, that everyone makes mistakes in every field of life Doctors make mistakes, and any journalist who thinks he's never made a mistake is a fool, or a liar

Tell me about the Delhi social scene, you're a part of it; is it all that it's cracked up to be?
I think, increasingly I am not being social I've been in Delhi so long and I have lots of friends, but I'm not into too much partying and dancing, I love drinking I like spending my evenings having a drink with my friends Last night, for instance, I went home, and had two friends, and we sat all evening and we drank and ate a lovely meal I'm not into dancing and I'm not, I would rather That's okay. How do you rate the Delhi women, the Delhi babes...? I've seen them at your place so don't tell me, I don't know who they are and I don't know who you are talking about!
Well, I love beautiful women, who doesn't? I think there are some very beautiful women in Delhi and who are socially high profile I'm not going to say who they are! And they are a pleasure to the eye, if that's not a sexist remark I'm sure it is, but I don't care Extremely charming and interesting to talk to What makes the Indian woman different? Something that sets her apart?
Yes, I think there is something that sets her apart. You may see this as racial, but it's the combination of the Asian and the European that is at its finest in the Indian woman Features-wise, or their minds, or what?

Oh, that's talking features-wise In mind terms, well, you know, I, I, know that, I mean there are many in Delhi that are very easy to talk to, they have a good sense of humour, very nice to be with, very charming You don't feel sometimes that I'm a man and she's a woman and there is some difficulty There are many ladies like this in Delhi as well as in Bombay
You have a very unusual domestic arrangement, which you've talked about. It seems to work very well for you.
I never talked about my domestic arrangement until I made that speech in London Then I knew that BBC would run a press campaign against me, and I knew if I was not open about my odd domestic arrangement they would turn this on to me and, therefore, I had to speak about it in public But these are not worth talking about, simply because it's my business and the two women involved And I think you can hurt people if you talk too much about these things In the same way as I think with someone who's married would necessarily want to talk in great detail about their marriage No life is without its ups and downs and its goods and bads I can't avoid it and it is in the public domain and I don't deny that it exists
Was that part of, to use a crude American expression, a cover-your-ass strategy when you decided to go public with that aspect of your life?
Yes, you could say I covered my ass!
How do you rate yourself as a journalist? You've been at it for more than 20 years now, 25?
I've had a lot of luck
...and, luck can take you only this far.
I had the privilege of working for BBC for so long That's an education for anyone And I think I have been lucky in one way that I tend to get on easily with people, they can talk to me, that is something that is important I regard myself as reasonably active and hard working journalist
Have any stories backfired on you, have you misused information inadvertently or...
The time I felt almost guilty was when we did a film on World Bank and Bangladesh, and I interviewed the head of the World Bank in Bangladesh for quite a long time, and we used a small bit only about corruption in Bangladesh. When I reflected on that I thought if I had been the head of the World Bank in Bangladesh and seen the film, I would have felt very let down
In the Indian context, someone like Amita Mallik, popularly called Amita Aunty in media circles: She gets too worked up about people's accents and she expects everybody in India should speak like Mark Tully or an approximation, at any rate. With a proper and pucca, British accent. Do you think that is the hallmark of good broadcasting?
Funnily enough, I think my accent is very unfashionable in Britain I think regional accents are much more fashionable The old public school accent, which mine is, is unfashionable there
But in India they seem to be obsessed with this. There are columns and columns devoted to mispronunciation, for example. Do you think so much of emphasis ought to be given, considering English is not our language? If the French can speak English and the Italians can speak English with an accent, and it's called very cute, and very sexy, what's wrong with an Indian accent?

I absolutely agree with that, one hundred per cent I've argued on this with the BBC many times, I'm used to their bias against Indian accents And time and again I would say, look, we put a Frenchman on, and he goes, si, si, and ya, ya, and oui, oui and all that, and we say, aah, marvellous, sexy! You put an Indian on, and they say, Peter Sellers That's absurd and ridiculous and absolutely wrong I've fought against that very, very hard After all, if someone was to come to me and tell me, please don't speak Hindi with that atrocious accent, where would I be? I'm not very good at languages, I don't have a very good ear, so I speak Hindi like an Englishman But I try to improve, I am not saying I shouldn't try to get better But I would be very disappointed if I wasn't allowed to speak it because my accent was obviously not an Indian accent
Do you think you would have been as successful on television as you were on radio? There are different requirements and do you think you'd have met them?
I really don't know I've done television and still doing television All I can say is my first love is radio, I feel much more at home with the radio And because I feel more at home, I do it much better If someone was to say to me, you can only do radio or television, I would ask for radio everytime Radio is a much more intimate medium You can be much more yourself, I think, on radio This programme which I do for BBC Radio Four every Sunday morning, is a sort of chat show in the real sense, you really feel that you're talking to the individual listeners and you get letters back from them which shows that you are actually talking to them And I think you can be much more chatty and much more intimate on radio than on television
I was on the Simon Bates show, and it was a lot of fun, actually.
Yes, Simon Bates and John Dunn they are excellent interviews Lots of very good radio shows in Britain
What about the libel laws in Britain?
I think with libel laws the great difficulty is to draw a balance between effective libel laws and preserving justifiable, and I would use the word justifiable, freedom of the press Where is it right to say, beyond which the press cannot go That's a very very difficult thing to say But I have a feeling, and it is a very unpopular view with most journalists, but the line is drawn too much in favour of the press and not enough in favour of the public
You spend a lot of time in Calcutta.
Some time, some time Not a huge amount Because I'm a director of this company which is run by a friend of mine who left the BBC and joined us, called Dipankar Ghosh I don't know why people think I live in Calcutta, or I live in Lucknow, or I have bought a haveli somewhere How wonderful! You haven't?
No, I still live in the same flat as I did before I sometimes say that the BBC left 1, Nizamuddin, I haven't
When you go to Calcutta, don't you find it is a city which still clings to the Raj nostalgia, the hangover, the whole colonial thing sits over that city?

It does in a way, I love the trams in Calcutta I would stay in the Bengal Club when I go to Calcutta
You can't get more Burra Saab than that.
That's very funny I believe, and I've written this, that colonialism was extremely bad for India And yet, I was brought up in the Raj, in Calcutta, and my father had this great honour of being elected to the Bengal Club Only Burra Saabs were members of the Bengal Club in those days Despite the fact that I don't think the Raj was right for India, I do love, in some ways, the relics of the Raj I am a relic of the Raj myself!
Have you been reading some of the new writing out of India in English, the quality of writing, what do you make of it?
I think there are some brilliant Indian writers
And now with this book, do you see yourself as part of that lot, that movement?
I see myself as a jobbing journalist trying to write books, basically Some of these people are extremely talented writers I hope I have a certain talent in telling a story, I hope this book will make people read, and if they do, I think they will want to read them for the stories rather than for sparkling writing I am a journalist and I don't think I have joined the ranks of great writers or anything like that
You said it was 'faction' [fiction based on fact]. Are there a lot of recognisable people..
I hope not too recognisable
Delhi people or are there types?
Not many Delhi people These are basically what we did for research was to travel around in eastern UP, staying mainly in the small towns, and going into villages as well, meeting and talking to people One of the beauties about Indian, specially Indian villages, is that you just stay there and people talk to you willingly, openly, you just sit down and ask them anything So, these are stories which we have heard Not all of them are entirely true to the story because you want to make a better story to tell a story The people are disguised for obvious reasons, and sometimes one or two stories run into one, and one of them is really a fiction in my own mind, it's about an ikkawallah, an ikka in UP is a tonga, it's the sort of thoughts I would have if I were an ikkawallah, about this polluting transport, these scooters and things like that, putting me out of business
Written in his voice.
But it's me trying to imagine what an ikkawallah would feel like if this happened to him There is a little story in it as well We have been at pains to talk to lots of people and shown the stories to people who we think understand what we're writing about, and we've asked people if they think they are realistic
Your primary publishers are Penguin. You didn't think of selling it to, say, a British publisher first?
No, you see it is being jointly published by Penguin India and Penguin UK And what I believe in firmly is that if you have a good relationship with someone you don't want to go and look for another partner To me, it's nice to make money writing books, but I can honestly say that what matters more to me is to work with people whom you like I don't think they would, but supposing someone came along and offered £5,000 more than Penguin would give us, I don t think I would be interested, I know Penguin India, they have done so well, it would be a folly and ungenerous to go anywhere else
You emerge as far too nice a guy, there must be something...
I can tell you, I am not that nice
You have been very, very polite, cautious, careful, not one slip-up anywhere, you haven't said anything inadvertent or impolite about anybody.
Well, I can say impolite things about myself
That's not good copy, you know that!
Well, obviously, I have failed.
No, you haven't failed The only thing I would say is ...that you are just a terrfic guy!
I'm not a terrific guy! I'm a very boring, ordinary man I don't like people to be rude about me, so I don't try to be rude about other people Two things I would say are There are some people I dislike, and I have been very rude to them In my disagreements with the BBC, there have been some people whom I have come to dislike very deeply and very intensely And it has been a very unpleasant experience Because when you dislike people deeply, it actually harms you in a funny way, and this isn't being goody-goody or anything, it's just the truth of the matter It actually harms you more than them and you also run the danger of making an absolute fool of yourself So, I've tried to curb this tendency, but I can honestly say there were some people I hated in the controversy I had with the BBC
But you took these guys on. Were you even remotely aware of the possible fallout, it could cost you your job?
Oh, yes, of course!
So did you do it because you thought you were at the end of your run with the BBC anyway?
I did it because of the reason I explained earlier, because I felt that fate had put me in this position When some people say, you were very courageous, my answer was, I was not particularly courageous I had two years to go anyhow before I had to retire And if I had to go two years earlier, maybe they would take my pension, and what the hell, I didn't like the changes that were being made in London and I didn't like the people I was working for at all back in London, I didn't like their attitude
Do you feel a misfit being a Gora Saab in London now? Do you feel a non-entity, anonymous?
I don't feel a non-entity because if it's not boasting, I'm an entity in Britain What I like best in life is friends and friendship, and I have tons of friends, I love going to pubs and having three or four pints with them When I left BBC, so many people said to me, thank you for what you did But I don't care what the bosses say think I know, and I know it really well, that there are lots of people who are glad that someone spoke up at that time But you say, that people say that Mark Tully is dead meat I'm sure that's what some of the managers would like to say, I could name some of them Lots of people commission me, I have lots of friends over there and I'm working very happily in the midst of all I think I feel a dreadful sense of let-down
We've done The Heart of India. Are we going to do The Soul of India next?
This peculiar Hindu thing is happening to me I started life as a student of theology and intending to be a priest in the Church of England Now, I am making four films on the lives of Jesus and doing what you might call a religious programme every Sunday morning So, it all seems to have come full circle And I've always been very interested in religions I would love to work, with someone else perhaps, on a simple book on Hindus But I'll have to work with someone who knows the subject better than I do A good combination there because people who know a lot often become too complicated, so they need an idiot with them to make sure they explain themselves

INNER EYE ❑ Bejan Daruwalla

Aries

March 21 – April 20

Ganesha says, influences will be fully manifest this week You will have much to do with loans and funds, public trusts and money and the consequences should be pleasing A trip at short notice is very likely A dash of romance and laughter lends colour and fun

Taurus

April 21 –May 20

Time to reach out to people and places by publicity and journey Overwork will definitely tell upon your health There is a strong financial and family accent to the week, and you could augment your income or have a family get-together But there is also a chance of a separation

Gemini

May 21 –June 20

The moon's last quarter turns your attention to house and domestic matters Children and creativity give great delight The Mars-Uranus sextile fine placing favours job opportunities, joint finances and loans This will also continue right through November

Cancer

June 21 –July 20

The moon's last quarter in your sign galvanises your behaviour patterns, making you act, rather than merely react You will be mighty successful at it by December A little opposition will have to be faced Health of elders might cause concern Do the needful

July 21 –August 21

A nagging health factor could crop up, causing irritation and discomfort On the plus side, home shop or office could come in for their full share of attention You will most certainly meet interesting people and real characters to excite you You will communicate at all levels

Virgo

August 22—September 22

While friends and well wishers will certainly try to pull your chestnuts out of the fire for you, it is up to you to make every effort to forge ahead Those in journalism, research, TV, the big screen, medicine and psychiatry should do amazingly well

Libra

September 23– October 22

Mercury in your sign, according to Western astrology, has now become direct, giving you good news Those in sales, promotion of products and advertising show imagination and rare skill A good time to marry between now and December or get engaged or enter into a contract

Scorpio

October 23—November 22

It is your turn to call the shots, at least partially Mars and Venus help you to climb out of a hole Journey, ceremony and rare insights into the working of human nature will be yours Religious rites and a shift are possible for Scorpios Secret matters and relationships are likely

Sagittarius

November 23 December 20

A little bit of everything is the way it goes for you, and very probably, that is how it will suit you too Young people could do you a good turn Collaborations, ties, marriage, partnerships, gaiety and group activity will be the major highlights of the week You will be on an important journey now

December 21—January 19

Clashes and kisses for Capricornians A few moves will turn out right, a few, wrong It is absolutely certain that you will be meeting a lot of people and alliances and friendships are bound to happen For the eligible, November could well be marriage time

Aquarius

January 20—February 18

Ganesha says matters related to job, loans and pets take top priority It is certain that you are building steam This week, work and play will go hand in hand Beware of expenses though, they could really hit the roof Many of you are in for travel, communication and new commitments

Pisces

February 19—March 20

Many of you will be driven by boundless enthusiasm even though you might not be so ambitious by nature and inclination By November and December, you will reap the fine rewards of it, and therefore, renew the efforts you put in now Loans and joint finances will be released

B I R T H D A Y S

October 15: Moon-Venus trine gives you just that touch of dignity and class, which makes a difference between mediocrity and greatness, says Ganesha.

October 16: The moon's last quarter makes it a slightly difficult year in the sense of irritations and vexations and disturbing home conditions.

October 17: Moon-Mercury sextile means opportunities to advance in your chosen field of activity. This is a money year. Many of you will be fusing work and play.

October 18: Moon square Venus trine Jupiter means children, romance, hobbies, get-togethers and group activities. Be happy.

October 19: Mars conjunction can lead to world fame, riches, goodness and greatness. You will have money Friends and well-wishers stand by you.

October 20: The sun square Uranus does signify tensions and tribulations but the final result will decide your horoscope. Be ready for stress and the unexpected

October 21: Moon sextile Uranus-Neptune leads to organisational ability, imaginative brilliance and consequent success New work can be launched.

Owing to pressure on space, Gillian Wright and Ruskin Bond's columns could not be carried this week— Editor

The Barren Woman of BALRAMGAON

The water in the drain in front of the small temple of Shiva was normally a dismal muddy brown, but today it was a bright cheerful purple The dog stretched out on the temple platform had scarlet and yellow patches added to the brown and white the gods had given him The temple platform itself was stained with green and scarlet It was Holi in the village of Balramgaon The Yadavs who dominated the village had just finished singing a phaag, or special Holi song, in honour of Shiva and were now moving on to their next destination, the house of the primary school teacher

The men chattered excitedly to each other as they walked away One young man whose hair had been stained even blacker than usual said, "Now we've got to sing a phaag of Krishna, after all that's what Holi is about, Braj, the home of Lord Krishna "

Another wearing a cotton cap with 'Happy Holi' embroidered on it laughed and said, "Come on, yes, let's celebrate Krishna He stole the clothes of the milkmaids while they were bathing at Brindavan Let's celebrate that "

An old man with the yellow stain on his white beard did not approve of that remark Wagging his finger he said, "We Yadavs don't want anything like that on Holi We don't get drunk and run off into the fields with other men's women That's work for the Bhangis and Chamars "

"More's the pity," the young man replied

The ragged group walked on past empty houses with charpoys turned up on the verandahs No one was going to laze on them today Children wearing just tattered underpants, their faces smeared with an assortment of colours, ran about with plastic plungers fixed in bottles of noxious-looking coloured liquid and water pistols shaped like fishes, spraying anyone who did not manage to get out of their range Two old farmers hobbled along with the help of long bamboo staves Only the cows and sleek black buffaloes tethered in front of the houses were unmoved by the excitement of the festival

The school master's brick house plastered with pale brown mud stood in a small grove Two tall neem trees provided shade for a small courtyard Yellow oleanders were in flower, so were red cannas and purple bougainvillaea Holi was a season for flowers, specially red flowers that were used to make the colouring smeared everywhere The school master stood on the verandah to greet the phaag party He embraced each man three times saying, "Holi greetings," and then asked them to sit down Sweet pastries known as gujias and salty snacks were produced Cigarettes, bidis and matches were passed around on a metal tray The phaag party sat under the thatched eaves of the verandah They were divided into two groups Chote Lal Yadav, who had seen more than 80 Holis, put his hands on the shoulders of two men and lowered himself down gingerly Everyone looked towards him He raised his arm, pointed at the opposite group and started singing,

"My snake-lord is sleeping, Krishna, run away from here
My snake-lord's a killer, Krishna, go there and he will bite

My snake-lord is sleeping here
Sweet child, run from Kali's lair
Hah, hah, hah, hah!"

The refrain was taken up by the rest of his group, singing at the top of their voices to make themselves heard above the compulsive beat of the drums, the frenzied shaking of particularly loud tambourines, and the frenetic clashing of cymbals

BY MARK TULLY

Extracted from The Heart of India by Mark Tully; Viking [Penguin India]; Rs 300

Then the other group repeated the refrain, leaning forward and pointing agressively at their opponents to give the impression at least that they were singing even louder Chote Lal Yadav's jaw sagged as he sat, silently waiting for the chance to come back at them When it came he led his group in singing,

"Said child Krishna, go and wake him, it's him I've come to nail
I am going to kill your snake-lord, and play within his lair"

When the first song was over, Ram Lakhan Yadav, a man of about 30 who had been sitting at the back, taking no part in the phaag, rose and picked his way through the singers towards the gap between the two groups where the percussionists were sitting He was carrying a pair of cymbals

Chote l al Yadav said, "Arre bhai, sit down, we don't need any more cymbals, two is quite enough If you also come in now we won't be able to make ourselves heard above all the banging and clashing"

A young man said agressively, "Go away from here Ram Lakhan Holi is the season for cutting the crop and where is your crop? Don't you know how to plough? Something wrong with the seed? Didn't you water the field? What's the problem? People like you bring us bad luck We'll have poor crops this year if you play Holi with us Wait until your house produces some children before trying to play those cymbals"

Ram Lakhan pulled the young man to his feet and punched him in the face Before a full-scale fight could develop the singers were on their feet pinning back the arms of the two men Ram Lakhan was frog-marched off the verandah and given a parting kick to see him on his way

In the small inner courtyard of the house next to Ram Lakhan's his wife was standing against the wall watching women pressing the pastry for gujias into moulds, and frying papadums and kachoris A child darted to the pile of freshly cooked gujias and stuffed one into his mouth His young mother caught him up in her arms, hugged him and said, "What will we do if you go on like that The men will be very angry if there are not enough gujias for everyone who comes to the house today They will smack you if I tell them what the problem is"

There was a tussle going on in another corner between one of the brothers of the house and his younger sister-in-law She was trying to prevent him pouring a pot of coloured water over her, but she let go of the pot for one moment to prevent the border of her sari slipping off her head, and found herself drenched with yellow dye

Ram Lakhan's wife thought, "I have no brother-in-law to play Holi with, no children to hug I look like all those women here I've got the same gold nosepin, the same bangles, the same silver anklets, I wear the red sindoor of a married woman in my hair, but really I'm nothing like them because I have no children and there's no family in our house"

Rani and Sima, two of the younger wives of the family came over to her Rani asked, "Why don't you have any colour on your face or your sari? Doesn't anyone play Holi with you?"

Sima giggled and said, "Nobody plays Holi with a barren woman It brings bad luck"

Ram Lakhan's wife stared silently at the ground

Sima poked her in the ribs and asked, "Have you been sitting under our mango trees? They should be flowering now But they aren't, and people say that if a barren woman sits in a mango grove the trees won't flower"

Both laughed like the schoolchildren they still were really and Rani said, "Come on, we are wasting our time, her mouth is closed as tight as her womb"

Rani Lakhan's wife walked round the edge of the courtyard, her head turned towards the wall, until she reached the front door No one noticed her going. It was as if she had never come to play Holi with her neighbours

The Yadavs of Balramgaon paid calls on each other until late that night Ram Lakhan wondered whether he should call on the man who had insulted him It was said to be particularly important at Holi to go to the homes of people you were not on speaking terms with, but he couldn't face the possibility of another insult, so he stayed inside his room. When his wife came to the door and announced that food had been cooked he said, "How can I eat food when all day I have had to eat the insults of my own biradari? You eat, I'm not coming out."

Ram Lakhan's wife went back to the corner of the courtyard where she had her kitchen and tried to eat a little herself, but she too had no appetite She did not have the energy to wash the pans in which the vegetables had been cooked She just squatted against the wall, looking up at the cloudless night sky bright with the fullmoon and countless stars and thinking of her own noisy family home where a new child had always just arrived and her great grandparents seemed set to live for ever What a stark contrast to this silent lonely house where only she and Ram Lakhan lived The family she had married into had a tradition of dying young and Ram Lakhan had been an only child

The silence was broken by a shout from her husband's room "Come here you I want to talk to you"

She put her sari over her hair, stood up, walked slowly across the courtyard, and stood in the doorway. Her husband shouted, "Come," but did not get up He ordered her brusquely to squat on the floor at the end of the charpoy on which he was lying

Turning on his side and looking towards the wall Ram Lakhan said in a surly voice, "Because of you my Holi has been terrible Everyone else is joking about red colour for a woman's monthly blood, fertility, Krishna and the milkmaids, and I've had to eat insults about your infertility I've had to eat blows too, and I've been kicked up the backside They wouldn't even let me take part in phaag in case I brought bad luck on their crops"

His wife said, "Do you think mine has been any better? Do you think I haven't eaten insults? The youngest two wives next door, just children, they insulted me as though I was some old hag, some servant they could behave with as badly as they liked. Now I come home only to be insulted by you"

"What do you mean? It's my right to speak to you like that Now not only don't I get any respect in the village, I don't even get it at home. My own wife answers me back. Am I a man or just a pair of pyjamas? I am not going to endure another Holi like this one Either you produce a child this year or I will send you back home and take another woman "

Rani started to sob quietly, "Don't start crying again You always try that one and then you turn my mind, and I am lost This time I really mean it There must be something you can do "

"I'm crying because it's so sad We live much better than most others in this village You know how to speak to me so well at night, whereas other women tell me how rough their men are sometimes, but still it's no good because we can't produce children "

Ram Lakhan was still easily moved by his wife Perhaps because of their loneliness they had come very close together She was certainly not just a cook and housekeeper She still excited him too Her severe features dominated by a patrician nose appeared forbidding, but he knew the tenderness and then the lust which could overtake them As a child she had carried brass pots of water on her head every day Balancing them had given her a lithe hip movement which could still arouse Ram Lakhan when he watched her walking

He sat up, swung his feet over the end of the charpoy and started to undo her hair It flowed down her back — shining and black. He ran his fingers through it and said, "I don't want to lose you I know that you are much better than any other man's wife in this village I really do love you, but we can't go on like this Something has to be done "

His wife scrambled up onto the charpoy pulled him down beside her saying, "This is the only way to produce babies."

After making love the couple lay on their backs looking up at the fan wobbling hazardously on its stem as it stirred the warm night air. Rani said lazily, "I've heard that it's not always the woman who is infertile It can be the man, and then there are some medicines to help with that I have been to the family planning clinic and they say there is no reason why I can't have children Perhaps it would be a good idea if you went to see a doctor?"

"But you know there's nothing wrong with me I've just shown you again that there's no shortage of seed in me. The doctors don't know everything. It's obvious that it's you who are barren "

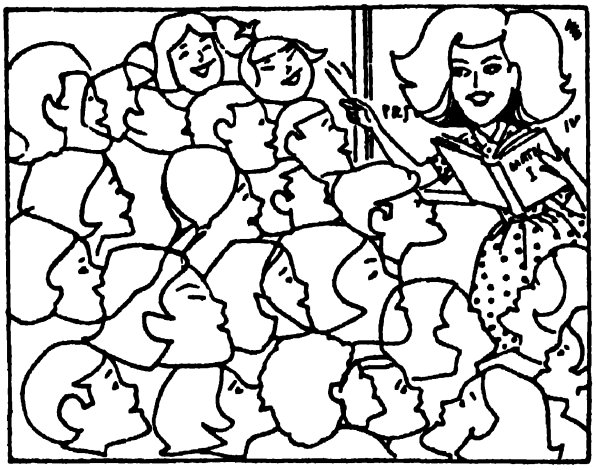
Rani, realising that there was no point in trying to persuade him any further turned on her side saying, "Well then, all that's left is praying to the gods for the gift of children."

The gods did not oblige, but the pressure on Ram Lakhan was relaxed The Pradhan didn't like quarrels among the Yadavs because they threatened to divide his biradari which was the source of his political strength Unless the Yadavs all voted together he would not be re-elected so he had called Ram Lakhan and Hoshiar Singh to his house He said to Ram Lakhan, "Fights sometimes happen in every biradari but why did you have to have a fight on Holi of all days?"

Ram Lakhan replied, "He insulted me He said I couldn't join the phaag because I was childless and that would bring bad luck on everyone He was obscene too, making lewd remarks about my not knowing how to sow my seed "

"Is that true?" the Pradhan asked Hoshiar Singh

"Well I only meant it as a joke Everyone makes jokes about that sort of thing in Holi There was no need for his brain to get so hot He should have been able to take it "



"No man should be asked to tolerate insults to his wife whether she is barren or not In the old days I would have called a meeting of the panchayat and asked them to impose hookah pani bund on you to teach you how to behave and what jokes are proper and what are not proper Now unfortunately the rules are softer If we are to hold the biradari together we can't be too strict I suggest that you apologise and let it be known in the village that you were in the wrong "

Hoshiar singh folded his hands and said, "All right Pradhanji, I have nothing against Ram Lakhan I don't know why I lost my head Perhaps it was the bhang I have to admit that I had drunk a glass and that was wrong too "

The Pradhan laughed and said, "All right, we will overlook that too this time Young men will be young men. Now embrace Ram Lakhan, and let's hear no more about it "

So Ram Lakhan's honour was restored and he was able to rejoin the group of Yadavs who had gathered at the Pradhan's house every evening to discuss everything from village gossip to national politics The elders still passed a hookah around, the younger men smoked bidis or cigarettes There was no liquor, the Pradhan strongly disapproved of that, because drinking also led to quarrels ■

HIGH HO! Thirty-six numbers from 1 to 6 are connected by diagonal lines, below. You are challenged to score the highest possible total among these numbers in keeping with the requirement that no two numbers added are on the same diagonal line.

That is, if you count 6, at top right, you may not use 4, diagonally below, or any other number on that diagonal.

Upon reaching your best total, let someone else try.

Score with 4 – Top row across, 5 Bottom 4 Bottom 3 Bottom row, plus 1 at top

CAN YOU TRUST YOUR EYES? There are at least six differences in drawing details between top and bottom panels. How quickly can you find them? Check answers with those below.

DIFFERENCES: 1. Bear is missing. 2. Neckline is lower. 3. Bottle is missing. 4. Picture is missing. 5. Chair is lower. 6. Spoon is missing.

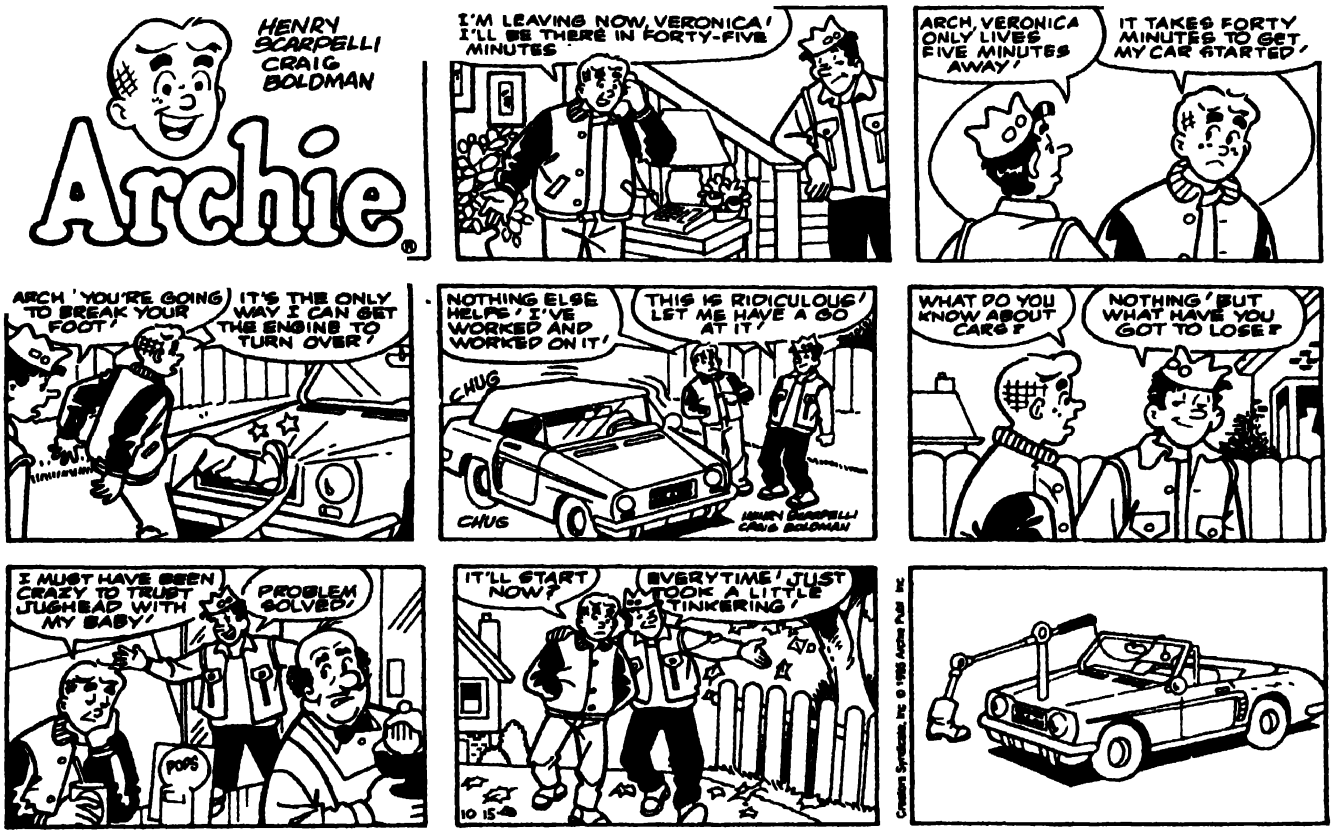
FUNSPOT

PICK PLAY! Climb that tree, pick those apples. Apply these colors neatly by number: 1—Red, 2—Lt. blue, 3—Yellow, 4—Lt. brown, 5—Flesh, 6—Lt. green, 7—Dk. brown, 8—Dk. green.

SPELLBINDER

SCORE 10 points for using all the letters in the word below to form two complete words.

ABSENTIA



THEN score 2 points each for all words of four letters or more found among the letters.

Try to score at least 50 points.

The Pavement Dweller

Resting his head
On a broken bit of brick
He lays his body down
On the grubby sidewalk,
The filth-coated skin
Scorns the dust-laden heat
Of summer
And winter sees him
Resplendent
In a tattered coat
Mended with a hundred patches
Daring to defy
The frighteningly frigid fingers
With a Buddha-like stoicism,
Living in demeaning depravity
He scorns
He defies
Rising to the stature
Of a human-superman
With me
And my window
As his witnesses

By the rolling sea I crouch, broken and petrified,
languishing in the sands of time, mocked and corroded by the marine wind

Mass of casurina invades me, and wounds my vanity
under the lunar deluge I close my eyes and look inwards.
Once I scaled the firmament high, with golden-hoofed
horses in flux and flight, when my meditating
god in his Apollonine grab, played the lyre to the cascading aria, playfully oblivious of the carousing couples chasing each other by my gilded

Now all is an illusion, all is rock of sombre gray
My god is fallen, his colours faded, and the lofty lovers but carven imagery, and me —
a broken spirit eternally condemned to human

Being a Woman

Being a woman means living with a gash in body and mind
the bodily one bleeds each month
the one in the mind continually at every violence to womankind
The bodily gash is a bloody gate
for every visitation of love or hate
they enter the same way foe or mate not love but woman should be blind
For, what is love
and what desire what is tenderness and what is fire
What cherishes, protects and holds and what destroys with passion cold
Does a man's organ know this or does his mind?

A woman only knows that somewhere he binds her
She cannot transcend the gash that defines her

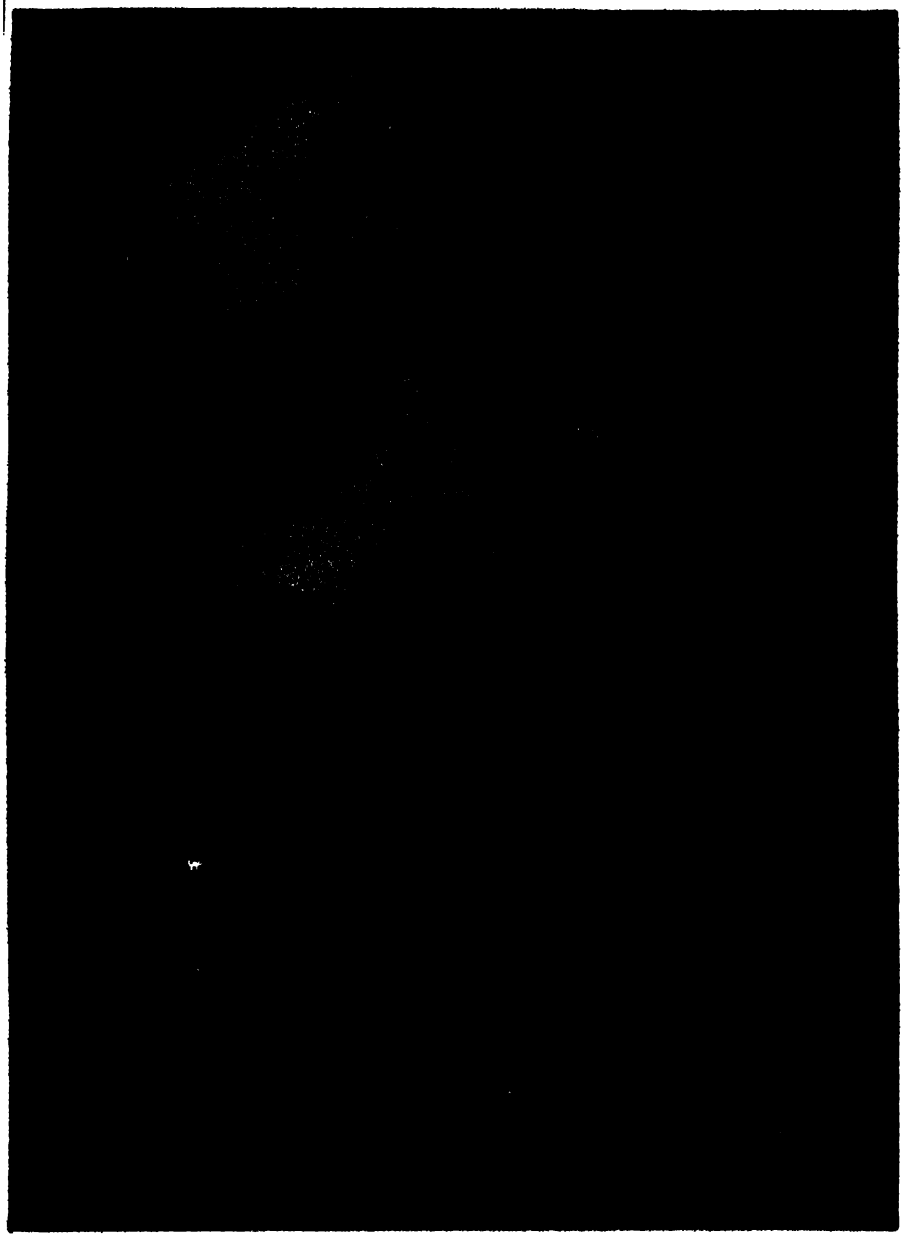
MAKING UP FOR LOST TIME

So what if she lost the Ford Supermodel title. India's Mehar Bhasin has bagged the Revlon ad, picking up from Claudia Schiffer and Cindy Crawford and how!

They are the supermodels of today — they who have launched a thousand new looks adding fame to the names they sell. With a little something else, they have what is presence.

Joining this elite club of supermodels is Mehar Bhasin — poised to become Revlon's first girl from India. She takes over from Claudia Schiffer, Veronica Webb and Cindy Crawford in the US, all three being the real upper crust of 'salesgirls'.

If the Miss India crown proved elusive for Mehar, she also missed the Ford Supermodel contest by a hair's breadth. And worse, her winning the Ford contest was supposed to be a walkover, actually, and she still had the title snatched from under her squiline nose.



The same nose has not upped everyone. Who cares about the pointless whim the 'Miss Beautiful Hair 1993' has the contract of a lifetime? And it's not for the nose or the hair only; it's for other basic features as well.

Modi-Revlon is more than willing to confer superstar status on her (a development over which she is absolutely "thrilled") judging by the number of top Indian models who had vied for the slot.

Mehar will [illegible] full range of [illegible] perfumes, [illegible] and haircare [illegible] in India.

PRITI MANKOTIA, Femina Miss India 1995 first runner-up, leaves for Sun City this week for the month long runup to the Miss World contest. Standing at 5'8" and still managing to look petite, this 20-year-old will soon be modelling her tresses in 'Sunsilk' advertisements. Completely devoid of an attitude that sits prettily on other models, her participation in the Miss India contest was "unplanned and just happened". Come November 18 and this monosyllabic queen will try to inherit the crown from Aishwarya Rai

The Art of Rekha

■ It is Bollywood's loss that it has not been able to exploit an actress as versatile as Rekha, trapping her in cliched roles like the other woman, the vamp, the tawaif or the sindoor bedecked obliging bahu ('Star Plus', September 10)

The directors who dared to cast her in offbeat films like Umrao Jaan, Khubsoorat, Jhooti and Utsav managed to glean impeccable performances from her

The so-called parallel cinema is also much to blame for not having made use of this star Relying on a handful of actresses like Shabana Azmi, Smita Patil, Deepti Naval and others who arguably best fit deglamorised roles, Rekha got ignored She was best admired as the hero's brainless plaything

It took Basu Bhattacharya, Mira Nair and a couple of other directors to prove she is just not a star, she is an actress, too
Manoj Kumar Jain,
Shyamnagar (W B)

■ Each has his own way of expressing his thoughts Basu Bhattacharya loves to go back to the same old story of a man-woman relationship And Mani Ratnam likes to play up current problems on celluloid The latter earns the wrath of a section of cinegoers who blast his residence Let us see how the audience receives this bold theme of Basu Bhattacharya Sourav Ghosh Chowdhury,
Calcutta

Rekha: Rediscovered

■ Rekha is, perhaps, Bollywood's first actress to preach what fitness is all about a la Jane Fonda It is remarkable how this obese actress managed to slim and trim herself with her famous workouts
Sunil Banerjee,
Kankurgachi (W B)

■ The cover story left readers unsatiated We turned the pages to read more on Rekha, but there was nothing more Vinay Asawa,
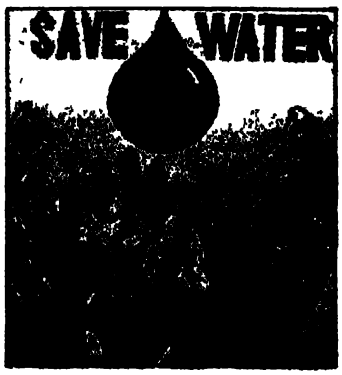
Calcutta

■ Rekha, even in her forties, can give the new bare-all, dare-all brigade of tinsel town nymphets a run for their money No can ever beat her She is fabulous
Arta Mishra,
Cuttack

■ Aastha is sure going to create ripples for it deals with a subject which never fails to arouse human interest
Shome Mukherjee,
Calcutta



■ In your list of other films dealing with man-woman relationship, you missed Satyajit Ray's Piku which depicted an upper-middle class housewife's infidelity

Without breaking social and family bonds, the lady just fell apart from her family, from within This was very aesthetically portrayed as black colour spread across Piku's sketch pad

The bold scenes caused many eyebrows to be raised as they shocked middle-class morality, but cinema is also a reflection of contemporary society
Samrat Datta,
Champahati (W B)

The Greening of Tourism

A logo at a hotel announces its commitment to the cause of the environment

Recent economic policies may spell boomtime for the Indian tourism industry, but also ominously point to immense environmental destruction.
Seema Paul says the only way out is eco-tourism*

THIS IS A TRUE STORY AND OMINOUS FOR THE TOURISM INDUSTRY IN India. It happened in Goa, one of the most sought-after destinations for foreign tourists arriving in India for nearly two decades now.

Goans have long bemoaned the proliferation of prostitution as a result of tourism, but even they were not prepared for the shock that awaited them.

A man who assumed different identities, but was popularly known as a priest and called 'Father John', was found to be running a child prostitution ring. A large number of photographs of nude girls and boys were recovered from him and he admitted supplying these little children to foreign tourists. Though he was arrested and put behind bars, he procured bail soon enough Goan social activists are currently campaigning for his rearrest and sterner sentence.

This was just the tip of the iceberg as it became apparent when a few foreign nationals were arrested in a European capital a little later with similar pictures. Says Roland Martins of the Jagrut Goenkaranchi Fouz (Vigilant Goans Army), who has long protested against the promotion of unbridled tourism in his state "There are definite indications that international sex trade barons are eyeing Goa as their next target for sex tourism after Thailand."

Nearly everyone is familiar with the degradation that tourism has wrought on our once pristine hills Though by no means the only cause for the destruction of Himalayan ecology, the infrastructure erected by the tourism industry as well as the behaviour of tourists themselves have contributed to this scenario.

Whether it is Pahalgam, Gulmarg, Mussoorie, Shimla, Ooty or any other popular hill station, hotels have mushroomed without regard to the local ecology, architecture or even the carrying capacity of these towns. Hordes of tourists, who descended on them during summer months, placed huge pressures on their scarce local resources. Consequently, the areas witnessed rapid loss of greenery and proliferation of wastes.

However, as the majority of tourists were Indians, the cultural impact on the local populace was fortunately not too devastating.

But the search for mega-dollars in the wake of IMF loans and the World Bank-dictated reforms programme has generated a greater desire to woo the foreign tourist

Setting a target of five million visitors for 1997, the Government of India has given the tourism industry a number of concessions and incentives Not only has the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Act (MRTP) been lifted in relation to hotels, multinationals have now been allowed majority share holding (51 per cent) in Indian hotels, with full repatriation benefits

The 'no construction' limit on beach areas has also been reduced from 500 metres to 200 metres country-wide In addition, the open-skies policy being pursued by the government promises to ring in a new era of comfort and luxury travel for the foreign tourist

Pool luxury, while public taps run dry

Through all this, the real target is supposed to be the high-spending foreign tourist, also called the top-of-the-line tourist, who is expected to bring in mega-bucks and also supposedly cause less damage to the environment!

The incentives combined with the fast changing economic environment in the country has caused the trickle of foreign tourists to turn into a stream and this may soon become a flood and bring with it all the evils of a quick-fix culture

Evidence of tourism bringing in its trail prostitution has also come from Kerala, where massage parlours near the Kovalam beach are reported to be fast turning into dens of prostitution

The immediate reaction of the tourism industry to these charges would be to deny the link But as a Goan social activist, Fiona Dias, states this has happened rather insidiously Women, in fact, were the first to be targeted With jobs always in short supply in the state and with education levels among the highest in the country, many Goan women preferred to settle for low-paying hotel jobs as receptionists and housekeepers

Quite often they were kept on temporary posts, she states, and then offered the bait of a permanent job if they 'entertained' guests! The media projection of Goa by travel and tourism trade has also played a role and Fiona says, the impact has been so bad that whenever she comes to the North, she finds men knocking at her door after dark "When I confront them, they shamefacedly retort, 'but I thought you are from Goa!'"

Goa is not an isolated example of the cultural onslaught that uninhibited foreign tourism can have on India Pushkar in Rajasthan is fast turning into a haven for drug pedlars and so is Hampi in Karnataka, the capital of the Old Vijaynagar empire, down South

And this is only the beginning

To counter the emerging threat to children, the international campaign to End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism (ESCAT) has declared its intentions of starting a chapter in India by the year-end. But, as Martins states, a more concerted effort is required on the part of Indian government itself. Foreign tourists coming to India, he says, ought to be handed a list of do's and don'ts at the airport as most foreign countries have been doing for years And sexual mischief ought to be one of the prominent don'ts

The cultural impact of tourism can also take on other less dramatic, but as serious, forms as prostitution Although the revenue brought in by tourism can be used for the restoration of monuments and sanctuaries, in reality quite often the impact of tourism has been the reverse

Take the example of Taj Mahal, which is probably the top tourist-spinner for the country

Almost 10,000 tourists crowd the mausoleum every Friday and 7,500 on weekdays and the effect on the atmosphere has often been cited as one of the probable causes for the monument's decay

There has also been talk of putting a limit on the number of people who should be allowed into the monument at any given time (the carrying capacity concept), but it has not come about, partly as a result of the travel trade's opposition to the idea

Similarly, the impact of the vibrations caused by aircraft during landings and takeoffs on the Khajuraho temples, a major tourist destination again, has been cause for concern, but the travel trade has not even paid lip service to it, forget doing something about it Says Shobita Punja, who was helping the Madhya Pradesh government in drafting a tourism policy some time ago, "The tourism industry must have earned so much out of the village of Khajuraho, but it has put back nothing into the area for the people's benefit It was after a great deal of coaxing that they spent money for building a toilet at the site "

There are several other serious social and ecological concerns related to increase in tourism, specially the five-star variety The travel trade and its proponents contend that foreign tourists bring in dollars which add to the national revenue Besides, in their opinion, increased tourism results in the creation of important infrastructure for the people

Both are without doubt true, but the question that needs to be asked here is. Who receives the money?

In the case of Khajuraho, for example, Punja points out, the village has six five-star hotels and a golf course, but for the people there is neither a hospital nor a high school!

The only infrastructure that tourism created was a road, which it needed for its own survival.

International tourism in any case suffers from the inherent problem that most of the holiday costs for destinations are paid in advance to the airlines and to hotel chain owners, none of whom may be Indian. Although no study has been done for India, the South Pacific People's Foundation of Canada in 1987 estimated that of the money generated by tourism in the Pacific Islands, only 25 to 30 per cent stayed in the islands The rest went to the multinational companies which owned and controlled the industry

Although a large portion of tourism in India was hitherto locally controlled, there is an increasing trend of five-star hotels seeking foreign tie-ups and partnerships The foreign partners are allowed to take 51 per cent of the profits outside the country

Goa: The foreign hand

An upcoming beach resort in Kunkeshwar, Maharashtra

Even for the limited money that does come into India from the travel trade, the question once again needs to be asked is. Who benefits? While the local people may often be displaced when land has to be acquired to build a five-star hotel or a golf course, as has happened time and again in Goa, the jobs that are created hardly ever go to the locals

Take the example of five-star hotels in any place outside the metros and big cities One finds that those in top jobs are not the locals In fact, it is mostly menial jobs or those like waiters that fall in their share.

While it is true locals do not have the required qualifications or skills for top positions, this brings little solace to the people who had to give away their land resource and endowments like fresh water, natural greenery and white sand that go with it for the hotels, casinos and golf courses

Many, on the other hand, believe that it matters little who get the jobs as long as the total cake of jobs is increasing This argument fits in well with the trickle-down economic model that the country is pursuing, but which, even the renowned votary of reforms, Nani Palkhivala, concedes, has so far not been able to improve the plight of the poor.

What is needed in its place is a bottoms-up approach, where policies attempt to meet the needs of the poorest people first!

It is along this concept that the tourism model also needs to change, so that the poor get a stake in its proposed growth, rather than being asked to make sacrifices for it The way to do it, suggests well-known Bombay-based environmentalist, Bittu Sahgal, could be to devise moderately priced structures instead of five-star hotels, where locals can be readily absorbed after short training

As a ministry of environment appointed committee for devising wildlife tourism guidelines, of which Sahgal was a member, stated in its report in 1994, "It would be self-defeating to try and compete with, or out-do, industrial nations by offering 'plastic' and sanitised five-star luxuries to their citizens Not merely will we damage our environment, but we will almost certainly lose what little respect we still enjoy in the world community for caring so little about our own heritage"

Besides the fact that five-star hotels hardly ever employ locals, there are several other reasons why environmentalists distavour them As Normal Alvarez of the Goa Foundation states, "Five-star hotels look beautiful to many people If all the resources of a family are lavished on a single daughter to the exclusion of others, she may look beautiful indeed But this is only because the rest have to appear in tatters Behind every five-star resort are tales of injustice, often to the community at large"

In a place like Goa where fresh water is a very scarce commodity, often huge quantities of water are diverted to five-stars for general washing, swimming pools and air conditioning equipment, and to nurture green lawns and ornamental and exotic trees which are inappropriate to the sandy stretches As a result, people in villages have often to contend with a trickle in their public taps

At the same time, five-star resorts have attempted by every conceivable means to prevent public access to the beaches "The local inhabitants," said Alvarez, "have always considered beaches part of their environment and commons. Effective common area includes the trees and vegetation upto 200 metres people on picnics usually retire to these areas once the sandy stretch is too hot for walking Five-star hotels, however, have time and again raised barb wire fencing and kept security guards to dissuade ordinary villagers from moving around the area "

The example of Thailand is available close at hand to prove what uninhibited tourism can bring in its trail Not only has tourism there become synonymous with sex industry, the beaches have become unclean and unattractive and in places like Bangkok, one gets a strong feeling that a whole culture and heritage has been reduced to a mere appendage of the tourism industry, rather than being a living and vibrant entity

Five-star luxury at the foot of the hills

ITDC's Kovalam Ashok Beach Resort

Of course, all this has not happened in isolation -- probably it never does — and it was an entire package of economic liberalisation and foreign influences that brought this about But tourism played a definite role in it

Partly as a result of the recognition of the failings of the traditional tourism industry, the votaries for reform have coined a new catch phrase eco-tourism

According to the London-based Panos Institute, "In its purest sense, eco-tourism is an industry which claims to make a low impact on the environment and local culture, while helping to create jobs, and conserving wildlife and vegetation It claims to be responsible tourism which is ecologically and culturally sensitive "

Of course, eco-tourism is as much open to abuse, and worldwide experience shows that traditional tourism often tries to camouflage itself under the garb of eco-tourism

In Costa Rica, the haven for nature lovers, developers were swift in taking advantage of the fashionable terminology to build resorts only with the aim of filling their own coffers! .

But if India can conceive policies that would try to seriously implement eco-tourism in its truest sense, the people, the government and the environment can all be the beneficiaries

Eco-tourism does not only require that we replace the emphasis on five-star tourism with small scale and sometimes family businesses, facilities and infrastructure that are simpler and less expensive than those of mass tourism We also have to give up policies that woo tourists who are not coming to India for a different cultural experience, but to enjoy all the comforts they can get at home in an ethnic setting

It would mean saying 'no' to casinos which can have a negative social and cultural impact as well as to golf courses that are known to be extremely damaging to the environment

It would mean saying 'yes' to the genuine nature-loving tourist — one who wishes to see India's heritage sites, which would again include restricted sight-seeing to preserve them Thus the key words governing healthy tourism or eco-tourism would be caution and greater caution

Tourism has come in for a lot of flak, but it can actually be a positive force in supporting the environment, argues Samita Bhatia

Some months ago, a group of mountain lovers got into a bitter fight over a picturesque and untouched hill spot One lot insisted that a place as beautiful as that little village in Himachal Pradesh ought to remain a secret shared only by an environment-friendly few The other half held that if there were not enough people to appreciate it, the breath-taking beauty of the locale might as well not be there

The heated discussion captures the essence of a debate that shows few signs of petering out On the one side of the divide are those who feel that ecology takes precedence over tourism And on the other side are those who are convinced that tourism is as important and that ecology can always be its end-product

That tourism is an industry that can easily form the backbone of a country's economy cannot be denied Investment decisions of international governments and private enterprises are today inclined towards shovelling billions of dollars into tourist and transport facilities, building hotels and airports, sprucing up infrastructure — all to lure the well-heeled outsider

In the Indian scenario, too, government funds towards tourism enhancement plans include the development of infrastructural facilities such as improvement of roads and landscaping, construction of visitors' centres, library-cum-museums, conversion of otherwise neglected properties into heritage hotels, improving telecommunications, water supply and electrification facilities, and above all, the development of the souvenir industry

As India continues in its efforts of tourism promotion, overall development will get a boost and the industry will be looked upon as a means to create new sources of wealth

As the ripples of the travel boom widen, the search for new destinations will lead to the opening up and the 'development' of the off-the-beaten-track destinations Which will, in turn, see the mushrooming of hotels and the creation of a huge ancillary requirement A new flight into this very destination will generate hundreds of jobs for the local population

According to Ashok Pahwa, director general, tourism, GOI, the job co-efficient in the tourism sector is much higher than many other sectors of the economy The 1992-93 GOI estimates project that for every million rupees of investment in the tourism sector, as many as 52 people get employment Says Pahwa, "The latest economic indicators too continue to suggest high returns from tourism For every Rs 1 million invested in the hotel sector, 89 jobs are generated in the hotel segment along with another 47 in tourism related fields "

Obviously, an investment in the tourism industry leads to the creation of demand for other goods and services resulting in increased production and employment opportunities in other sectors

In the transport sector, communications, air services, handicraft and handloom, construction and manufacturing are the natural fall-out Obviously, the multiplier effect of job creation in the tourism sector is very high

The need of the hour is, admittedly, a labour-intensive and employment-oriented strategy which can tackle both urban and rural unemployment A strategy that involves a fuller utilisation of available resources, promoting rural industrialisation through industries that can flourish in rural areas In this context, the tourism industry assumes significance as it can flourish in rural areas utilising local resources and manpower

And tourism proves, yet again, to be the quickest earner of revenue with fast returns on investment

Tourism is also being looked upon globally as a powerful engine of prosperity A dollar of tourist revenue at home, after all, is worth the same as a dollar from products sold abroad, as tourism industry observers point out It is very easy export, they say and one where the market comes to you

But the environmentalist lobbies of the country beg to differ — and how! "As a country, are we in a position to determine whether the impact of an additional beach resort could be any worse than the impact of an additional dam or factory?

"When on the one hand we are setting up pharmaceuticals, fertiliser and power projects without even beginning to assess the environmental hazards they may unleash, why look upon tourism development as the unnecessary evil?" asks G Raveendran, deputy director general, tourism, GOI

He further argues " Is there any industry in the world that doesn't pollute our environment or ecology? There is a definite effect of industries and the chemicals they spew into the environment Tourism is the least of the pollutants "

Industry observers comment that smaller industrial projects are not considered as high-profile as a beach resort to be set up For example, by the Hilton group in Goa While the former roll in — environmental hazards and all — the latter comes at the receiving end of opposition from the environmentalists' lobby

According to Hans J Bredt, general manager, The Leela Beach, Goa, though the property employs 900 locals, he has, however, met a stumbling block in the general laid-back attitude that the Goans revel in

Besides providing employment, hotels have proved to be the supporter of the local handicraft, folk arts and culture of the state What some might label as 'fads' are actually geared towards the support of the local handicraft of the region and in showcasing them to international travellers

Premier hotels in the states have bangle sellers, puppeteers, mehndi-walis and other craftspersons marking their presence in the hotels while local handicraft are exhibited in their lobbies and dancers thread their way in between tables at their speciality restaurants

"A lot of work that is currently going on on the environmental front is feeding the real lack of real understanding that currently exists in India on environmental topics," says Raveendran "While the criticism may be true to an extent it is also totally false "

Industry observers concur that in the Indian scenario tourism must have an environmental face, for the country cannot run headlong into revenue generation without considering the impact on the ecology "But an expansion and growth in tourism is certainly possible in a responsible manner that to the best extent reduces the impact on the environment," says Kavin Sethi, director, corporate communications, Asia Pacific, Lufthansa The German aircarrier is known worldwide for its adherence to environmental concerns

On the one hand, one drives through the metros with their fair share of garbage dumps, sewage and atmospheric pollution and then wonders why there has been no concerted effort to preserve and even beautify the surroundings "On the other hand, if we can earn some foreign exchange for the country by setting up responsible projects — and there are responsible projects around the world — then why not?" Sethi counters

He cites the classic example of Sri Lanka and Seychelles where tourism and the growth of tourism has peacefully co-existed with the environmental needs of the destination

'Greening tourism' is, admittedly, even today a relatively new phenomenon worldwide, so it is only natural that India is only just catching on So far, greening is being confined largely to a few, more aware hotel chains that are going whole hog on recycling of waste, evolving environment programmes and promoting energy conservation

The larger issue of spoiling the environment is 'destination management' which is not so much to do with individual players in the game Hotel chains like the Taj, the Oberois or Welcomgroup are not into destination management as yet The individuals are not looking after Goa, Jodhpur or Agra per se, which is essentially a state subject "In some destinations some unscrupulous individuals may get into an unholy nexus with the town planners and have, perhaps, been known to go on a rampage on the landscape Take the contour of a Mussoorie hill, for example Even local administrations are yet not fully alive to the needs of environment, for a larger world-view is yet to peter down to them," says Navin Berry, promoter, South Asia Travel & Tourism Exchange (SATTE), publisher and industry observer for over two decades "A lot of the 'rape of the environment' is happening through default," Berry observes

And as this issue is coming alive, both among the entrepreneurs and within the government, a younger breed is stepping forward, more aware and alive to the needs of environment

Today, the Patnitop Development Authority, for example, is so rigid in its stance that even government organisations are not allowed to start construction in the Jammu resort Even locations for essential services like a telephone exchange are not available to the authorities The administration area of Kasauli in Himachal Pradesh is another example where the Army has achieved marvels in the cantonment area

The administration today is very alive to the needs of the environment and that is the crux of the matter

Berry states, "If you have a more aware town planner, hotel or resort developer, tourism can be the single largest positive force in retaining our environment " The recent India launch of the magazine, Green Hotelier, a quarterly publication dealing with environmental issues facing the international hotel and tourism industry is proof of the concern that the hotel industry shares on the environment front, Berry adds

Monuments which are a part of our environment and heritage can be given a fresh lease of life by private enterprise But do we have the resources to maintain them with the government's budgeting getting restricted to priority areas like education and safe drinking water? "There

☛...that today 212 million people around the world are employed in travel and tourism, a business that earns US$ 3.4 trillion annually? Last year, the number of international air passengers stood a 339.6 million, and the number was expected to increase by a 100 million by 1998.

☛A decade from now the numbers employed in the world travel industry will touch an impressive 338 million people and the revenue generated by the global industry will have scaled US$ 7.2 trillion.

☛The estimates of foreign exchange earnings from tourism in the year 1994-95 touched Rs 7,366 crore, a growth of 13.2 per cent over the previous year.

☛According to Ashok Pahwa, DG, Tourism, Government of India, it is estimated that during the current year foreign exchange earnings from tourism will touch Rs 10,000 crore. The position of tourism in terms of gross foreign exchange earnings is No. 3 and in terms of nett foreign exchange earnings is No. 2.

☛Latest figures indicate that in 1994-95, 18.4 million people were employed directly or indirectly in the tourism industry. And the multiplier effect of employment in the industry saw an additional 2,396 million jobs created. The share of tourism in invisible earnings is 25.4 per cent.

is a resource crunch and in this scenario, to expect the government to pump in crores of rupees into the maintenance of these monuments, will be asking for too much

"Given the right directions, parameters and management, tourism is the preserver and restorer of these sites of national importance," emphasises Berry The Taj Mahal is a classic example

Though this wonder of the world attracts tourists by the hordes there is little development around But with the private sector now involved, says Berry, the country will soon see the developing of new tourist facilities in the area "A hotel site has been marked out and on the anvil is an amusement park at Shilpagram, a kilometre away from the monument, a holiday resort eight kilometres from the Taj and the construction of a ropeway from the Red Fort to Itmad-ud-Daullah across the Yamuna," says Berry

There are few reasons that dictate that such tourism must be perceived as a negative force Large scale resorts and even theme parks that adhere to the needs of the natural environment can actually contain damage to the environment while channelising multitudes of travellers through these tourism tunnels

Tented accommodation in forested areas, camping sites, adventure sports like trekking, river rafting will all provide tourists the back-to-nature holiday experience Industry observers state that if the grouse against such tourism activity is that trekkers and adventure sport lovers pollute the natural environs, it can be countered with imposition of hefty fines, which is a practice worldwide

If the 'carrying capacities of destinations' can be worked out and adhered to, then there is no way that tourism cannot be viewed as an enhancing force and a positive supporter of the environment

Then, there are the vast tracks of land that practically have no development Some environmentalists believe that these are best left alone and shrubbery allowed to grow wild While all that may stand to reason, it is important not to forget that wilderness in the middle of cities is not feasible Cities and towns must develop these green lungs

A golf course is an ideal way of developing this Large land resources lie barren with the owners not being able to eke out anything from them

"But this, too, has spawned opposition from environmentalists who are under the misconception that golf, a sport long associated with fresh air,

A traditional welcome for visitors

The Oberoi overlooking the Delhi golf course

acres of green grass and elegant tree-lined fairways, is not environment friendly," says Rishi Narain, golf enthusiast

Environmentalists in India, specially those in Goa where the protests are the loudest, claim that to build golf courses, developers cut down trees, destroy the natural habitat of small animals and birds, contaminate drinking water with chemical fertilisers, displace villagers from their homes and waste precious water resources

But golf courses are normally charted on barren land, and the Pune Club is a classic example of how barren areas in Indian metros can be converted into densely wooded lungs which can also be commercially sustainable through golf "The course was built on a 100-acre site which was barren and supported a dozen sickly trees at best When the area was annexed to the Pune Club, 50,000 trees were planted throughout the course The survival rate of the trees was 80 per cent," claims Narain

And just consider the value of a tree as calculated by the Basant Lok Jagriti Association, says Narain A tree that lives for 50 years generates Rs 5 3 lakh worth of oxygen, recycles Rs 6 4 lakh worth of fertility and soil erosion control, creates Rs 10 5 lakh worth of air pollution control and Rs 5 3 lakh worth of shelter for animals and birds "So a golf course contributes crores to the economy even before the first shot is even teed off"

Worldwide, the industry has invested millions of dollars, conserved untold litres of water, by irrigating golf courses with reclaimed waste water

In the barren and dry environs of Kutch, the environmental lobbies are up against a golf course which could help put this remote and unknown area on the domestic and international tourist map Development of the barren stretches and employment to the impoverished locals would be the natural fallout

A golfer is a high spending tourist, spending US$ 200 and more per day —four to five times more than an average tourist

Antibodies—in this case environmental lobbies—are not always sufficiently informed about the ground realities And it is unfair to conclusively establish that tourism is the villian in the environmental degradation

For those who love nature (and the comforts of civilisation), tent holidays seem to be the answer, feels Shameem Akthar

Tent holidays for budget travellers

A starlit sky, waves lapping a few kilometres off your tent With only a handful of humanity around to lull you into a sense of security No sound except the dry rattle of palm leaves and the wind's soft tap on your tent flap A dream holiday on a shoestring budget

In order to tap the market of a fast burgeoning brigade of backpackers, who want to enjoy the outdoors without sacrificing the luxuries of civilisation, the Maharashtra Tourism Development Corporation (MTDC) had, in 1991, launched its tent holidays, a brainchild of its former director, Devrath Mehta

And the number of spots where these are offered has been steadily increasing and the MTDC is planning to introduce 'luxury tents' for the higher income bracket who are only too willing to pay any amount for more comforts

This also soothes the conscience of state planners who are not unaware of the fact that development, in the guise of more tourist facilities, will corrode the fragile eco-systems in the 'pure, untrodden areas' promised in the brochures And by limiting construction activity to tent fixtures, common toilets, electricity connection (for the fans and lights in the tents), thatched restaurants with benches from roughly-hewn wood, the MTDC is also overcoming the legal hurdle, a Supreme Court ruling, which prevents permanent constructions within a specified limit of the sea

Ecology seems to have become the buzzword that emanates even from the unlikely mouths of policy planners. In fact, the state government's tourism policy, released this year, is replete with words that vow to be 'environmentally friendly' And the policy avers that the 'state will continue to fund facilities in the nature of camping grounds, tent resorts, mud huts, caravans and other unconventional and environmentally friendly ventures

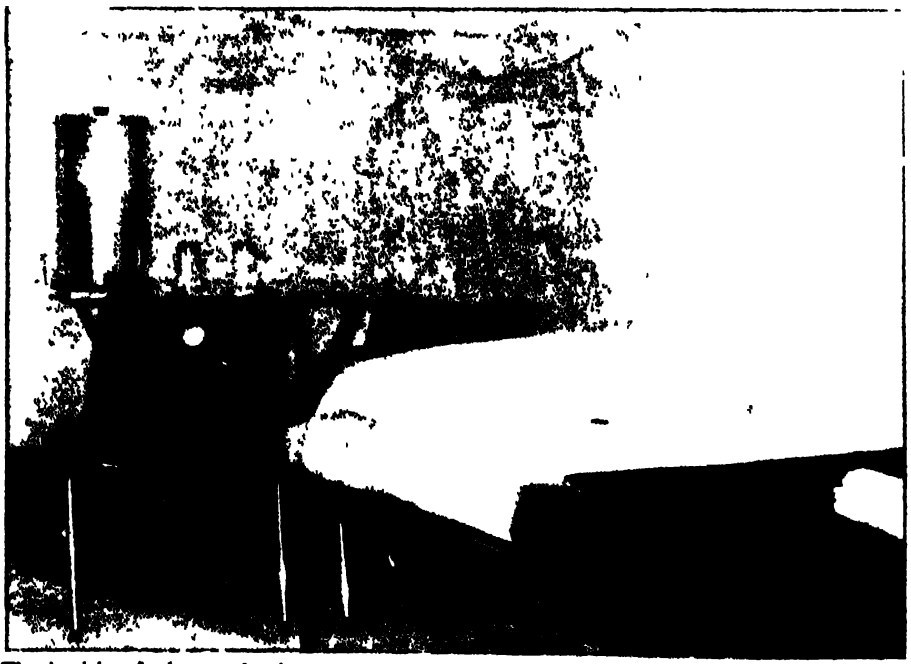
In addition, the state may invest in remote areas where private sector initiative is not readily forthcoming, because it is necessary to put up minimum facilities at ecologically or culturally outstanding sites

This piously caring tone is scrupulously maintained throughout the 30-odd pages of the policy "The preservation of the fragile ecological balance is the first priority of the state government Only after thoroughly studying the environmental impact of tourism projects will they be permitted in ecologically sensitive areas Additional responsibility will be fixed on investors to ensure that norms with regard to solid waste, sewerage, sullage, plantation of trees, drawing of ground water and observing architectural guidelines are adhered to While clearing projects it will be ensured that more greenery is provided in the selected areas without hampering traditional access of local population "

But the anti-tourist pack of ecologists are unimpressed For, those like Winin Pereira, author of several books, including Tending the Earth, tent holidays constitute an intrusion, even if only minimal, on a self-contained eco-system Even the diversion of food to feed the ever-hungry horde of tourists amounts to eco-pilferage He argues that the "suction of vegetables, fruits, meat and fish by these hyperconsumers results in higher prices or even total loss of food for the local people "

Tent resorts Environmentally friendly



While this debate has just taken off here, the MTDC continues with its expansion plans for tent holidays particularly since its tourist infrastructure is still not 'developed' to absorb the increasing horde of budget travellers And those who want to get off from the concrete jungles into natural ones are increasing And this does not just mean those who fraternise at trekkers' clubs which sprout wherever civilisation smothers off nature

While the trekkers prefer to rough it out with just a tent and a sleeping bag which may be hired at just Rs 20 (after paying a deposit of Rs 3 200) the comfort seekers like to pretend that they are roughing it out in a four seater tent that may be rented at Rs 200 per night The latter come with beds and, of course, the attendant comforts of electricity - lights and fans

At present tent holidays are offered at limited spots Ganapatipule, Harihareshwar, Karla Kihim, Dapoli and Bordi The sun kissed beach and lush green resort of Ganapatipule attracts pilgrims eager for a darshan of the 400 year Swayambhoo Ganpati Vijay Chavan, an MTDC official, reveals that, starting November Bordi, will play host to teams of eco-tourists whom the MTDC plans to educate

As part of its policy to develop eco tourism the department plans to invite Bombay University lecturers to act as guide to tourists who will be explained the wonders of marine, botanical and zoological wonders in this area, famous for its delicious chicoos and tribal Warli art

Most other spots where tent holidays are offered are beach resorts like Kihim "woods brimming with wild flowers, rare butterflies, and birds" And, as the brochures promise, most are "unspoilt and isolated' How long they will remain so, even with only tent dwellers to mar the seascape, remains to be seen ■

A FACE IN THE DARK

It may give you some idea of rural humour if I begin this tale with an anecdote that concerns me I was walking alone through a village at night when I met an old man carrying a lantern I found, to my surprise, that the man was blind "Old man," I asked, "if you cannot see, why do you carry a lantern?"

"I carry this," he replied, "so that fools do not stumble against me in the dark "

This incident has only a slight connection with the story that follows, but I think it provides the right sort of tone and setting

Mr Oliver, an Anglo-Indian teacher, was returning to his school late one night, on the outskirts of the hill station of Shimla The school was conducted for Indian families and the boys wore blazers, caps and ties

Life magazine, in a feature on India, had once called this school the 'Eton of the East' Mr Oliver had been teaching in the school for several years (He is no longer there) The Shimla bazar, with its cinemas and restaurants, was about two miles from the school, and Mr Oliver, a bachelor, usually strolled into the town in the evening returning after dark, when he would take a short cut through a pine forest

When there was a strong wind, the pine trees sad, eerie sounds kept most people to the main road But Mr Oliver was not a nervous or imaginative man He carried a torch and, on the night I write of, its pale gleam — the batteries were running down - - moving fitfully over the narrow forest path When its flickering light fell on the figure of a boy, who was sitting alone on a rock, Mr Oliver stopped Boys were not supposed to be out of school after seven pm, and it was now well past nine

"What are you doing out here, boy?" asked Mr Oliver sharply, moving closer so that he could recognise the miscreant But even as he approached the boy, Mr Oliver sensed that something was wrong The boy appeared to be crying His head hung down, he held his face in his hands, and his body shook convulsively It was a strange, soundless weeping, and Mr Oliver felt distinctly uneasy

"Well — what's the matter?" he asked, his anger giving way to concern "What are you crying for?" The boy would not answer or look up His body continued to be racked with silent sobbing "Come on, boy, you shouldn't be out here at this hour Tell me the trouble Look up!"

The boy looked up He took his hands from his face and looked up at his teacher The light from Mr Oliver's torch fell on the boy's face — if you could call it a face

He had no eyes, ears, nose or mouth It was just a round smooth head — with a school cap on top of it

And that's where the story should end — as indeed it has, for several people who have had similar experiences and dropped dead of inexplicable heart attacks But for Mr Oliver it did not end there

The torch fell from his trembling hand He turned and scrambled down the path, running blindly towards the trees and calling for help He was still running towards the school buildings when he saw a lantern swinging in the middle of the path

Mr Oliver had never before been so pleased to see the night-watchman He stumbled up the watchman, gasping for breath and speaking incoherently "What is it, Sahib?" asked the watchman "Has there been an accident? Why are you running?"

"I saw something — something horrible — a boy weeping in the forest — and he had no face!"

"No face, Sahib?"

"No eyes, nose, mouth nothing."

"Do you mean it was like this, Sahib?" asked the watchman, and raised the lamp to his own face The watchman had no eyes, no ears, no features at all — not even an eyebrow! The wind blew the lamp out, and Mr Oliver had his first heart attack

(Sanctuary Features)

The torch fell from his trembling hand. He turned and scrambled down the path, running blindly towards the trees and calling for help. He was still running towards the school buildings when he saw a lantern swinging in the middle of the path. Mr Oliver had never before been so pleased to see the night-watchman

HUMOUR

MY GUZZLING GANESH

Did all this happen after all?

"Can you get me some milk?" It was a small, plaintive voice that broke into my consciousness as I sat staring at a blank piece of paper searching for inspiration, as I do on most days I looked suspiciously at the Ganesh who has been sitting patiently on my desk, quill in hand, for years It was a small Ganesh, somewhat weather-beaten, with a chip on its shoulder

"Oh, Gosh!" I exclaimed, "So, it's true after all "

"What's true?" said the voice with a touch of pique, while my Ganesh continued staring at me with his usual unconcerned expression

"About Ganeshes all over the world taking to milk, I thought it was all capillary action "

"Capillary action!" The voice snorted, "I'll capillary action them Let's see them feed milk to Kali or Brahma, if they can But I don't go in for strong stuff Milk is good enough for me "

"Mind you," he added as an afterthought, "I could be wronging the old man But you must admit some of his creations seem to have been influenced by liquids other than milk Take me, for example "

"I I don't know if there's any fresh milk around the house," I said, doubtfully, "Will milk powder do?"

"Only if the water is well boiled and it doesn't form lumps I hate lumps What brand is it?"

I mentioned the name of a well-known brand which had been claiming to be better than the real thing

"Ha! Vegetable powder would be more like it If that's the kind of muck you have around the house, I may as well go back No, I want proper milk, but toned, not cream I have to watch my figure "

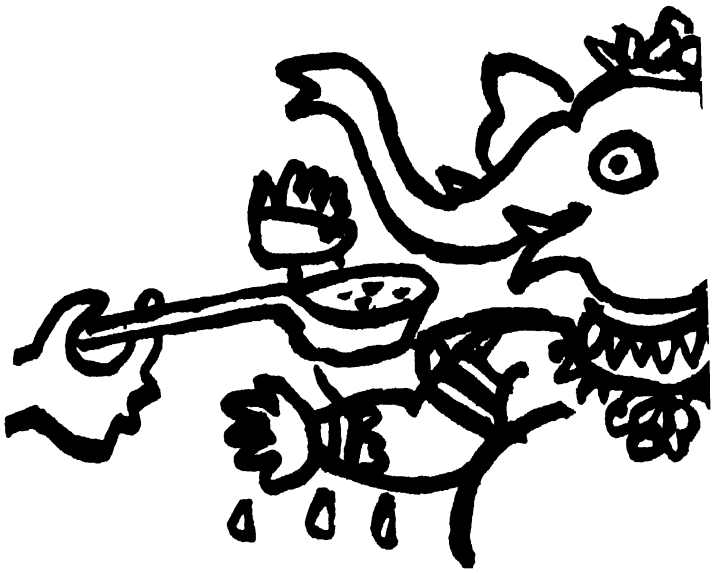
Fortunately, there was a bit of liquid milk in the fridge I placed it before the idol, feeling rather silly

"Will this do?" I asked humbly

"You are an idiot It is cold and has no sugar Would you have it yourself? But don't put sugar, get some sugar-free or saccharine Calories, you know "

"I'm sorry " I sympathised, hoping it would minimise both my lapse and his calories I prepared the milk as ordered and brought it back

"I hope you'll find it all right " I said, as ingratiating as possible "And this time I've brought it in a bone china cup " The cup was the sole survivor from a set of four I had received as a wedding present when I was rather more popular with my in-laws It was reserved for honoured guests I thought I should draw his attention to it



"Don't just stand there," said the voice irritably, "Feed it to me Haven't you been reading th newspapers? I must be fed with a spoon Preferably, a silver spoon "

I confessed I was fresh out of silver spoons

"I suppose I'll have to make do with stainless steel Or are you one of those who think plastic is chic?"

I denied the charge Vehemently

"Good," said the voice, then added peevishly, "Do you know they've even started making plastic idols? Insult, I tell you I bet you can't get a plastic Ganesh to drink milk It must be terribly upsetting to be made of poly-something-or-other Why can't you fellows stick to clay or marble?"

To cover my confusion, I got hold of a table spoon and shoved it, dripping with milk, under the idol's snout There was a slurp and it disappeared

"Ugh!" complained the voice "You call that milk? It is the cheapest stuff I've tasted in years!"

"Really," I said with some asperity, "I'll have you know, it's from Mother Dairy and costs nine bucks a litre "

"They're conning you Why don't you throw them out?"

"Actually, it used to cost seven bucks, a couple of months ago and they wanted to raise it to eight, but the government felt it was too expensive, threw them out and took over So now it costs nine Don't ask me," I added defensively, "I'm in the dark about the dialectics of milk "

I deposited a second spoonful which was imbibed more slowly

"You know," said the voice, with a note of concern, "I smell a rat "

"You've been sitting on one for years," I pointed out, 'Poor thing, it must be squashed I'm not surprised it smells "

"I meant in the milk Besides, my mount is not a rat it's a mouse and a divine one at that If you had a computer brain like I do you'd know rats are creatures that spread plague — as in Surat — while a mouse is attached "

"Spare me," I interrupted, "I don't want a lesson in zoology or computers If you smell a rat in the milk, it is quite normal Sometimes, you can even get one in a bottle at no extra charge Anyway, if you don't like the milk, can I offer you something else Like, maybe, a Pepsi "

"God forbid," said the voice, with a swallowing noise as the third spoonful disappeared "If I started drinking Pepsi, they'd probably put me in a commercial And I don't really want to be the choice of the new generation "

"You shouldn't run down the new generation, even if they prefer Pepsi to milk "

"It is not their taste that bothers me, it is their irreverence They seem to think idols drinking milk is a great lark In the old days, it would, at least, have been taken seriously Look at you Didn't even bother to offer a spoonful the other day, when the whole pantheon had milk dribbling down their chins What cheek!"

"I say, I'm sorry about that," I replied, "It just never crossed my mind I thought the entire business had been piloted by Chandraswami With a bit of help from his capillaries "

"Bah! These rum-bhakt scientists may have capillaries adorning their noses but I certainly don't Or are you referring to the saffron brigade with cloth wrapped bricks in their heads?"

"Well, I thought it had all been engineered by "

"A mistake Leave thinking to those with superior cranial spaces like mine Just remember You can take milk to an idol, but you cannot make it drink!"

... It did, if you believe in miracles

The good Lord was unemployed, and, feeling the blues due to his lack of occupation, decided to visit

India, which he considered his earthly abode

So, it was destination India and the agenda this time was to do something beneficial — and to revv up his following which he felt was not functioning on the rationalists' version of modern economics

The less of God, the more should have been the demand but it had worked on the contrary The demand for the Lord was diminishing Hence, steps had to be taken to boost his demand.

He made his first presence felt to our very own N Rout Rout's countenance remained unchanged at the sight of the Divine Revelation No shock, no surprise, no pleasure The Lord was amazed Was this man His creation? Losing his composure as well as his concentration, the Lord offered Rout three wishes instead of the one wish intended

"The heavens be praised!" said the Lord, seeing Rout smiling for the first time

"What is your first wish?" hoping it would be a spiritual quest

"My first wish is that I have a smiling appearance and am not referred to as Mr Pout "

"Granted," the Lord said

Immediately, the pout vanished.

"My second wish is that all opposition should disappear," Rout said

"Granted," said the Lord

Rout was lost in his thougnts, thinking about his third wish when the innumerable telephone calls started pouring in

"What! Mr Patang Singh has disappeared? and Mr Sinkia too? And Mr Havan? Mr Mar Mohan Singh too?" Rout could not believe it This must be a dream He started laughing strangely, showing his wisdom teeth

The next stop was Mr Whackeray who went about whacking people who did not do as he said After introductions, he offered Whackeray his wish Whackeray immediately summoned Godwani, with whom he truthfully shared his alliance

On seeing Godwani, God felt elated This man remembered his exact birth place and also took much trouble over God's favourite spots Surely, this man would ask for something divine

Mr Whackeray emerged with a glass in his hand and said, "We wish that our alliance wins the 1996 elections Mr Godwani has agreed to become my remote control PM and in turn will rename Mumbai as Thackerstate "

The Lord was taken aback and felt utterly let down However, He promised them the fulfillment of their wish and took their leave He realised that no one thought about Him or the common man In search of a solution, He needed peace and solitude to think

So, the good Lord merged with an idol of Ganesh that was nearby While He was immersed in his ruminations, a kind devotee came and offered Him a spoon of milk Thirsty, not having been offered anything by anyone, the Lord absentmindedly drank the milk The devotee was stunned

He ran helter skelter crying to one and all that a miracle had taken place

It then struck the Lord that He had found the solution Sometimes what you are searching for lies right below your nose So He drank And drank The rest we know Rarely, had God ever got such an overwhelming devotion

Happy, the Lord was about to return to his heavenly abode when he remembered me

He tauntingly asked, "Now do you believe in me?"

"Lord, I have always believed in you but without majority support, if I indulged in too much Godly talk, I would be branded as a Godman And you know, Lord, the state of present godmen — Bandarswami etc To earn a living, I must remain an adman and not strive to become a godman "

"So Lord, can I ask you for something?"

"Go ahead," he said

"Lord! When we die, how do our souls reach you?"

The Lord smiled

"Capillary action Didn't you know?"

"And how do souls return to earth?"

"The souls destined to return to earth reach here through surface tension," said the Lord, roaring with laughter

CROSSING SWORDS

The victor's right to loot is one of the unethical but universal rules of war As a result, all over the world, nations and individuals are struggling to bring back looted treasures from foreign lands If, that is, the treasures can be found One such treasure is a sword which belonged to Guru Gobind Singh and which was taken from Maharaja Ranjit Singh's Toshakhana at Lahore by Lord Dalhousie

The importance to Sikhs of relics of Guru Gobind Singh, who forged them into the Khalsa, is immense In January 1966, six relics of the Guru taken to Scotland by Lord Dalhousie, were returned to India

The scene at Delhi airport was overwhelming, a sea of turbaned Sikhs, defeaning cries of Jo bole, so nihal! The Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri himself came to welcome the relics which included two spears and a shield In his speech he said, "This is a very happy day Guru Gobind Singh was one of the founders of our nation "

But not all the relics were returned

We know this from the extensive and bureaucratic records of the East India Company When at 35, Lord Dalhousie came to India as Governor-General after a brilliant career at the Board of Trade, he declared imperiously, "The Sikh nation has called for war and so, by my word, shall they have it with a vengeance " After the defeat of the Sikhs in 1849, he further declared that, "all the property of the [Sikh] state of whatever description and wheresoever found shall be confiscated to the Honourable East India Company "

Now the late Maharaja Ranjit Singh had been a great collector and the Toshakhana of Lahore was fabulously rich and included such pieces as the Koh-i-Noor diamond which still adorns the British crown No less precious to the Sikhs, though were the arms of Guru Gobind Singh

These find mention in the nine-and-a-half miles of records on the shelves of the Oriental and Indian collection of the British Library in London In a letter to the court of directors in London, Dalhousie says that from the Toshakhana he has kept four complete sets of armour, two for Her Majesty and two for the directors and adds, "I have set apart several articles on which I solicit your orders —a set of arms including spear and sword which Sikh traditions assert to have belonged to the Guru Gobind It would not be politic in my opinion to permit any Sikh institution to obtain possession either by gift or by means of sale of these warlike symbols of a warlike faith "

The directors allowed Dalhousie to keep everything except for the sword which, they wrote, ' we want in our museum as a historical relic "

Dalhousie's tone was repugnant to the Sikhs and is so to the retired diplomat Harbans Singh who spent the years of his London posting searching for the sword of the Guru He calls Dalhousie's actions "robbery"

But the question of the whereabouts of the sword remained unresolved In fact, there may be more than one The 91 year-old scholar Nahar Singh has been researching the Indian archives on the subject for more than 60 years—and there are many more records in India than in Britain

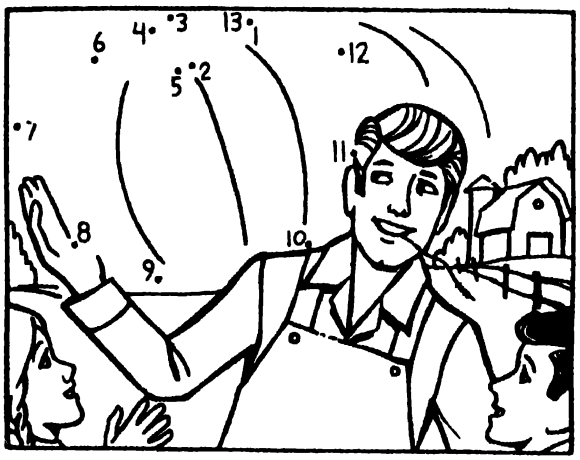
He has written a book called the Two swords of Guru Gobind Singh in England, and says that there were two swords both of a type in general use during the period but both bearing inscriptions in the Punjabi language in Persian script saying that they belong to Guru Gobind Singh

One sword should have gone to the Queen, and one to the East India Company, but in England there is no record of either Robert Skelton is the retired keeper of the Indian department at the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, which was entrusted with the East India Company's collection He says that in 1879 the collection was moved in a hurry, and that the cataloguing done at that time was "fragmentary"

He also says that after the Second World War, when museums were closed and amalgamated, a great number of oriental arms were consigned to stores around London, and that some objects may have been disposed of through sale, specially the kind of objects in the EIC collection, as they were of ethnographical interest and not of special interest to a museum of decorative arts like the V and A

When he was in London, Harbans Singh went back to Dalhousie's great-great-great grandson and to his castle in Scotland to search through his Indian arms for the swords of the Guru in the hope that they may have reached there after all He saw two swords with Persian inscriptions and a book which Lord Dalhousie himself had written was a Granth from the Lahore Toshakhana and which Harbans Singh took to be the Granth in the Guru's own hand

Richard Skelton and a team from the V and A went to examine the arms in the Eighties and found no evidence of those two swords belonging to the Guru In 1990, the Dalhousie family collection was somewhat dispersed when a grand auction of Indian arms and armaments was held which raised £100,000



Recently, Stephen Deol, a scholar of Punjabi literature, went to see the Granth seen by Harbans Singh and discovered it to be in fact a 19th century commentary and text of the Geeta with illustrations from the life of Krishna

The so-called Granth, then, has no connection with Guru Gobind Singh But the search for his swords continues Baba Virsa Singhji Sahib, who lives on the outskirts of Delhi, and is the main sponsor of the search states, "They should return to the place where they will be respected They shall come back "

LOYAL LIVING

For some Hollywood stars fidelity even today means a lot For some, stresses Susmita Banerjee

It does not really take death to part couples. If there is a strong temptation and the right chemistry sizzling, who cares for fidelity?

Hollywood, with its jet-setting, high-wattage lifestyle, has the largest number of 'quickie' divorces, for success seeks its own preferences — the passport to change partners

But there are some in Hollywood who cherish their long-standing relationships and swear by fidelity Lisa and Patrick Swayze are surely Hollywood's most romantic couple, still in love and happy after nearly two decades of gracious togetherness.

Incurably romantic, the tough guy from Texas loves the "idea of being in love" He claims he has been in love only once — with "the most beautiful woman" he has ever seen in his life, his wife He is so enamoured of her that when he does a love scene on camera he always has Lisa in his mind!

Old Pat is so much in love with his wife that not only has he never been unfaithful to her, but also never felt "turned on" by any Hollywood belle

His idea of perfect happiness? Spending a few quiet idyllic hours in the company of his dear, dear wife in his San Gabriele mountain ranch with his Arabian horses and peacocks

Ryan O'Neal and Farah Fawcett are also known to share a closely knitted and emotionally scintillating relationship So charmed is

Jacqueline Bisset with Armand Assante in Napoleon and Josephine

O'Neal by the beautiful Farah that he has never felt the urge to stray; "not even in my dreams", the actor vows

Such passionate promises of fidelity in an ambience as promiscuous as that of Hollywood are strange For promiscuity is determined more by opportunity than by moral mores. Hollywood could never be scared of beautiful women and handsome men.

The soap opera queen, Joan Collins, tied the knot four times and untied them an equal number of times. Marriage was not something she was destined for. She divorced her second husband-actor Anthony Newly purely on grounds of adultery "I would not even date a man who slept around Absolutely not," she said of her divorce

Beautiful and intelligent and an inspiration to many women, this poor man's Liz Taylor is still in quest of a relationship that will ensure fidelity, loyalty, honesty and honour

Actor Bruce Willis may have been very promiscuous, carefree and wild in his bachelor days — late nights, brawls and binges — but cares for monogamy after marriage Gone was his bohemian lifestyle once he chanced upon Demi Moore, the Striptease mega-star It was love at first sight "I wanted to be with this girl all the time," he said And he has been with her since 1987 defying all the screaming tabloid headlines that they were to split

The couple have three children and devote their time between their sprawling beach house in Malibu and their moutain getaway in Idaho

Michael and Shakira Caine is another happy-go-lucky couple who are completely devoted to each other Unlike many other Hollywood marriages theirs is a special union of long-term togetherness and love Caine has even admitted that if anyone of them were to flirt with someone else, it would spell murder They are certainly a breed apart.

The giggling blonde, Goldie Hawn, and Kurt Russel, star of Backdraft, is one more Hollywood's made-for-each-other couple. Successful on screen and even touted as a shrewd businesswoman, she cherishes her private life and would give anything to have a stable marriage, embittered as she is after two unsuccessful wedlocks which drained her of $75,000 (the first marriage) and $ 1.50,000 (the second marriage) by way of 'alimony'.

After eight years of living together with Kurt, Goldie slipped in the $47,000 wedding ring. Theirs is one of those rare Hollywood marriages that are for keeps "If I ever thought my partner [Kurt Russel] was with another woman, I'd be very hurt," she declares.

The stunning Jacqueline Bisset admits she is fiercely possessive and believes in total devotion to the relationship as in now, but does not believe in chaining down her partner.

For her marriage is a commitment, a vow that must be honoured She says, "If I were married, I don't think I'd be unfaithful If I promise something I stick to it."

Patrick Swayze with wife Lisa

Queen of soap Joan Collins escorted by Bill Wiggins

It is a fallacy, believe other Hollywood stars, that being married precludes relationships Shurley MacLaine is the first to vote for this Having had a string of relationships she believes, "People should be allowed to do what they want, married or not." Being married, for her, does not mean shutting herself off from the world (and men) Her romantic obsession has never ended with one partner

Just as Hollywood sells dreams the stars have their dreams, too Some like to dream with one

Others like to dream with many ■

Santiniketan

Midday
the sun broils,
a chorus of birds
alive with Chaurasia's flute
Santiniketan's green symphony rolls on to a horizon of trees
Acres of fluid gold, nearby the canal plays out a modest baritone, and sitting on the threshold
I drink the silence of green
A salamander glides
Up a tree trunk leaning on the thatched roof
Stealthily I roll up the silence acre by acre in my vast network of nerves inside
This stillness will I take back home to grow trees, more trees
along the city-lanes.

A PRIVATE AFFAIR

It was a starry night with a twin purpose The launch of Rita Bhimani's new book and the presentation of a painting to Kapil Dev

Kapil Dev holds up the painting with Wasim Kapoor as Rita Bhimani smiles her approval

It was an evening to remember No bawdy bash at a local discotheque but a quiet get-together of some very famous but very private people

Kapil Dev was there So was the glamorous Moonmoon Sen to grace the launch of Rita Bhimani's book, The Corporate Peacock New plumes for Public Relations at her Sunny Park residence on October 7

What's more, an aesthetic treat was in store for Kapil Painter Wasim Kapoor presented him with a painting depicting his link with cricket It was commissioned by Rita herself as a special gift for the star cricketer

In subtle shades of beige and cream, the painting was an apt tribute to the man who has evolved over the years, both in his professional and personal life It spoke of his inner strength and rustic simplicity

Nursing a cold throat throughout the evening, Kapil felt too cloyed by cricket and was more eager to discuss business He said he loved privacy, but it was like asking for the impossible in a city where cricket was synonymous with collective madness

The book which he launched is a titillating interpretation of corporate public relations functions, alternating between the serious and the tongue-in-cheek It has been penned by Rita in her inimitable style after 25 years of practicing, preaching and preening in the profession

Resplendent and comely in a lacy black shiffon, Rita, the quintessential PR lady, felt public relations had to course through the blood in the veins and was not as simple as walking into a shop

Her book tells the reader, moreso CEOs, all about the synergy between corporate communications and business strategy (some useful tips for Kapil perhaps) and offers a delightful subjective glossary (called abecedary) of public relations

The evening that wrapped up well after midnight had helped to bring people together, giving a great boost to a book that went public on that day ■

N.N. RIMZON, the young sculptor from Kerala, belongs to the generation of artists whose works have been noticed for their novelty and uniqueness. An MA with distinction from the Royal College of Art, London, Rimzon has won several scholarships, the Inlaks for one. He has given form and shape to materials such as wire-mesh, plaster, old packing cases and other poor quality materials because he believes that art does not survive just through the material but through the idea.

What is your idea of perfect happiness?
When will and desire come together.
What is your greatest fear?
The politics of tradition.
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
Narayana Guru, Gandhiji and Joseph Benys.
What do you dislike most in others?
Heroism with conviction in morality and ethics
What do you dislike most in yourself?
The level of vulnerability and submissiveness
What is your most precious possession?
A collection of books on humanities.
What objects do you always carry?
House key. House is my mother.
What makes you most depressed?
When I realise that I have been cheated or manipulated.
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
I am still investigating it.
What is your favourite word?
Inside.
What is your favourite journey?
A journey to Kerala, specially during the monsoon season. I enjoy the overwhelming presence of nature.
What is your favourite dream?
A new civilisation which is totally built up on the principles of creativity. The creativity becomes the capital of the society where each individual experiences the ultimate substance of democracy and freedom. Life and art once again will be united.
What is your nightmare?
The triumph of December 6 [1992].
What or who is the greatest love of your life?

What is your nightmare?

The triumph of December 6 [1992]

On what occasions do you lie?

When the aspect of privacy is pushed to the level of impossibility

I am sure that it is not my art.
What is your source of sustenance?
My memories, my studies and my dreams.
On what occasions do you lie?
When the aspect of privacy is pushed to the level of impossibility
What is your greatest regret?
Regret reaches me as a cold wind, difficult to catch hold of it.
What has been your happiest moment?
Opening of my first solo show in Delhi in 1991.
What brings tears to your eyes?
Love and affection.
How do you relax?
By reading pulp fiction.
What do you envy most in others?
People who have a sense of humour, and are able to make fun of themselves.
How would you like to be remembered?
As one of the best artists of our times.
How would you like to die?
I do not believe in my death.

POSTMORTEM

Author's Shame?

■ An author should primarily be the chronicler of and commentator on society; he should not make his writing a weapon of confrontation or to spew venom ('Stayin' Alive', September 9)

William Shakespeare, George Bernard Shaw, Rabindranath Tagore and Iqbal were not only great masters of literature, but also social scientists whose works were appreciated in every country and in every age

Their purpose of writing was for a noble cause educating society and purging it of its ills

The India-born writer Salman Rushdie and the Bangladeshi author Taslima Nasreen, perhaps, forgot that the pen was mightier than the sword They should have used their pen for the right purpose, at the right time and for the right cause

Penning a novel merely to kindle confusion and indignation is not the right attitude of an author, that could be interpreted as an easy way out to earn fame and popularity.
Md. Tanweer,
Calcutta

Salman Rushdie: Penning controversy

■ Salman Rushdie is undoubtedly a great writer, but one thing he cannot shun is the limelight and he will pick up any controversial subject to remain there

This time he is in the eye of another storm — The Moor's Last Sigh — which hits out at the Shiv Sena supremo, Bal Thackeray

Jayanta Mahapatra will be abroad for a while. Readers may please send their poems to him after the third week of November.

Perhaps his future novel will tilt at Christians?
Shovanlal Bakshi,
Calcutta

■ Our Constitution grants us the freedom to express ourselves in whichever fashion we want Banning of books is nothing but deliberate stifling of freedom of expression in a brutal manner

Bal Thackeray behaves in an insane fashion most of the time, threatening the Pakistani cricket team from playing at the World Cup and that, too, for a reason unconnected with the game.

Such militancy does not speak well of India abroad and is alien to our traditions, too
Nirmalendu Chakraborty,
Cooch Behar

■ I wonder why writers have become so militant in this age A piece of writing can spark off so much hype, hatred, or even a riot
S. Mukherjee,

OF HUMAN BONDAGE

An Indian doctor finds fulfillment in a small American city by treating AIDS patients which prompts him to write an extraordinary book

Arthur J. Pais on the man with a mission

Eighty years ago, Dr Abraham Verghese must have thought Johnson City was his kamadhenu — where all his wishes would be fulfilled

Nestled in the foothills of the Smoky Mountains, the Tennessee city of 50,000 people, with its balmy weather, low crime rate, and redolent, spicy food such as squirrel stew, and hog brains with scrambled eggs, endeared the 31-year-old infectious disease specialist at the Veterans Administration Hospital

To the Ethiopian-born son of Indian school teachers, Johnson City radiated tranquility, stability and a strong sense of "home"

His life till then had taken him from war-torn Ethiopia to a short stint as an orderly in America, and then to Madras, India, where he studied medicine for five years He had also taken a fellowship in a Boston hospital

"This was a small town in the country," he writes of Johnson City, "a town of clean-living, good country people" Its people would give the shirt off their back, he thought, if you were their friend, even if you treated AIDS patients "After moving from continent to continent without a sense of ever belonging to any one place," he says, "I wanted nothing more than to settle in one peaceful place and be a good doctor," he says He wanted his infant son, Stephen, to have a permanent home, "something I never had"

"Johnson City was going to be my own town Finally, this was my own country"

But his four-year-long quiet life in Johnson City derailed when Gordon, a young man with AIDS returned home to die, after savouring the freedom in a big city Verghese, who had always thought AIDS was clearly a big city phenomenon, began to treat him with a missionary zeal "I thought I got my own chance to justify my expertise, to justify my experience," he says in a sonorous voice made more interesting by a medley of accents dominated by a southern drawl But it was not going to be easy First, he had to struggle with himself to conquer his own fears of AIDS, despite his idealism

He would remember how he had joined fellow students in anti-gay jokes and buffonery in Madras, how he had not known a gay till he had treated AIDS patients during his fellowship in Boston "I would not say I was homophobic," he says, but he had in-depth information on how AIDS affected family ties and the hostilities AIDS patients faced He was further shocked when Rajani, his wife of six years, and mother of his two-year-old son, asked him if he was sexually attracted towards gay men

At the hospital, several nurses wanted to know why he was taking extraordinary interest in his patients, they deserved what they got, said one A pharmacist he had known for long became hostile after Verghese protested the way the pharmacist treated AIDS patients The only infectious disease specialist at the V A. hospital, Verghese soon learned that he was not only a physician to his patients but also a comfort They confided in him for hours, and often he tried — with varying success — to reconcile their estranged parents and relatives with them

In the next four years, he would treat 80 young men with AIDS Like Gordon, they too had felt stifled by Johnson City and had fled to bigger cities The expatriates were now returning home, one by one, bringing the deadly disease with them There were others too Vickie, a factory worker who had to face not only her husband's bisexuality but also her own status as an HIV positive woman, and Johnson, a very religious Christian patrician who got AIDS through a blood transfusion and tormented himself for unknowingly passing his disease to his wife

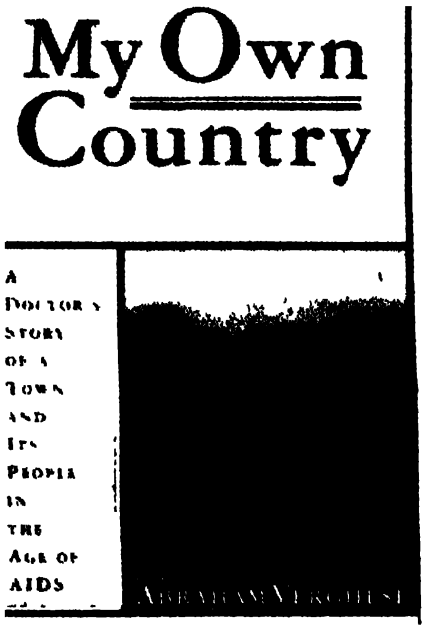
How these patients penetrated the quiescent fabric of a conservative rural city, created a continual angst and tension, and how their struggle challenged and touched hundreds of lives led Verghese to write My Own Country, published in June The book, first ever to distil a doctor's experiences with AIDS patients, notes of many reconciliations between the patients and their family members, who gradually overcame their terror of the virus On the other hand, many doctors were uncomfortable treating the AIDS patients and left the job to Verghese

Verghese had always longed to be a journalist But his parents mandated a professional course Inspired by Somerset Maugham's novel Of Human Bondage, about an idealistic country doctor, Verghese chose a medical career But as he began a journal in Johnson City, which also recorded the strains his all-consuming practice had on Rajani, his wife from India, his passion to publish grew

Rajani often worried that he could be infected by AIDS, a fear he himself carried secretly As a result, he writes, "AIDS became a friend from a different social stratum, a friend I indulged but no longer brought to the house or even discussed with her"



In many ways, Verghese found a bond with his patients "Society considered them alien, and much of their life was spent faking conformity," Verghese says "And in a sense, I was an outsider, too Just as I was labelled a 'resident alien' on my Green Card, society considered these young men 'alien' too

"New immigrants expend a great deal of effort trying to fit in learning the language, losing the accent Gay men and women also became experts at blending in, camouflaging themselves, but at a great cost to their spirit"

Many of his patients had fled to the bigger, more tolerant cities, unable to face the hostility in Johnson City

"My own adaptation (to life in Johnson City) had been voluntary, even joyful, and depended on chameleon-like adaptability" He would be equally at home with Indian doctors, eating curries and listening to Indian music, and donning boots and dancing at local clubs or listening to blues at local restaurants But most of the Indian doctors had no regard for him Naturally He was making far less money than most of them, and had no inclination to go into private practice

"I acted as if money meant less to me than it did them, a childish reflex," he writes "This was, of course, not true I valued money and would not have minded a ton of it But I didn't feel I had to do something different in medicine just for that reason I was every bit as well trained, just as talented I like to think, as the doctors who made 20 times what I made The monetary disparity was not due to their skill or their intrinsic work (even though at times I think they succumbed to this delusion), it was due to a payment system that placed greater value on procedural specialities than on those without them

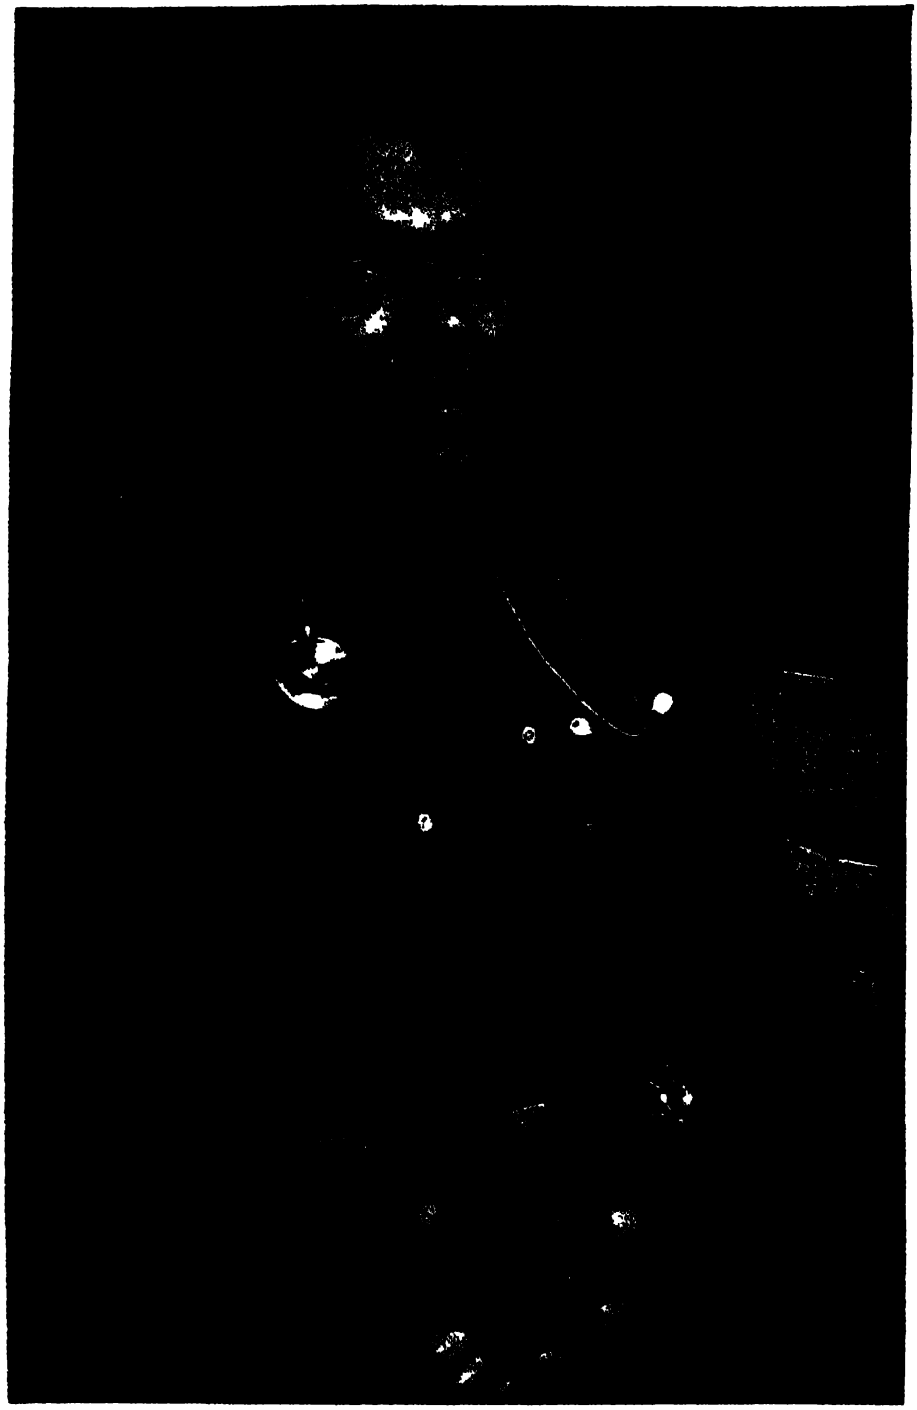
"Ah, but in Sweden, I would say when I grew tired of being needled by my speciality, thoracic surgeons and infectious diseases specialist get the same salary And you know what, if the Democrats win the next election"

"This was guaranteed to produce a loud outcry that I delighted in There were no stauncher Republicans than the Indian doctors of Tennessee"

There were many other lessons to be learned in Johnson City His receding forehead generates tension and his swimming eyes burn, his hands often clasp as he recalls his experiences

He wonders how much of relief his patients might have had at finding a foreign-born doctor" To tell their secrets to a Caucasian face that could just as well have belonged to a preacher, a judge or some other archetypal authority figure in their town," he writes, "might have been difficult"

His patients challenged him emotionally too "AIDS pulls you across the threshold of your own upbringing and constraints, primarily because you are dealing with people who are very much of your own age," he writes "They act as mirrors and make you reflect upon questions of your own morality"



On January 1, 1990, seeking "a cooling-off period" from professional and domestic pressure, Verghese headed for Iowa, with Rajani and their two children, to join an AIDS team at the University of Iowa He also enrolled at the Iowa Writer's Workshop to study writing in earnest "Whatever it is you aspire, you should not wait to do it," he says, adding that apart from getting a Master's degree in writing, he also forged a "mentoring" friendship with the bestselling and acclaimed novelist, John Irving

"As a doctor, I have written many essays that were subsequently published in medical journals," he says, discussing how he began to write "But in 1988, I went to a one-week summer workshop at the University of Iowa and suddenly began to feel like writing was the key to some of my frustrations at work Particularly so with writing fiction

"The one thing that I am limited by in my profession is the boundaries of science I can't reverse death, I can't get into the patients' mind and think their thoughts, I cannot control the universe — instead I am controlled by it With writing, the boundaries are virtually limitless - I can control the universe"

Soon after graduating from the University of Iowa, he sent two of his stories about AIDS to The New Yorker which published one of them Then an editor there suggested that he write about his experiences in Johnson City

"The piece (about Johnson City) didn't suit The New Yorker," he recalls "Despite the rejection, I was hooked" And so began the book that was bought for a reported $200,000 by Simon & Schuster and whose paperback rights were sold to Vintage for $250,000 For nearly two years, he wrote for three hours a day, getting up at 4 30 in the morning He also worked as the chief of infectious diseases, not in Johnson City but at Texas Health Sci

Abraham Verghese· Battling AIDS

ences Center, El Paso — his own new country

El Paso is less than an hour from the Mexican border and has a large number of Spanish immigrants and illegal workers "The prevailing skin pigment is so close to mine I have a sense of having disappeared," he told a reporter recently

My Own Country was reviewed on the cover of The New York Times Book Review; a week later. John Irving's A Son of the Circus was reviewed on page one, too The Times, which gave the book a 2,500-word-long review, also recommended the book in its weekly notable-books list

"Isn't it a wonderful success story," mused a common friend "The student upstaged the teacher by seven days."

There were a whole lot of praise from doctors and social workers, too

My Own Country is a remarkable testament, noted Gail Goodwin, author of A Southern Family

"Dr Verghese writes with a novelist's exacting eye for the memorable character trait and an irresistible narrative drive, even though the story he is telling is not fiction and his poignant characters are — alas — real people Dr Verghese makes it seem possible to get behind the petty borders of our ignorance and fears enter the larger citizenry of the kind and the caring It is an astonishing feat he has performed "

Verghese plans to write a book of short stories about AIDS He still works with AIDS patients, and his wife Rajani, who once said that she had wished the disease had not existed between them at all, seems to have found the means to conquer her own fears

He also addresses doctors about AIDS, has been interviewed for more than two dozen radio stations and over 100 newspapers and magazines during his 10-city tour that must have made him rootless and homeless once again The short stories about AIDS could appear early next year

"And then I want to work on a novel," he says, "that will encourage young people, specially high school students, to become doctors and take up specialities that aren't popular "

One wonders what the Indian doctors in Johson City are thinking of Dr Verghese and his book now Perhaps, some of them have forbidden their children from reading the book, hoping that the children will never treat AIDS patients They and some other doctors may be fearing the novel, the next Of Human Bondage even more But Vergnese sounds hopeful when he talks about the second and third generation of Indian Americans. He thinks they will have time and inclination for idealism, unlike many of their parents And he is also glad that his peers in the Indian community have taken notice of him The journal published by AAPI, the powerful organisation of Indian American physicians, recently ran a rave review of Verghese's book

He may even be asked to address the AAPI national convention next year. This year, it was Dr Deepak Chopra's turn "Well, without the help of mega TV personalities like Oprah Winfrey who promoted Dr Chopra's holistic books, Verghese made a name for himself," said an Indian doctor who wants to remain anonymous "His book hasn't made him a millionaire but I am sure it has touched millions of lives." ■

MORE THAN A MODEL

Rachel Reuben has the kind of face that is far from forgotten. And now UTV has chosen her to present Star Movies' Bol Bollywood

Rachel Reuben was the toast of the modelling world long before the profession came into fashion in India

With her fresh, glamorous looks she had that single most important quality needed in a model — memorability And though it is nearly two years now since she last faced the camera as a model — "I cannot even remember which ad I did last" — her face is far from forgotten

Which is perhaps why UTV picked her out to present one of its newest projects for Star Movies, Bol Bollywood, a film-based programme beamed thrice a month

To Rachel herself it is an experience — "an embellishment on the side" — though being a TV personality is not on her list of priorities.

She prefers to think that the transition for her is from modelling to ad filmmaking, the ropes of which she is learning from Kunal Kapoor of Adfilmwallahs.

Dressed in a workday outfit of baggy T-shirt and jeans, she seems to have slipped rather well into her new avatar. "I was here editing until five this morning," she says sitting in the midst of what looks like a load of debris in the studio of Adfilmwallahs, face showing no evidence of the late night. "I've never had so little sleep in my life!"

She is certainly not complaining. After all, she longed to see the view from the other side of the camera even when all she was asked to do was preen for it. "I was always out there trying to absorb what was going on around me That was my buzz," she says

Years ago, when she was a student of psychology at St Xavier's College in Bombay, she dreamed of becoming a teacher for the hearing handicapped She did it, too, for two years but then gave it up as the job didn't pay enough to make ends meet and she desperately wanted to be independent So modelling it was "though I never really liked it"

One of the reasons being that she finds it a dumb profession. "Models are simply told what they have to do and they have to deliver accordingly Also, a lot of models discover that they can get by on the basis of their bodies and looks so they don't develop any more than that.

"After all, doors are opened for them just because they are beautiful so their self-development gets arrested But of course, there are a fair amount of models around who aren't dumb at all"

Television, she does not think, requires much more intelligence either, unless one is compering a show, doing a review or something similar "But as a host or an anchorperson there is not much difference from, say, doing a photograph The only real difference is that here you're talking," she says, adding quickly, "But of course, that can make all the difference"

Her own lines for Bol Bollywood, she says, are scripted in advance Bol Bollywood, which is a half-hour show, comprises film clips, interviews, in-depth stories about various aspects of the film business, the top five films in India and the top five films in Hollywood

In Rachel's own words it is a "fairly complete review of what is happening in the showbusiness for both India and the rest of the Star TV world."

She herself is not much of a Hindi film watcher though she admits it would perhaps have helped if she was "It is a bit embarrassing to anchor a film programme without knowing much about Hindi films," she says, "but then one of the advantages of being in the glamour profession is that I am in the know of who's doing what in the film world."

As for acting, she would rather leave alone that option as she "simply cannot act Even as a model that was my greatest handicap."

In the future she would like to open an exclusive restaurant "which would be a cool place to be in". And it would be right up her street, too, as she loves both eating and cooking.

Marriage, however, does not figure in her plans for the moment at least. "I don't want to get married for the wrong reasons — because I'm insecure about my looks, or bank balance or my society status," she says. "I would do it only if the person inspires me to want to marry."

And when will that be? "I don't know. I'm willing to wait!"

COVER STORY

NOBEL WORKSHOP

From Milton Friedman to Robert E Lucas, the University of Chicago has produced eight Nobel laureates in economics who have had a phenomenal influence on the subject as well as governments the world over Dipankar Bhattacharyya traces the history of the university to see how the American system creates such centres of excellence

THE GOTHIC CAMPUS ON CHICAGO'S crumbling South Side has a reputation as a dreary place. A recent survey of fun schools placed the University of Chicago last among 300 colleges. Early this month as news that Robert E. Lucas, a Chicago professor, had won the 1995 Nobel Prize for economics filtered into the campus, university president Hugo Sonneshein crowed, "In Chicago, this is how we have fun."

Lucas is the eighth Nobel economics laureate from the university, which has had more winners of the prize than any other university in the world.

His name now figures in a list designed to turn the ivy a shade greener along the East Coast — Milton Friedman (1976), Theodore W. Schultz (1979), George J. Stigler (1982), Merton H. Miller (1990), Ronald H. Coase (1991), Gary S Becker (1992) and Robert W. Fogel (1993).

Robert E. Lucas

Lucas is perhaps the last of the when-not-if Chicago economics Nobels, though others stand a pretty good chance — Eugene Fama for empirical finance, Thomas Sargent for work on learning and monetary policy and Lucas again for growth theory

So what makes Chicago tick?

The president of the Swedish Academy has pointed out that Americans, by and large are so successful (over half the economics Nobels awarded so far have gone to Americans) because they have the benefit of the organisation of American universities which receive large amounts of public money for research, and spend it effectively

Appointments and promotion in these universities are made genuinely on merit, a merit judged exclusively by published research The American vogue for "publish or perish" has been an enormous benefit for the human race

Money and motivation, motivation and money But that is true of the American education system Not enough to explain the University of Chicago's track record What does Chicago have that other American universities lack? Quite simple actually A school of thought A distinct Chicago school took shape in the Fifties The are two central theses : a policy position and a method of studying economics The policy position is the more commonly recognised element of the school and has, over the years, been labelled variously as monetarism, conservatism and sometimes, Friedmanism, after its principal architect, Milton Friedman

Friedman, a student under two great economists Frank Knight and Jacob Viner, at the university in the Thirties, returned to Chicago as a member of the faculty in 1946 A highly regarded technical economist till then, Friedman based his new prophetic role on a piece of economic theory called the Quantity Theory of Money.

He advocated that if a government confined itself to a single means — the growth rate of money supply — there was no need for any other action Inflation would be low and stable, unemployment would settle to its "natural rate" and the economy would grow at a desirable pace

There are two other legs on which the Chicago school stands Both established by Friedman First, a strong defence of laissez-faire Second, a closer look at the micro-foundations of the economy

The Nobel committee recognised Friedman's contribution to economics

Inside the campus

in 1976 It has been recognising the contribution of the Chicago school ever since

Lucas, Stigler, Coase, Becker and Fogel have, in their respective areas, either reinforced the Chicago school or used its methodology to arrive at critical insights into economic phenomena

Lucas used rational expectations to buttress Friedman's argument that the inverse relation between unemployment and inflation breaks down once people get over the surprise of changed circumstances Stigler's work on information in price theory argued for less industrial regulation.

Coase came up with a strong argument for reducing the role of the state even in areas where the market mechanism fails

Becker expanded economic analysis to sociology, politics and criminology His theoretical structures are, however, built on individualism and market equilibrium — two very strong Chicago school traits And Fogel, the historian, argued that slavery was an efficient economic system

The string of Nobels to Chicago

faculty is, therefore, regarded by some as endorsement of the school's two main messages "Markets are marvellous" and "Democratic socialism destroys democracy"

But the endorsement has not come without a price "Fascist" is among the many labels Friedman has had to wear

As the King of Sweden handed him his prize, there were riots outside the chamber These were mainly due to the spectacular service Friedman was said to be giving to the then government of Chile

Nobel prizes are fine, but what of the evidence on the ground? After all, a theory and its allied policy stand or fall by its applicability in the real world

And the evidence is overwhelming According to a recent United Nations survey on global investment, 21 countries (including such champions of market economics as India, Vietnam, Egypt, Nicaragua and Uzbekistan) liberalised their ownership rules in the early Nineties Another 16 substantially eased their approval procedures for foreign investments

More than 70 countries are reckoned

CHICAGO LAUREATES

Robert Lucas (1995) Lucas set himself the task of showing how a Phillips curve — the idea that high inflation and low unemployment go hand in hand — can appear even in an economy where markets clear (in other words, where any unemployment is "voluntary"). In 1973 he published "Some International Evidence on Output-Inflation Trade-offs".

The paper concentrated on the distinction between changes in prices overall and changes in the pattern of relative prices. It showed that if firms mistake a rise in overall prices for a rise in the price of the good they produce, they will increase their output. To get this result Lucas had assumed, almost in passing, that expectations are rational. With Lucas's paper New Classical Economics was born.

Robert Fogel (1993): In 1974 Fogel co-authored a book, Time on the Cross: The Economics of American Negro Slavery with Stanley J. Engermann. The book argued that slavery, despite its immorality, was a profitable and efficient system. Fogel's conclusion, which caused an uproar at that time, held that slavery languished because of politics, not economics, and that slaves were better treated than historians had thought.

Fogel and Engermann, in a way, pioneered the idea of a "value-free" approach to economic welfare. Fogel and Douglas North, with whom he shared the prize, are the first economic historians to be honoured by the Nobel Committee.

Gary Becker (1992): Becker is the leader of extensions of economic analysis to non-traditional fields He applied economic theory to such thorny subjects as family, racial discrimination and crime and punishment. Becker was able to analyse problems such as the choice between the number and quality of children (quality being the amount spent on each child for health, education and other items)

He predicted that hasty marriages by the very young will be less efficient matches than those reached after extensive search (dating). Becker's A Treatise on the Family (1982) had as much impact on sociology as it had in redirecting economists to the study of human capital

Theodore Schultz

Ronald Coase (1991): In 1960 Coase published The Problem of Social Cost He argued that, as a rule, no form of government action is required to deal with externalities or public goods There is no need for taxes, subsidies and public production, and so long as property rights already exist, there is no need for energetic policies to shift them around

The article caused a rethink in microeconomics, a rethink that is still on. It spurred the growth of a distinct new branch of the subject called "law and economics". And it converted many more economists to the liberal, anti-interventionist wing of their trade.

Robert Fogel

Merton Miller (1990): All roads in the modern theory of finance lead to 1958 and Franco Modigliani and to have embarked on major privatisation programmes during the past 10 years In 1985-90 roughly 130 state-owned enterprises were sold every year And by end of the Eighties, on one estimate, global privatisation proceeds summed to nearly $200 billion

From Chicago in the Fifties to India in the Nineties, the school's message has had a tortuous route, needing as it did, political support to popularise it Friedman launched his "counter-revolution" at a time when Keynesian prescriptions on managing the economy had become dogma

Exhilarated at being at the beginning of a new movement, John Maynard Keynes's followers simplified his theory extremely to increase its accessibility to politicians Offered an attractive course of policy (increased government spending and larger deficits), politicians lapped it up without seriously questioning it

The trend was intensified in the Sixties Keynsians gave way to a more liberal view of government, the primary proponent of which was John Kenneth Galbraith The liberal view called for an even greater role of the

Miller There is no escaping the Modigliani-Miller (MM) theory. The MM paper made two distinct breakthroughs

First, it proved that the value of a firm is the same regardless of whether it finances itself with debt or equity The idea is startling it suggests that the corporate treasurer who agonises over how to raise funds is actually wasting his time

Second, the paper established a new economic methodology The article appealed directly to the law of one price, which says that two entity that economists had regarded as equaliser of prices in competitive markets. There is a cost in time and energy for both buyers and sellers to seek out the best bargain

Stigler's theory, apart from explaining the array of prices one comes across for any commodity, also redefined the role of advertising. Advertising, till then regarded as a necessary evil, proves to be an extremely efficient means of providing the modern consumer much of the information he needs, and is as essential for the concept of human capital

Schultz is credited with applying modern methodology to issues of underdevelopment

Milton Friedman (1976) An article assessing Friedman's contribution to economics to merit his getting the 1976 prize lists 245 publications, including 26 books No single person has done more to damage the neo-classical synthesis than Friedman In 1968 he showed that if inflation is expected there is no trade-off between inflation and employment as William Phillips's

Milton Friedman

George J. Stigler

similar assets must cost the same. This method of proof has since become the backbone of financial economics.

George Stigler (1982): Stigler, in 1960, looked into the economics of information. Information, according to Stigler, is itself a commodity that is produced and [illegible], not the freely available competitive firms as for monopolies

Theodore Schultz (1979): Schultz shared the 1979 prize with Arthur Lewis for his work in economic development Schultz focussed on agricultural economics and the nature of poverty in agrarian economies. His work spawned enormous amount of research into famous curve postulated.

A Phillips curve only appears, and then briefly, when the economy's expectations are upset Once the economy gets over its surprise, Friedman insisted, the Phillips curve breaks down It did. The Seventies added a new word to the economists' vocabulary: Stagflation — high inflation and high unemployment.

Money and motivation, motivation and money. But that is true of the American education system. Not enough to explain the University of Chicago's track record. What does Chicago have that other American universities lack? Quite simple actually. A school of thought. A distinct Chicago school took shape in the Fifties. The are two central theses: a policy position and a method of studying economics government in the economy, more regulation and a further step away from free markets It helped that John F Kennedy was a student of Galbraith's at Harvard — he took the American government to a new plane of activism

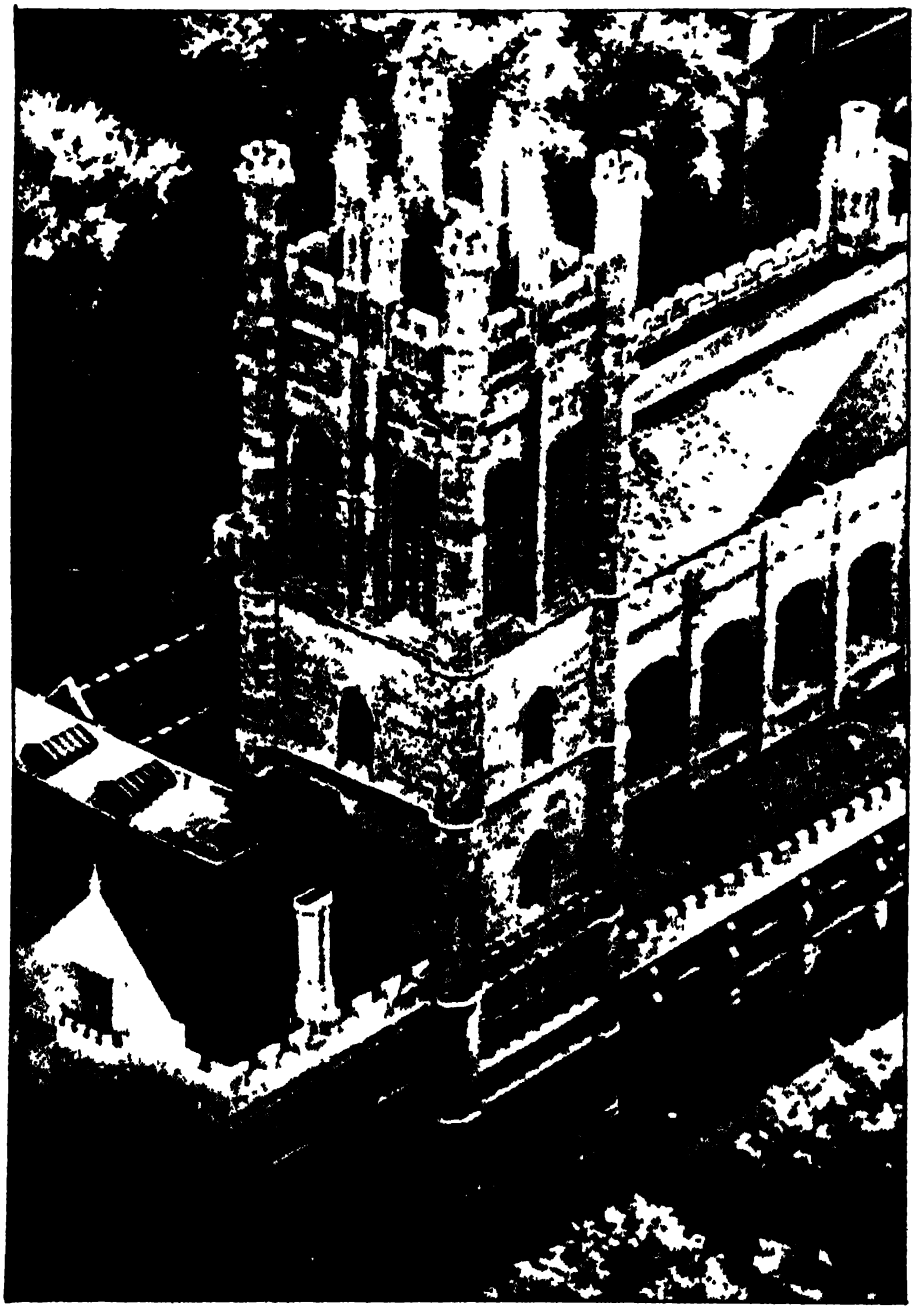
By the Seventies, the cracks began to appear In the mid-Seventies, fuelled by the discontent of the up-market classes and ignited by oil price rises, there was massive reversal of policy fashions in favour of monetarism, the effects of which are with us still today Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher were the high priests Friedman and Freidrich von Hayek, its prophets

By the time Reagan came to power, the new conservative order had reached centre-stage Fed up with weak-kneed liberalism, the people wanted a change In the event, they got Reaganomics — the economics of joy

Reaganomics failed Conservatism did not Across the Atlantic, Thatcher was experimenting with the same chemicals - - monetarism, free markets and lesser role for the state But where Thatcher recognised the cost of the objectives being pursued and was willing to pay them, Reagan denied that the objectives had any costs



Thatcher's experiments with monetarism yielded mixed results Her panacea, privatisation, caught the world's imagination

Once a school of thought is established,the recruitment of new faculty tends to reinforce its central tendencies This may be due simply to the practice of recruiting scholars sympathetic to the school's views Coase, Miller and Fogel reflect this tendency Each of them did his prize-winning work someplace else

But another force is even stronger. In the last two academic generations, Chicago has offered positions to Paul Samuelson, James Tobin and Robert Solow, and to a still younger group of economists· Robert Barro, Stanley Fischer and Dale Jorgenson Most of the members of this distinguished list declined because they felt they would be immersed in an alien intellectual environment.

Schools emerge in response to scientific need That must mean they serve an important scientific function — to bring together a group of scholars who share a common view of the proper direction of their science. In the Nobel electors' assessment, it would appear, Chicago has fulfilled this role wonderfully. ■

USP, WHAT'S THAT?

Bikram Vohra on the mind-boggling, tongue-twisting world of ad jargons*

These days I spend a lot of time with people in the wonderful world of advertising listening to their very special language

I have never been so intimidated in my life

I met this lady the other day and she said, "We are doing a market segment study for maximum brand equity assessment after which we shall use our findings for market leverage"

I said, "Oh"

She said, "Then we are going to create dissonance in the end user mind about competitive brands, it has been seen that dissonance is a far more result-oriented approach than USP"

I said, "I was glad to hear that since I never particularly liked USP anyway"

She said, "USP was highly overrated"

I said, "Sod USP"

She said, "Meet Neil Noronha, he's a marketing analyst in consumer in psychographics"

I said, "How nice, how do you feel about USP?" (Never let it be said that Vohra is a quitter)

He said, "USP is now dated and the new marketing synergies were aimed at generating long-lasting product lifecycles"

She said, "He's really good at what he does, Neil has just completed a major campaign on coffee"

"That's nice," I said, saying "That's nice" being about the best defence I could come up with against camouflaging my complete ignorance of what USP stood for.

He said, "We achieved 77 per cent brand penetration through multimedia strategies by aiming at the core target audience"

I said, "That's ni "

Then I stopped myself and said, "What was the message?"

He said, "Anytime is coffee time"

I said, 'Oh,"—that being the second best defence I could come up with I began to feel rather like a sprinter in a long distance marathon, realising he just could not keep up with the longhaulers I mean, you can't keep saying, "That's nice" and "Oh" and expect to compete with people who can straightfacedly say things like, "the psychographics behind the latest user profiles indicate faulty weaning at childhood"

Neil was now talking about above the lines and below the lines and she was looking at him like spaniels look at people, all wet and adoring and Neil was spouting on about test marketing some rubber tubes by the blind testing method and I said, "I do a column called Between the Lines but no one paid any attention to me

I said, "It is a pretty nice column, people like it"

They paid no attention

I said, "It even has market leverage"

He was prattling on about the impact of current demographic trends on the urban market

I said, "It's a great column, will someone listen to me already?"

He said, "The print media is fast becoming obsolete as an option for brand distribution, our agency only recommends POP for consumer items"

Abashed, I said, "Oh"

How do you confess you don't know what POP is

By being honest, I guess

"What's POP?" I say

He says, "You don't know what POP is, hey folks listen to this guy, it's so refreshing, he doesn't know what POP is"

People floated towards us

"You don't know what POP is?" said one

"He doesn't, he really doesn't," said another

My wife said, "I don't know him, he is not with me"

And the lady I was talking to in the very beginning said, "Maybe he is one of those anti-POP freaks who goes in for DMS"

I said, "Yes, yes, I love DMS, I am a total DMS man"

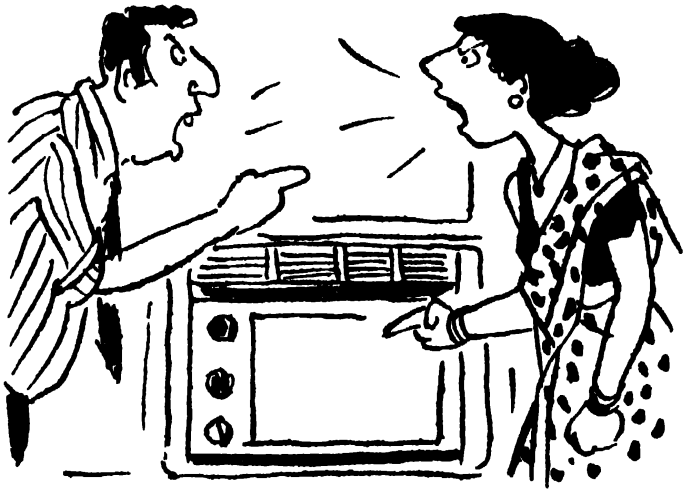
Now, what the heck is it? ■

TALKING SHOP

TO AC OR NOT TO AC

Marriages are made or broken by the air-conditioner in the room
Rumu Raychaudhury discusses the cold vibes emanating because of it*

Everyone knows in an old marriage the air blows hot and cold But never in their wildest dreams would our forefathers have imagined that the sharing of the sacred marriage bed would be determined by the air-conditioner!



I am yet to meet a couple who agrees to the same temperature in the room, and more and more couples are opting for separate bedrooms, not because of the husband's secretary, but for the chill and comfort of their individual requirement

Some find this unexpected liberty quite pleasant and some do not, but on the whole, I must say the marriage vows should have a few more clauses added to it Not only should the husband and wife stick together through thick and thin, (which is also a bone of contention in the present day and age when the couple reaches middle age to fight the battle of the bulge), they must agree to share the room with the same temperature, to watch the same channel, because these are the issues that seem to disturb the peace in the nest

Let us look at an apparently successful couple who may be in their thirties Boy meets girl, falls in love, and gets married They do not have a decent earning with a yearning for more material pleasures in life So both work hard to build a nice modern home with the amenities they have dreamt of Slowly, they move to a decent flat which may be their own or may be rented

After a long day they both get into bed, discuss their plans for the future, the things they want to buy, the trials and tribulations of the day, and life passes by Eventually, the time comes, when they have acquired their colour TV, VCR, fridge, oven and now, they consider the air-conditioner as well, and buy one

But the problem has already started With age and maturity, each has developed a personality of his own and neither one of the couple wants to give in or adjust to the other's requirements

Before,the pleasure of watching their own colour TV together was a treat, but now the husband's or the wife's personal choice becomes more important When the AC came in the bedroom, the novelty of being able to control the temperature was important, may be the morning chill brought them closer But now, the issue of who likes the room cooler becomes important enough to go and sleep in another room rather than to sleep with the spouse and to feel comfortable in each other's touch

But this is just the outward manifestation of certain feelings which run deep With the onset of age, a distinct personality emerges, the question of individual likes and dislikes has grown stronger It becomes a prestige issue to compromise, and the hairline crack becomes more prominent with every passing day

May be then, this is what life is all about People do not see their nearest ones clearly enough and take them for granted without paying much attention to what is good in the partner and get bugged by even a small mistake Little gestures suddenly expose the frustration, and the dislike, we feel naked and cheated

We buy all the new, exciting material gadgets to fill our void like the children and that wish-fulfilling tree mentioned in a parable The children asked for sweets, along with it came stomach ache They asked for toys they got boredom, bigger and better toys brought even bigger boredom in their wake

One exemplary couple did not realise they had stopped looking at one another It was so nice at the beginning when after dressing up, each one waited for the desire and pride in the other's eye But the time has come when the wife dresses for the other women she will meet and the husband does not bother much, for after all, she is just the wife

At this point, if they could rewind their lives like a video tape and look back, try to remember the nice things which attracted each other, the troubles they have shared, the kindness they have shown one another, they may find that their partner is still the lovely person one fell in love with The time and stress may have made them a little tired, but they are the same human beings with just a few changes which, if dealt with compassion and care, can still create a bond of a lifetime and they will not have to face the loneliness of growing old alone in a crowded world ■

March 21 - April 20

Ganesha says a mixed grill of childbirth, education, research, journey, loans and funds, specially the last four days and afterwards, makes this an interesting week Many Ariens will be pleasantly surprised by the number of things they will be doing at the same time

Taurus

April 21 -May 20

Just the right week for marriage, official engagement, collaborations and partnerships at all levels On the work frontier, your battle cry will be attack and crack There is real danger of misunderstandings and consequent heartburnings

Gemini

May 21- June 20

The moon's first quarter favours artistic pursuits, matters related to romance, travel, children, hobbies and speculation For the unemployed or the underemployed, the next 23 days will be mighty lucky Health safeguards are essential

Cancer

June 21 - July 20

Time to use your creativity to the full Time also to bag a contract, get money, buy a lottery, secure loans, invest and buy/sell to some advantage Many Cancerians will be working overtime the next 55 days in a frantic effort to finish pending work

Leo

July 21 —August 21

Marriage, partnerships, links, ties, in short, any sort of alliance, is what the week is all about, as well as, the next one Venus and Uranus in happy formation, will lead to changes in the home for sure Also, a job needs to be done, and done well, and you are fully aware of it

Virgo

August 22 September 22

Two trends run almost parallel The use of media for spreading the message and the news and secondly, buying, selling, house, property and land It is this movement which will result in contacts and gains It is absolutely necessary for you Travel, too, is on the cards

Libra

September 23 - October 22

Mercury still in your sign helps you to think clearly, go where the gravy is, take mighty fine chances and get work done Sports, children, entertaining, amusements, shares, debentures and good living will entice you We live only once and why not live it up? Exciting week

Scorpio

October 23 - November 22

Venus, love, luxury, money, comforts, vehicles are in excellent formation with Neptune, planet of inspiration and intuition Therefore, time to charm the world into your way of thinking Many of you will be changing course midstream or at least adding a string to your bow

Sagittarius

November 23- December 20

Your dual nature will come out now in this fashion You will be pure and serene like a mustard seed on the point of a needle, at the same time you will be actively engaged in journey, publicity, communication, property, signing of deeds and documents, legal and practical affairs

Capricorn

December 21—January 19

Move fast the first four days and clear away as many debatable points as you can After that, you might get stuck in a groove Ganesha claims this is an important time for finances, buying, selling, shopping and of course family affairs Health safeguards are essential

Aquarius

January 20- February 18

The moon's first quarter in your sign makes you valiant and vivacious Be it work or play, you will grab the goodies with an almighty effort Time also to start a venture, an enterprise, probably in partnership It would be best to avoid too many distractions on the way

Pisces

February 19—March 20

While this week could be expensive, rest assured people will come around and care for you Do expect visitors, foreigners, relatives, friends to visit you or you them. In either case, there will be a meeting point This is a week to eat, meet and enjoy Good for business and for you

B I R T H D A Y S

October 29: Moon-Neptune conjunction favours writers, teachers, entrepreneurs, media persons, industrialists, businessmen, editors and journalists

October 30: Moon sextile Mars-Jupiter leads to phenomenal success in investments, research, manufacturing, banking and investing. Your foresight will take you to the top.

October 31: Venus-Uranus sextile signifies victory after struggle, triumph after battle. Be creative, use your fertile imagination, be not afraid of voicing your opinion

November 1: Moon-Mercury trine does require an extra effort to make real good in life and as long as you are prepared for it, Ganesha says happiness and success will follow.

November 2: Moon trine sun, conjunction Saturn means it is all a question of cultivating the right attitude. Be positive Children give joy.

November 3: Venus-Pluto conjunction means long term benefits regarding money, arts, love and romance, erection of factory, building complex, and so on November 4: Moon-Mars trine leads to energy, luck, contacts and by using these three wisely and well, you will, obviously, be a smashing success.

RUSKIN BOND'S  COLUMN

WHEN I SAW HER STANDING THERE

When I was at college, I used to spend my summer vacations in Dehra, at my grandmother's place I would leave the plains early in May and return late in July Deoli was a small station about 30 miles from Dehra, it marked the beginning of the heavy jungles of the Indian Terai

The train would reach Deoli at about five in the morning, when the station would be dimly lit with electric bulbs and oil-pumps, and the jungle across the railway tracks would just be visible in the faint light of dawn

Deoli had only one platform, an office for the station-master and a waiting room The platform boasted a tea stall, a fruit vendor, and a few stray dogs, not much else, because the train stopped there for only 10 minutes before rushing on into the forests

Why it stopped at Deoli? I don't know Nothing ever happened there Nobody got off the train and nobody got in There were never any coolies on the platform But the train would halt there a full ten minutes, and then a bell would sound, the guard would blow his whistle, and presently, Deoli would be left behind and forgotten

I used to wonder what happened in Deoli, behind the station walls I always felt sorry for that lonely little platform, and for the place that nobody wanted to visit I decided that one day I would get off the train at Deoli, and spend the day there, just to please the town

I was 18, visiting my grandmother, and the night train stopped at Deoli A girl came down the platform, selling baskets

It was a cold morning and the girl had a shawl thrown across her shoulders Her feet were bare and her clothes were old, but she was a young girl, walking gracefully and with dignity

When she came to my window, she stopped She saw that I was looking at her intently, but at first, she pretended not to notice She had a pale skin, set off by shiny black hair, and dark troubled eyes And then, those eyes, searching and eloquent, met mine

She stood by my window for some time and neither of us said anything But when she moved on, I found myself leaving my seat and going to the carriage door, and stood waiting on the platform, looking the other way I walked across to the tea stall A kettle was boiling over on a small fire, but the owner of the stall was busy serving tea somewhere on the train The girl followed me behind the stall

"Do you want to buy a basket?" she asked "They are very strong, made of the finest cane "

"No," I said, "I don't want a basket "

We stood looking at each other for what seemed a very long time, and she said, "Are you sure, you don't want a basket?"

"All right, give me one," I said, and I took the one on top and gave her a rupee, hardly daring to touch her fingers

I watched her as the platform slipped away. She was alone on the platform and she did not move, but she was looking at me and smiling. I watched her until the signal box came in the way, and then the jungle hid the station, but I could still see her standing there alone....

As she was about to speak, the guard blew his whistle, she said something, but it was lost in the clanging of the bell and the hissing of the engine I had to run back to my compartment

The carriage shuddered and jolted forward

I watched her as the platform slipped away She was alone on the platform and she did not move, but she was looking at me and smiling I watched her until the signal box came in the way, and then the jungle hid the station, but I could still see her standing there alone

I sat up awake for the rest of the journey I could not rid my mind of the picture of the girl's face and her dark, smouldering eyes

But when I reached Dehra, the incident became blurred and distant, for there were other things to occupy my mind It was only when I was making the return journey, two months later, that I remembered the girl

I was looking out for her as the train drew into the station, and I felt an unexpected thrill when I saw her walking up the platform I sprang off the foot-board and waved to her

When she saw me, she smiled She was pleased that I remembered her I was pleased that she remembered me We were both pleased, and it was almost like a meeting of old friends

She did not go down the length of the train selling baskets, but came straight to the tea stall, her dark eyes were suddenly filled with light We said nothing for some time but we couldn't have been more eloquent

I felt the impulse to put her on the train there and then, and take her away with me, I could not bear the thought of having to watch her recede into the distance of Deoli station I took the baskets from her hand and put them down on the ground She put out her hand for one of them, but I caught her hand and held it

"I have to go to Delhi," I said

She nodded "I do not have to go anywhere"

The guard blew his whistle for the train to leave and how I hated the guard for doing that "I will come again," I said "Will you be there?"

She nodded again, and as she nodded, the bell clanged and the train slid forward I had to wrench my hand away from the girl and run for the moving train

This time I did not forget her She was with me for the remainder of the journey, and for long after All that year she was a bright, living thing And when the college term finished I packed in haste and left for Dehra earlier than usual My grandmother would be pleased at my eagerness to see her

I felt the impulse to put her on the train there and then, and take her away with me; I could not bear the thought of having to watch her recede into the distance of Deoli station. I took the baskets from her hand and put them down on the ground. She put out her hand for one of them, but I caught her hand and held it

I was nervous and anxious as the train drew into Deoli, because I was wondering what I should say to the girl and what I should do I was determined that I wouldn't stand helplessly before her, hardly able to speak or do anything about my feelings

The train came to Deoli, and I looked up and down the platform, but I could not see the girl anyhere

I opened the door and stepped off the footboard I was deeply disappointed and overcome by a sense of foreboding I felt I had to do something, and so I ran up to the station-master and said, "Do you know the girl who used to sell baskets here?"

"No, I don't," said the station-master "and you'd better get on the train if you don't want to be left behind"

But I paced up and down the platform, and stared over the railings at the station yard, all I saw was a mango tree and a dusty road leading into the jungle Where did the road go? The train was moving out of the station, and I had to run up the platform and jump for the door of my compartment Then as the train gathered speed and rushed through the forests I sat brooding in front of the window

What could I do about finding a girl I had seen only twice, who had hardly spoken to me, and about whom I knew nothing — absolutely nothing — but for whom I felt a tenderness and responsibility that I had never felt before?

My grandmother was not pleased with my visit after all, because I didn't stay at her place more than a couple of weeks I felt restless and ill at ease So I took the train back to the plains, to ask further questions of the station-master at Deoli

But at Deoli there was a new station-master The previous man had been transferred to another post within the past week The new man didn't know anything about the girl who sold baskets I found the owner of the tea stall, a small, shrivelled up man, wearing greasy clothes, and asked him if he knew anything about the girl with the baskets

"Yes, there was such a girl here, I remember quite well," he said "But she has stopped coming now"

"Why?" I asked "What happened to her?"

"How should I know? said the man 'She was nothing to me"

And once again I had to run for the train

As Deoli platform receded, I decided that one day I would have to break-journey there, spend a day in the town, make enquiries, and find the girl who had stolen my heart with nothing but a look from her dark, impatient eyes

With this thought I consoled myself throughout my last term in college I went to Dehra again in the summer and when, in the early hours of the morning, the night train drew into Deoli station, I looked up and down the platform for sign of the girl, knowing, I wouldn't find her but hoping just the same

Somehow, I couldn't bring myself to break-journey at Deoli and spend a day there (If it was all fiction or a film, I reflected, I would have got down and cleaned up the mystery and reached a suitable ending for the whole thing) I think I was afraid to do this I was afraid of discovering what really happened to the girl Perhaps, she was no longer in Deoli, perhaps she was married, perhaps she had fallen in

In the last few years I have passed through Deoli many times, and I always look out of the carriage window, half expecting to see the same unchanged face smiling up at me I wonder what happens in Deoli, behind the station walls But I will never break my journey there It may spoil my game I prefer to keep hoping and dreaming, and looking out of the window up and down that lonely platform, waiting for the girl with the baskets

I never break my journey at Deoli, but I pass through as often as I can

MOONBEAMS AND VENOM

It was Sharadpurnima and I and my companions had all forgotten that Kalidas lived such a very long time ago I sat on the ground, reclining on a cushion so as to see what the poet saw when he wrote of Autumn, "The moon, the eye's delight, captivates all hearts with aureoles bright, Bringer of Joy, showering beams cool as snowflakes, it consumes the limbs of women pierced by the poisoned arrows of separation from their husbands"

Yes, something there has definitely been lost in translation But Sharadpurnima doesn't need any translation because it is the same then as now, the same "cloudless sky inlaid with the moon and countless stars" The full mon rises broad yellow and then becomes smaller and intensely white Its light gradually floods and transforms the landscape It banishes all formless shadows The bushes in the nearby field which had looked like Neelgae were now clearly bushes after all Far denuded hills and a wide lake stood revealed This light does not strain the eyes There's no need for sunblock or dark glasses You became more wakeful the higher the moon climbs By midnight you can read a book in its light

Suddenly there came a cry

"Snake!"

We should have leaped up to help, but somehow we were too relaxed to react Peacocks cried Kalidas wrote, "The dance-display ended, Love deserts the peacocks" He was right. By Sharadpurnima they have bred and their young have grown to half the adult size

On the slight breeze came the fragrance of the harsingar which Kalidas seems to have known as sephalika and which is also identified with parijaat — the tree of paradise produced at the churning of the ocean

I have read that at its root lies a pot of amrit, from which the moon sips each night as she waxes Then from purnima onwards, the moon showers amrit on us, and itself gradually wanes The Vishnu Purana, though, tells the story of a princess called Parijataka who unwisely fell in love with the sun. He soon deserted her and in despair she took her life and was cremated The harsingar grew from her ashes and casts its white and coral flowers in the morning as it cannot bear the sight of the sun This story offers the reason for the tree's Latin name, arbor-tristis — the sad tree But in yet another legend, Krishna brought it from heaven, which is why its flowers are used in worship

"Snake! Snake!"

Finally I roused myself, got up and took a torch just in case I walked across the garden to the entrance of the simple house where we had come to watch the moon The lady of the house was standing looking terrified at a flight of steps, half hidden in shrubbery

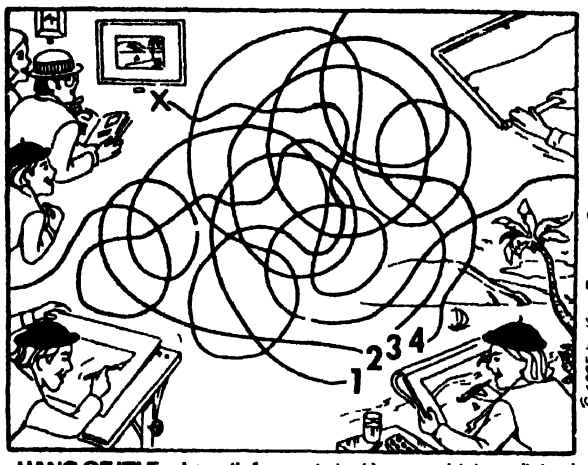
"I nearly trod on it," she said, her eyes wide with fear "If it hadn't twitched, I would have been done"

I shone my torch into the small patch of darkness near the wall where the snake had removed itself It lay in coils, blue-black with the most beautiful white-yellow bands It twitched again and slowly uncoiled and slid into the bushes I had never seen anything looking so visibly venomous

"Krait!" I cried in joy, thrilled that I had finally seen India's most deadly reptile, whose venom is 10 times as powerful as that of the cobra

My hostess looked even more shaken and was not at all comforted when I assured her that God obviously did not want her to die yet My fellow guests, an urban lot, I admit, poured scorn on my identification, indicating that it was the only snake I knew the name of I was so pleased with the sighting that I didn't reply, as I might have, that at least I was trying to get to know plants and animals and their seasons How else can you appreciate the world where wise men like Kalidas have never drawn any line between man and nature?

A woman from the nearby village came up and affirmed that in her world of nature "kire bahut hain" These "worms" hung from arches, crept into houses, crawled on to charpoys and were generally a great nuisance However, no one had been bitten lately



The next morning I consulted some snake books and was very pleased I'd kept quiet and not talked back to my critics as if I knew better than them I was ignorant after all There is, you see, another snake, and a harmless one, the wolf snake, which looks very much like the common krait and likes to live in houses The two can be told apart by their fangs and the hexagonal scales on the krait's back But much as I love nature, I don't think I'd have risked annoying the Sharadpurnima snake by examining its back or the lie of its fangs!

'Snake! Snake!' Finally I roused myself, got up and took a torch just in case. I walked across the garden to the entrance of the simple house where we had come to watch the moon

PLUS & MINUS BRAINTEASE

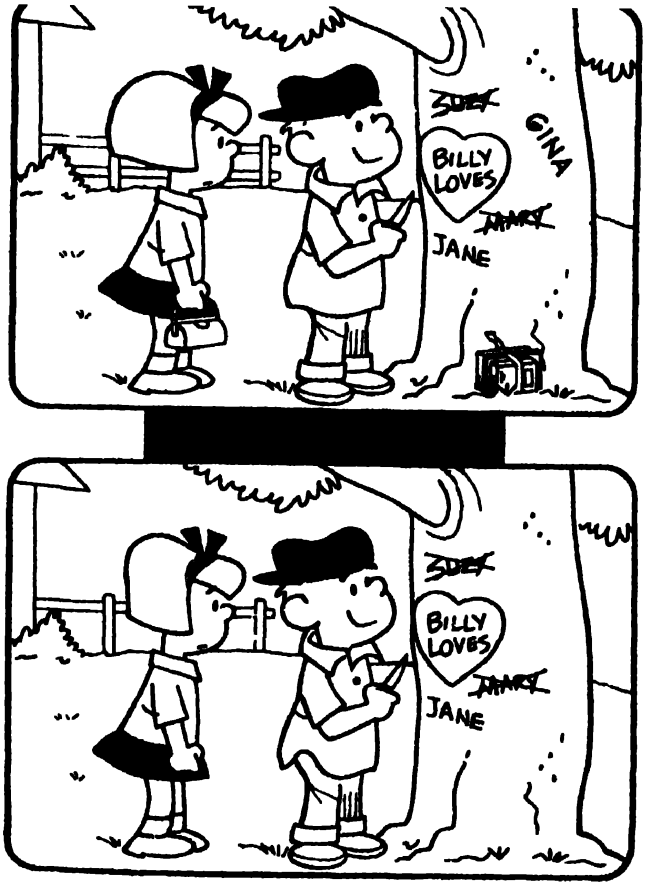
TRY this problem in simple arithmetic. You are asked to:

Rearrange positions of numbers 1-9 so that a three-digit amount in the 600's at top will equal three times the amount in the middle, and top row minus middle will result in amount at the bottom.

Each of the nine digits is to be used just once. Simple?

How quickly can you arrive at answer?

Time limit is two minutes.



Answer: 657 minus 219 = 438. Will do it.

WELL VERSED!A one-word answer to this classic charade may be deduced from its descriptive verse and/or letters in the crystal ball below. My FIRST is won and never lost reversed 'tis now, take heed. STREEP TEASE

With romantic roles a rarity for actresses on the wrong side of 30, is Meryl Streep, along with the current crop, stripping for the script or for the role? Trina Mukherjee finds out

Recently the Philippines banned a movie on grounds of 'vulgarity' and 'bad taste' The movie was The Bridges of Madison County, starring Clint Eastwood. And the 'offensive' actress was none other than Meryl Streep

The leading lady, who is just short of acquiring Grande Dame status by virtue of her Protean screen portrayals, had indignant Filipinas rushing for cover

The controversial scene showed Streep undressing in front of the mirror, scrutinising her body and wondering whether she is still desirable or not

Streep is a fine performer and need not pay obeisance to priggish piffle But did the script merit such exposure? Or was it a sad display of desperation? Romantic roles are a rarity for actresses on the wrong side of 30 And Streep is not 30 anymore

Streep, being a versatile actress, has every right to strip, strut or tease, no questions asked But did she end up treading the oft-trodden path in Madison County? It would be a pity for the gutsy lady who once dared to be different, now, merely daring to bare

Ironically, her stance is a neat round-up of the success formula-cum-predicament of the Hollywood women of the Nineties Prodigious sex appeal; the sweet flush of youth, a certain elusive quality that passes as 'star presence' And, of course, an inclination, if not the ability, to be an intelligent actress

Meryl Streep. Hit or miss?

The 'real' love goddesses, exuding unfettered sexuality, are a thing of the past Rita Hayworth, the quintessential sex icon of the Forties mesmerised her admirers with her Latin sensuality and ballerina grace

The Fifties saw a skirt-blown Marilyn and the sylphic Brigitte The two of them mastered the art of body language to such an alarming perfection so as to transcreate the definition of feminine sexuality

Liz Taylor added a shade of rust to their white hot sex appeal with her earthy presence and credible performance

The choice, perhaps, was not always between 'meaty' roles and 'carnal' ones It might have been both Marilyn's flair for comedy, Liz's magnetic screen presence and Brigitte's vulnerability spoke along with their erogenous facets

Liz may have hesitated before enacting a call girl in Butterfly 8 It required less deliberation for Julia Roberts when she agreed to star in Pretty Woman

By then, Hollywood was ready for its new female archetypes The lost, pretty woman being wooed by the glamour-weary tycoon was the new fairytale of the Nineties, or, the bold sexually agressive woman of today For Julia, Pretty Women was her ticket to stardom and her subsequent image — gullible, docile young thing nextdoor who also dares to react For the likes of Stone or Demi, it was just scratch, snatch and scramble. At this stage of their life and career, the bolder the role the better.

Meryl might have opted to do the 'steamy' scene in Madison County because she was "bathed with tears" after she read the script. For her it was "the script, script and the script" that mattered. Not so, Demi Moore or Sharon Stone who had more basic reasons to opt for similar roles.

Moore, the 'star bitch', whose persona, as observed by one of her critics, "is that she is very much in touch with her own sexuality" had offered more than that in films like Ghost or A Few Good Men The movie lovers sat up to appreciate her sterling performances as a vulnerable as well as a strong-willed woman who battled super-natural and worldly elements with aplomb

Yet going by the 'Grab 'em when they come, give 'em what they want' rule left her competing for Basic Instinct The part finally went to Sharon Stone who gave an excellent display of various parts of her anatomy combined with 'I look sinister' expressions pasted on her face Was it voyeurism or eroticism? No one knows for sure But the movie was a sure success

Sharon Stone: Lady long legs

Demi Moore with Woody Harrelson in Indecent Proposal

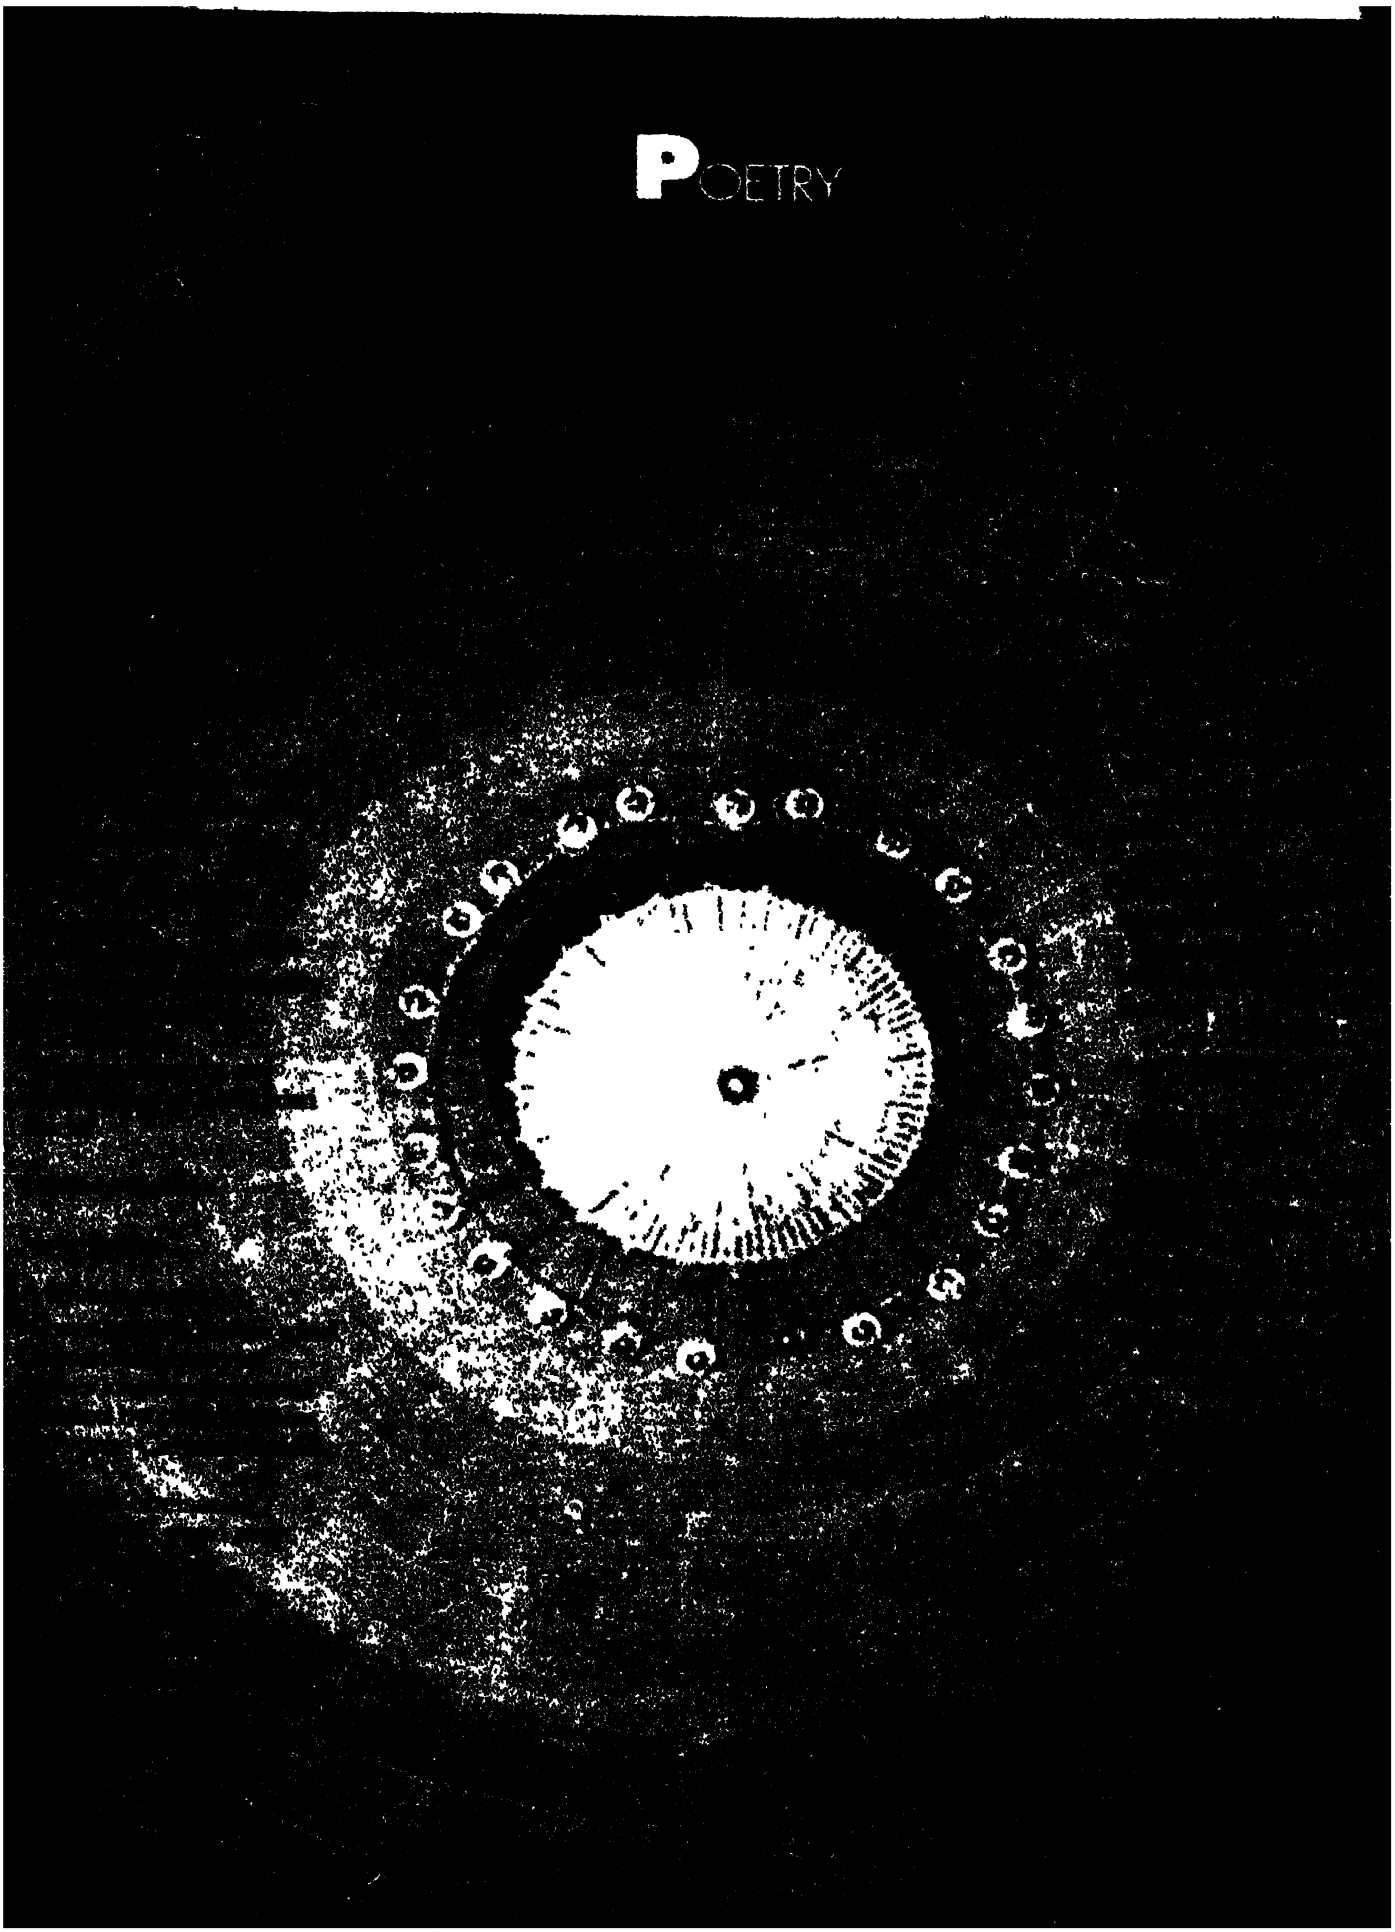
In similar movies, there was nothing new to expect; sexuality shorn of all enigma or mystery — frothy escapades, phallic humour, dispassionate snogs comprised a soggy but tangy diet for an average moviegoer

However, Demi proved that she is capable of surprises. She gave a high wattage power show when she decided to sleep with Robert Redford for a million in Indecent Proposal or maul Michael Douglas in Disclosure She plans to do some "great things" as she prepares herself to play the adulteress Hester Prynne in a screen adaptation of the novel, The Scarlet Letter But right now, she is all set to streak her way to $12.5 million in the movie, Striptease, which has a fantastic storyline of a desperate mom taking on a stripper's job to raise the money to fight a custody battle!



Demi is reaping her share of plum roles while the sun shines brightly and winter is a few autumns away. So did Meryl when she portrayed several interesting women with foreign accents and tragic pasts in memorable films like The French Lieutenant's Woman, Sophie's Choice, Holocaust, A Cry in the Dark. This is not to say that a Demi Moore is a Meryl Streep or vice versa But it is merely a reenactment of Jill-goes-up-the-hill-comes-tumbling-after syndrome of tinsel town

Hollywood had always been cruel to older actresses Meryl should know Actresses like Jane Fonda, Jessica Lange or even the bewitching Cher are more heard of than seen on screen Glenn Close has to survive by playing a nasty nyphomaniac, out to devour a happily married man (who else but Michael Douglas) and his happy family in Fatal Attraction

Yes, Meryl does know: "I'm aware that most movies are written for women in their twenties and thirties. the ones in their thirties get the richest and most interesting parts. And for women in their forties, it's a hit and miss "

So the lady is willing to play the game by its rules She feels, "as a mother of, now, three young daughters, I don't want Pretty Woman to be their idol That's just for titillating 20-year-old men " But going steady at 45, she has had to make her pick of the season when there might not be many Madison County may be her way to seduce the mainstream audience They would surely be confronted with a mercurial actress who can still call the shots and strips only for the script ■

Survival

The baked road of survival
zigzags through the jungle of tattered lives and gets lost in the horizon.
Animals, dumping their souls behind,
hurry towards a mirage
in the guise of human form.

I, a man, have to feign to be a hard-boiled brute to drag the hefty cart of existence
Or I've to accept the fate
of a rubbish heap in a bazaar corner to wait for the municipal dumper.

A Passage To Eternity

Two unmoving lungs
And a pair of open eyes
Which no more
Allow light into them
Are enough to say
Somebody is dead

The soul's silent journey
Is like the flying of a bird
To perch on a twig
Or on a mountain top

The temple's priest Prepares for the evening's rites

Black shadows dance
In the dark room of

The departed soul
When the lamps on the Candelabrum glow
Brighter and brighter

The wailing of the bereaved widow
Dies out
Amid the deafening cymbals
And tinkling of temple bells

Who is then to stop
The go of the World —
God? Or Man?
Or a third Force yet to come?

POSTMORTEM

Salil Lives

■ Salil Chowdhury possessed certain qualities which set him apart from other music directors in Bombay as well as Calcutta ('Symphony No More', September 24).

Only the late Sudhin Das Gupta had some of his attributes. Naushad, Hariprasad Chaurasia and Shiv Kumar Sharma's tributes were actually a journey down memory lane

But none of the articles mentioned Salil Chowdhury's two very memorable creations Ganga and Lal Pathar

In the early Sixties, Rajen Tarafdar made Ganga based on a Samaresh Bose novel for which Salil Chowdhury composed songs like Aamae dubaili re, aamae bhashaili re and Ichha kore parandare gamchcha dia bandhi

Dekona more dekonago from Lal Pathar still lingers.

How true the saying is Mortal man, immortal melodies!

P.K. Sinha,
Giridih (Bihar)

■ Salil Chowdhury's inspiration for the first few bars of Itna na mujhse comes not from Mozart's Ninth Symphony as Chandan Mitra claims, but from the opening bars of the first movement (Molto Allegro) of Mozart's 40th Symphony in G minor.

Salil Chowdhury was one of those very few Indian composers who drew inspiration from Western classical music, another notable example being the instrumental interlude in the Bengali song, Ei je sabuj banabithikae which adapts the beginning bars of the first movement of Beethoven's Sixth Symphony (Pastoral) in F major

To call this plagiarism would be a fallacy. On the contrary, he was one of those rare masters of music who could aesthetically adapt tunes and motifs from different masterpieces.

Rajarshi Sengupta,
Calcutta

■ Dil se dil ki dore bandhi is a Mukesh number and not sung by Dwijen Mukherjee

Ittefaq was not the only B R Chopra film for which Salil Chowdhury scored the music. The BR banner engaged him for Kanoon (1960) and Chhotisi Baat (1970) Incidentally, Kanoon was also a film without a single song

Balraj Sahni's voice may have matched Manna Dey's, but it sounds rather contrived when Chandan Mitra tries to establish this being the only reason for Manna Dey's inclusion in films like Kabuliwala and Do Bigha Zamin Incidentally, in neither of these films Balraj Sahni's playback singer was Manna Dey (The songs were in the background)

Lastly, it was not Mozart's Ninth Symphony, but the 40th in six minor which inspired Salil Chowdhury to compose the evergreen number, Itna na mujhse

Debasish Deb,
Calcutta

■ In remembering Salil Chowdhury, Shiv Kumar Sharma points to the dangerous trend in the film industry of lifting tunes from Western melody

He may call it "blind plagiarism" but he should not ignore the conditions in which music directors function nowadays In the Fifties and Sixties music directors had to cater to a select group of audience who were not swayed by an overwhelming Western influence

The market was less competitive and the shelf life of any creation was longer

Today, Bombay has become so competitive and so frighteningly materialistic that if you cannot produce something new every other day, you are put on the backburner

Syed Tajdaar Bakht,
Calcutta

Jayanta Mahapatra will be abroad for a while. Readers may please send their poems to him after the third week of November.

COVER STORY

COME TOGETHER

Paul McCartney breezed into a suite at the Four Seasons Hotel in New York and immediately had all the Evian water removed to protest the fact that the French are conducting nuclear tests in the South Pacific He smiled "It'll be our little boycott" McCartney then sat for a frank talk with Jeff Giles Drink up

Paul McCartney A day in the life

Would The Beatles Anthology have happened if John Lennon were alive?

I don't think so It could have really been very difficult This is conjecture, but I think it would have been OK with me and John And I think Ringo certainly would have been OK with it I had managed to make my peace with John a good few months before he was killed George hadn't I'm not sure whether they were not talking or what it was But George did his big book, his life story and he (barely) mentioned John in it

And John was upset

Naturally, upset George is a very forthright character He just says what he thinks And I, in fact, to tell you the truth, he wasn't really keen on Free as a Bird He was saying to me, "I sort of felt John was going off a little bit towards the end of his writing"

I personally found that a bit presumptuous, but I don't think we ought to get into that because this is going to sound sour I felt that John was always a great writer Some of our early songs weren't massively meaningful Some of his later songs weren't, maybe, massively meaningful, were rather romantic and sentimental But he still had something for me

When you talked with John towards the end, what did you talk about? Children?

Yeah, and we talked about him baking bread And I'm quite, you know, kind of domestic I'd been married for a little while, I had some kids So we talked about his children And, with Sean, John finally saw what

ROLL OVER BACH, TOO

The three surviving Beatles have joined again after 25 years to produce The Beatles Anthology, a collection of new songs from their archives, including an unfinished John Lennon number. Jack Kroll says the group's arrival in the Sixties was the most thrilling creative surge in the history of pop culture

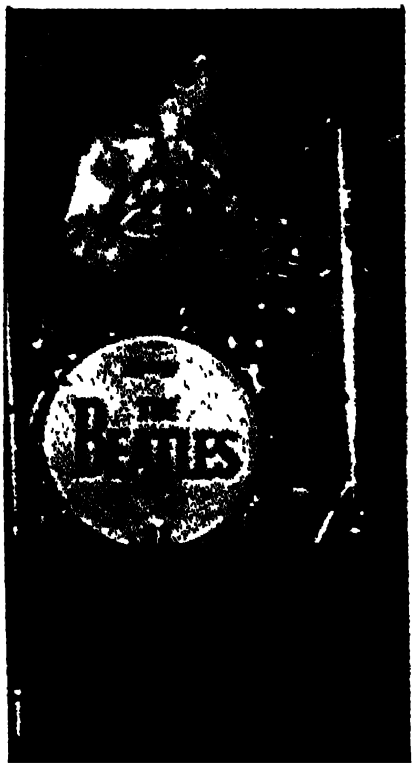
Were you there?
If not, you really can never know.

Amazement must be experienced firsthand, and the coming of the Beatles was an amazement

Girls screamed, the captions in Newsweek's February 24, 1964, cover story read "eeeeeeeeeee .EEEEELFEEEEE - EEEEEEEEEEE!" And the London Times music critic praised the Beatles' "pandiatonic clusters" and "flat-submediant key-switches"

Both reactions were perfectly appropriate, the Beatles were blowing minds and nervous systems

And cash registers



On their first US tour, two entrepreneurial types bought the pillowcases on which the four moptops had reposed in a Kansas City hotel and sliced them into 160,000 tiny squares, which they sold for a dollar each

The girls were screaming not at key-switches (which the Beatles, who could not read music, arrived at instinctively) but at things like the "Yeah, yeah, yeahs" in She loves you, delivered by Paul McCartney and George Harrison

But what linked the screechers and the scholars was a sense of something new, an absolute freshness that the Beatles manifested musically and personally. Those early songs—I Want to Hold Your Hand, Please Please Me—were both sexy and innocent.

Like those two "pleases", the first a polite supplication, the second a verb vibrating with sexual possibility A British writer described the band as "beat-up and depraved in the nicest possible way."

That is a perfect description of

Ringo Starr. Playing a new beat rock-and-roll charisma But what made the Beatles the key pop artists of the Sixties was the synthesis that they made out of almost every conceivable pop element

Both John Lennon and Ringo Starr hailed their hometown of Liverpool as a crucible, a port city that brought together Irish, Blacks, Chinese and sailors coming from America with blues records Clubs and pubs jumped with the sounds of country and Western, British music-hall songs and rural folk tunes.

The classical composer and critic Wilfred Mellers said that the Beatles, like "other geniuses such as Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, knew the right time and place to be born."

The Lennon-McCartney songs were mini dramas that evoked a wide spectrum of emotion

McCartney's Penny Lane and Strawberry Fields Forever (coupled on one amazing single) conjured up their lost worlds of childhood, Paul's a "very strange" Utopia, John's a place where "nothing is real/and nothing to get hungabout."

In less than five years the Beatles produced a series of albums of increasing complexity, notably A Hard Day's Night, Rubber Soul, Revolver and Sgt Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band The album's climactic number, A Day in the Life, is the Beatles' peak achievement

"What's so great about Art?" demanded critic Nik Cohn, insisting that the Beatles "have flown away into a limbo" In a review I compared A Day in the Life to T.S Eliot's apocalyptic poem The Waste Land

In his illuminating survey of the Beatles' career, Revolution in the Head, Ian MacDonald rejects the comparison

He says of A Day in the Life "The fact that it achieves its transcendent goal via a potentially disillusioning confrontation with the 'real' world is precisely what makes it so moving "But that splendid sentence is also a succinct summation of The Waste Land."

What the Beatles did in the Sixties remains the most thrilling surge of creativity in the history of pop culture They obliterated distinctions of high and low, like Chaplin, like Buster Keaton, like Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington.

They made it clear that if art is to survive in the techno-millennium that looms ahead, it must be hooked into the realities and redemptions in the days of our lives.

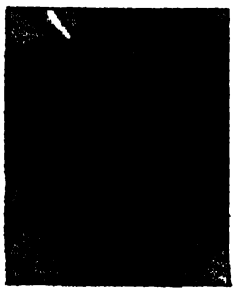
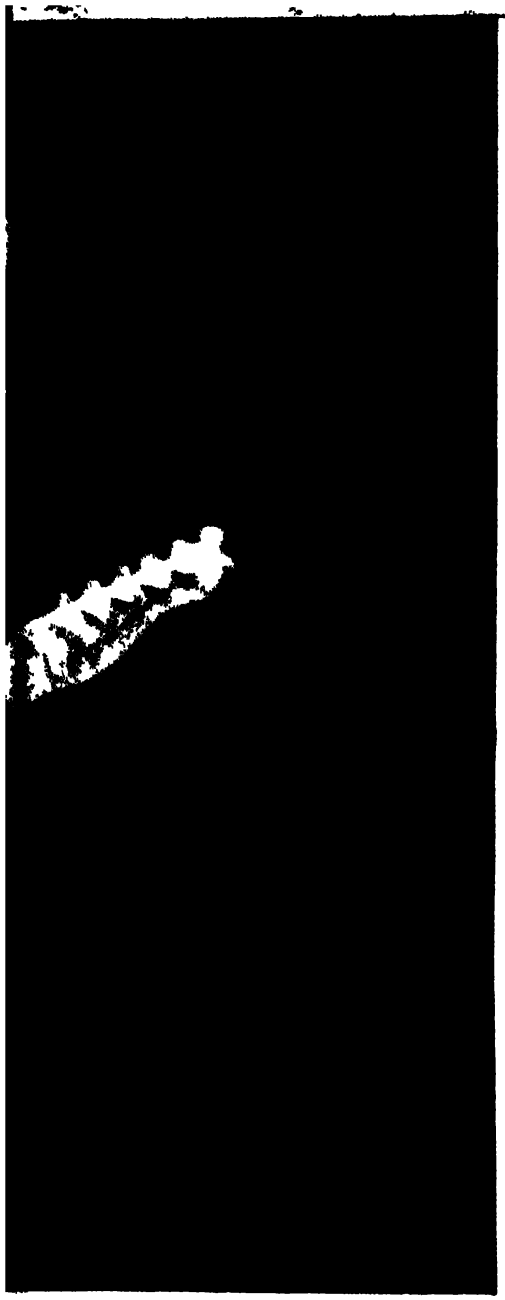
George Harrison The forthright one parenthood was about He finally understood the joy of being with your kids

Your upbringing made you more comfortable with children.

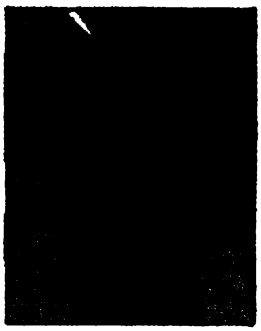


We were once on a Greek island on a holiday, and we were on a boat It was George and Patti, John and Cynthia, me and Jane Asher, I think And Julian was along. I played with Julian most of the trip We'd run around the deck playing cowboys and Indians — bang, bang, you're dead, or whatever — and Julian loved it And I remember John coming up to me

In fact, it was one of the most poignant moments of our relationship He took me aside and said, 'How do you do that?" And I couldn't tell him You either know how to do that stuff or you don't Well, luckily, towards the end of his life, John had found out how to do it



So he talked about his cats and padding around doing the dishes in his robe and making bread and playing with the baby We just had those great kind-of-nothing conversations which are so precious



Yoko's family recently visited your family and everybody recorded a song together. When I talked to Yoko about it the other day, she said, "You know, they've raised beautiful children, and that's a lot."

It was lovely of her to say that because we've had such sort of crap

I felt that John was always a great writer. Some of our early songs weren't massively meaningful. Some of his later songs weren't, maybe, massively meaningful, were rather romantic and sentimental. But he still had something for me

Yoko will still talk about the Lennon Camp. She still has to guard her end of the whole thing. But about the kids: that is absolutely true. And I'll tell you something else. All the Beatle children are good kids, man. They are such good kids over the years Mainly just because of business, I mean Yoko will still talk about the Lennon Camp She still has to guard her end of the whole thing But about the kids that is absolutely true And I'll tell you something else All the Beatle children are good kids, man They are such good kids.

People were surprised you were all spending time together.

Yeah Because of all the crap that has gone down, it seemed impossible When they were staying at our house in the country, they stayed the night And it was very weird, but wonderful, for me to sort of wake Yoko in the morning You know, "Good morning! There's a cup of tea for you in the other room!" And to see Yoko sort of waking up sleepy in her nightdress It was a major culture shock for me But

John Lennon: A dream come true?

Funnily enough, in his early days, John was very much wondering how he would be remembered. And I said, 'You're crazy, man. What are you talking about? Number one, you'll be remembered as something fantastic. Number two, you won't give a ____'

it was very nice We'd never have been so warm and friendly

Here comes a tacky question.

Good

Michael Jackson owns the publishing rights to Lennon/McCartney catalogue, which some view as a travesty. When he was under investigation for child molestation, I remember wondering if he'd go broke and have to sell the songs to you. Did that thought cross your mind?

Yep! You know, it would be lovely It would be right for me to be able to get back something of the songs because we were ripped off not by Michael, but we were ripped off in the beginning and he bought a ripoff contract The problem is that I have written to him three times and he hasn't replied And I'm the only employee of the company now I've been with the company 30 years!

I put a lot of time in, man So I feel a little bit like some sort of dishwasher in the backroom writing to the boss and saying, "You want to notice me, man? I've been washing dishes here a long time Hello?" Which is crazy of course

I think Michael separates business from life, and it's not always a good idea I would like him to do something because I think he's historically placed He's the one guy who could recompense this whole thing But what the hell, who cares? Life's too good You can't just go bitching all your life

Your're a music publisher, but you specialise in dead people.

You're not s anybody, and you don't get people ringing you up at three in the morning asking you what you're doing to promote their new record In fact, Linda and I were rung up once by Pete Townshend This was a long, long time ago And Pete said, "Hey listen, you're doing such a good job with Buddy Holly Will you take my publishing?"

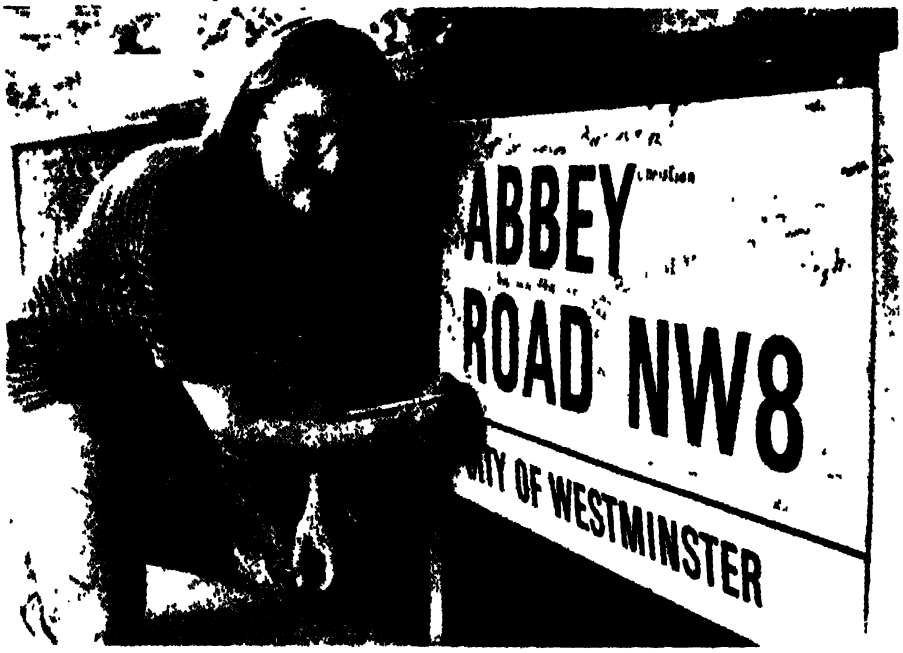
And I was so tempted Sorely tempted, was I! But we suddenly got these images of Pete ringing up out of his skull — because he did go on some benders - - and saying, "What the are you doing with the publishing, man?"

Another tacky question. Lennon is in the Hall of Fame as a solo artist. You haven't been nominated.

Which Hall of Fame in this?

This would be the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The Baseball Hall of Fame? I'm in Beatles. Yeah! Yeah!



The Beatles and their manager Brian Epstein meet Princess Margaret at the premiere of their film Help

I think Michael [Jackson] separates business from life, and it's not always a good idea. I would like him to do something because I think he's historically placed. He's the one guy who could recompense this whole thing. But what the hell, who cares? Life's too good. You can't just go bitching all your life

Fans seek this address in London for the Beatles were pictured crossing this road for their Abbey Road album that!

Seriously, how could this have happened?

I'm not really sure, actually We are in it as the Beatles, of course, and that's kind of enough, isn't it? I mean, a million times in my life I've like, not passed an exam or someone's beat me in something All the Beatles, for instance, are MBEs, Member of the British Empire Except John, who sent his back

It s the lowest honour you can have from Britain It's the lowest, George Martin's got a higher one than we have There's a guy who's a deejay called Jimmy Savile There's Andrew Lloyd Webber All these people are sirs Sir Cliff Richard But you can't sit around saying, "God, I wish they'd make me a sir " Or, you know, "I wish they'd put me in the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame " I'm not that fussed, you know? I'm in my hall of fame

You've got to deal with yourself Funnily enough, in his early days John was very much wondering how he would be remembered And I said "You're crazy, man What are you talking about? Number one, you'll be remembered as something fantastic Number two, you won't give a You'll be in the cosmos somewhere And I have a feeling that other things will be of more consequence at that point "

TALKING SHOP

MIXED CHAT

Who said women are the only chatterboxes? Men are equally fond of nattering and they do so at the expense of other things, says Mandira Mitra

As a Bengali living in Calcutta, adda is the ruling passion of my life, everything else can go to damnation

That, in a nutshell, is my husband's philos-autobiography, if he could ever extricate himself from those interminable gab sessions and sit down to write it Which, of course, is a remote possibility Nothing in his life is considered to be more, or as, important as his adda The family, the wife, the job — all pale into insignificance before it

The worst part is that he realises that I do not appreciate it, but he carries on irrespective I have, of course, done my best to wean him away in every possible way I have threatened to walk out on him and even to divorce him But nothing works

Once after a rather stormy round of 'discussion' on the subject in which he came out second best, he quoted a couplet from Daag, the well-known Urdu poet

Hazrate Daag jahan baith gaye, baith gaye,
Padne lagi jootiyan, uth na sakey, ainth gaye

(Once the honourable Mr Daag parks himself somewhere, he strikes roots there, Even when given a drubbing with shoes, he cannot extricate himself for he is stuck there)

Obviously, this poet and my husband belonged to the same miserable specimen of human beings with a gift of the gab Which is one of the reasons why I do not think very highly of poets, the next reason being that they put things in a roundabout way, which is stupid and wholly unnecessary

No wonder my husband loves reading poetry And carries on his awful adda sessions I end up making tea 10 times a day for him and his cronies who are up to no good I am, of course, a staunch feminist at heart, a fan of Germaine Greer and all that, but there you are

During the Pujas, my place turns into a virtual club house People come and go all day, till midnight An unceasing babble issues from the drawing room Voices rise and fall Heated arguments break out Guffaws rattle the window panes One can hear occasional snatches of Rabindrasangeet, for the motley group comprises all kinds of performers

Once, I found a tribal young man doing the Chhou dance amid the forest of chairs God knows where he came from, or who brought him There are mercantile executives, clerks, traders, writers, singers, dancers, politicians, painters, doctors, diplomats, actors, directors, journalists, publishers, and others, who presumably do nothing worth the mention, among those who grace my drawing room regularly And all of them will turn up in droves during the holidays when they have nothing better to do than sit and wag their tongues interminably Any other woman in my place would have upped and left long ago (that's how I have often heard my mother threaten my father)

Bengalis, as a community, have little time for organised religion The males of the species have even less to do with religion than us women They seem to treat the Puja days as a time for merriment No devotion, not a thought spared for the Mother nothing of the sort They simply laze around and talk I wish Professor Henry Higgins had seen them in action He would have revised his opinion and would have thought twice before posing the question, "Why can't a woman be more like a man?"

Unable to cure my husband of his foible, I had, at one stage, joined him and participated in a few of those adda sessions A lot of information could be gleaned which, however, did not give me high hopes about the future of my conjugal life

Apparently, these adda sessions are an integral part of our community life, and have been so, for donkey's years All our great writers and artistes have been addabaaj by nature My husband goes ga-ga while talking about the historic *adda*s which are believed to have inspired some of the greatest poetry and fiction in Bengal The ancestral house of the Tagores was a venue of literary and musical *adda*s

There is that famous photograph showing Tagore himself relaxing on a chaise-lounge while Gaganendranath and two others are lolling on the floor That, I am told, was the culmination of a prolonged adda

Syed Mujtaba Ali has written about *adda*s in the Udayan house in Santiniketan's Uttarayan complex He recalls an occasion when the poet cracked a joke and the others did not know how to react The things that happen in all-male company!

Mujtaba himself was a great addabaaj in his time In Calcutta, he stayed with the Mukherjees on Ritchie Road where he was the soul of a lively adda Many of his characters were inspired by these, and the leisurely mood of the adda permeated many of his widely-read pieces

But much earlier, there were those famous *adda*s of equally well-known literary groups which brought out magazines like Parichay and Kali-O-Kalam Sudhindranath Dutta, Buddhadev Bose and their contemporaries were all adda addicts Rajshekhar Bose (Parasuram) had his own adda at his Parsibagan house These gatherings have figured in his stories as the adda in a mess in Habsit agan Lane where the great Kedar Chatterjee spun those unforgettable yarns for the consumption of the *babu*s of the mess

That Premendra Mitra was not immune to the charms of *adda*baaj is evident from the stories of Ghanada, who presides over another mess bari Narayan Gangopadhyay's Tennyda and Gour Kishore Ghose's Brajada used to hold forth at *adda*s The Kallol group of writers had their own adda while in our own times, the tradition was kept alive by Sunil-Shakti's Krittivas group Creativity, apparently, has as much to do with the tongue as with the pen

The Pujas have always been an occasion for holding prolonged *adda*s, but their character has changed over the decades Time was when the great *babu*s hired nautch girls and organised nightlong *mujra*s in the jalsaghar, where the aroma of attar mingled with that of alcohol And if Bimal Mitra and others of his ilk are to be believed, these *babu*s were feckless characters Debauchery was their idea of fun

When I was a little girl (and I am not going to tell you how old I am), I lived in a small suburban town A *sarbajanin*Puja used to be held close to our house, and nothing can compare with the fun we had! It was the practice in those days to build the image in the pandal, behind a screen

From the day the clay-modellers arrived, we visited the place daily to watch the image being made The big day was when Durga's eyes were painted The image really seemed to come alive! Stalls mushroomed around the pandal The *adda*s in the pandal started a few days before Mahasasthi Adults sat in groups all over the place It was quite boring, of course, because most of them were talking politics most of the time We girls had our own adda, comparing notes on Puja shopping, and all that was yet to be bought My husband maintains that women still discuss the same topic at Puja pandals Men!

Well, you cannot expect the good things of life to last forever, and our salad days are soon over But I have been lucky In Calcutta, I have settled down in a housing estate where the Pujas are always great fun

During the festive days, the wives participate in the morning preparations and assist the priest accompanied by a lot of chin-wag You cannot help it with so many women around! There are separate *adda*s for the men, the boys and the young girls in the pandal While musical soirees and plays are held in the evenings during those days, the adda sessions continue unabated

On Mahasaptami evening last year, I had dropped in for half an hour to witness the proceedings at my drawing room The adda was being held in small groups on topics of earthshaking import In one corner, a well-known singer and a journalist were arguing over the need to free Rabindrasangeet from the clutches of the Santiniketanites "Those are the people who made life miserable for Debabrata Biswas, the journalist roared 'to hell with them'" The singer shot back that the so-called liberals were out to ruin Rabindrasangeet

My husband, who takes pride in being a champion of wildlife, was trying to convince someone of the importance of protecting tigers His companion was quite sceptical and opined that all tigers should be kept in the zoo because they turned maneaters at the slightest provocation Three others discussed cricket in one corner A gentleman I have known for years, sat alone, browsing through a book He was not reading it I knew it He was a publisher and whenever he found a book, he inspected the quality of its printing, paper and binding

After about a couple of hours, he would inevitably come to the conclusion that the book had been produced badly and that he could have done a much better job of it It was only then that he would condescend to drop a few lines, after which he would pick up another book and repeat the performance

There was this film director, who was enthusiastically explaining to a reluctant audience of two, the fine points of making a low-budget film "You could actually shoot a 20-minute episode for the TV in four shifts, and that cuts your costs drastically," he said One of the two then asked him why he did not make art films Which made him very angry indeed

Yet another group was discussing Hindutva and the future of the country The consensus was that it was quite bleak I could not help wondering why they wasted so many words on something that was common knowledge

The one person who seemed to be enjoying himself the most was a gentleman who was snuggled in a quiet corner, snoring peacefully He was totally impervious to the racket of the drums outside and the incessant chatter inside the room

But who said women are the only chatterboxes? Men are equally fond of nattering In fact, they do so at the expense of other things

My husband tries to justify it by saying that sustained chatting not only relieves tension, but also stimulates the brain and enables one to take on the stresses of life I hit back with a quote, though I could not recollect where it was from "But far more numerous was the herd of such/Who think too little, and who talk too much' He was stumped He retorted with one from Lewis Carroll The time has come, the walrus said To talk of many things Of ships and shops and cabbages -- and kings --/Of why the sea is boiling hot --/And whether pigs have wings

"So that is what your adda boils down to?" I asked him "Spending hours to decide whether pigs have wings, or some such nonsense!" He changed the topic quickly ■

ALL IN THE FAMILY

Forgetting faces or names can be embarrassing. Sunayana Gupta on some of the gaffes absent-minded relatives tend to commit

They say "Frustration is looking for your glasses without your glasses" But what would they call it, if you are looking for your glasses with your glasses? My great grandfather possessed such a steely and authoritarian a personality, that no one could see him in the eye while speaking to him (it at all one mustered courage to speak in his forbearing presence) One day, he had to be escorted home from his office by an orderly

Silence descended and everyone waited apprehensively for an outburst The explosion did come and he had everyone running amok looking for his glasses The tidy house looked ransacked, but the coveted stuff still eluded the hands of the search party More effort was put into this job than any treasure hunt ever It took only an outsider, blissfully unaware of his irascible temper, to point out in his own timid way, that the glasses lay securely perched where they should be — on my great grandfather's nose

Illustriously of the same lineage, his daughter is better known within the family circle and outside as a glorious flagbearer of forgetfulness Misidentifying people, going for weddings and returning with someone else's slippers on her feet, came to be accepted as mundane by her family members

A washerman would come to her place once every week to collect soiled linen for washing One day, after he had been given the dirty clothes from the hamper and the requisite payment done, he continued to linger around Much irritated by his now obtrusive presence, she curtly asked him to leave After slight hemming and hawing, he apologetically pointed out that his rubber slippers were on her feet

Things started happening during another visit of the washerman to the house The bunch of keys to the locks of the main door, almirahs, et al were not to be found After a lot of futile hunting, it suddenly struck my grandmother that the washerman must have nicked the precious bunch She told all who cared to hear that this man would sneak into the house (to rob, obviously), the moment she locked and left it (On being asked how she would lock the house without the keys, she was rather peeved)

She went up to the washerman, who was totally unaware of what lay in store for him, and ordered him to stand up Having little or no option, he relented She commanded, "Arse kudo" (jump like this), which in her opinion was the most foolproof method of detection Seeing the stricken look on his face, she demonstrated the exercise and the clang of the keys was distinctly audible They had been secured in the corner of her saree pallu and promptly forgotten about The harassed washerman left in a huff I wonder if he ever came back

My aunt's father had once attended a wedding wearing a freshly pressed dhoti over the one he had already been wearing He had not felt awkward nor had we noticed any incongruity

Forgetfulness must be running in the family and my aunt is a champion of sorts Forgetting faces, confusing names is an everyday affair with her and we have learnt to live with it She would sit in the cab and take it upon herself to direct the cabbie Everytime she wanted him to turn into a bylane, she would desperately wave her left hand and call out, "Right, right", the driver, unable to solve the ambiguity, would come to a screeching halt

She outstripped everyone in the race one day, when she went out alone Having found a cab parked right across the street and the driver beside it, adjusting the meter, she opened the driver's door, hauled herself into his seat and slammed the door shut The driver, too bewildered to react, slowly approached her and meekly murmured — "Mashima, eta amar jaiga" (Madam, this is my seat) It was then that she realised what she had done and quickly got off to get into the rear seat And for those who think that she must be used to driving, let me tell you, she cannot drive

Talking about my Dad, he, too, keeps the banner flying high The other day, he went to a chemist's shop and bought some medicine Instead of taking what he had bought after paying for it, he picked up the paper weight lying on the counter, put it in his pocket and turned to leave The shop owner, a silent spectator to this ridiculous scene, smilingly called out, "Dada ota apnar nov, apnar eta neen" (Sir, that is not yours, you take the medicine)

The gem is yet to come, and this from my Dad's mama (maternal uncle) For a chemistry (theory) paper in high school He had to enumerate the preparation of sulphuric acid No amount of chewing his pencil stub or scratching his forehead would help because he had overlooked the topic while studying for the test

Well known by his folks for his ready wit, he chose to face the problem squarely He scrutinised the boldly lettered word Sulphuric and hey-presto, the answer lay in the recesses of the word itself

Sulphur + ic = Sulphuric

Simple

All set for the challenge, he started drawing on a fresh sheet of paper with a flourish A massive cauldron had the words SUI PHUR printed on it, and moving towards it were men, bent doubly by sackloads of IC on their backs This they poured into the cauldron and you had Sulphuric Acid in a jiffy And here was a simplistic, homespun method of manufacturing H_2SO_4

Days later, following an uproarious scene in the staff room, the principal called him to the office With a deceptive smile on his lips, he called the student to know which scientist (from India or abroad) had discovered such an original formula of H_2SO_4, as visually depicted in the paper The only name which came to his mind and seemed to carry significant weightage was 'Hartley Davidson', and the words came tumbling out [Hartley Davidson were known for their motorcycles] God save Davidson!

The principal asked him to go back to his class room before breaking into fits of uncontrollable laughter He did not dare to ask the discoverer-of-sorts what IC was ■

ADMISSION OPEN

Aries
March 21 - April 20

Your best bet is attack after planning a strategy Those interested in sports, films, photography, have a field day This is the right time to fuse business and pleasure, says Ganesha The last three days turn out to be mighty eventful for Ariens

Taurus
April 21 — May 20

Like mighty Tendulkar, the Taurean, you too will sail through the opposition and ultimately reduce it to pulp Journey and ceremony should please the cockles of your heart If in for an interview or a test, the results should be gratifying Be bold

Gemini
May 21 — June 20

Do not be upset by any undue pressure, or delays, or cancellations Finally, matters do work for you and work out splendidly The full moon helps you in your finances, loans and prayers You will have cause to remember your ancestors A trip is on the cards

Cancer
June 21 — July 20

Take time by the forelock, get work done, socialise, be of good cheer, take the lead and go for victory with a capital You will be like a finely tuned piano, a delicately adjusted sitar in matters of love and creativity It is certain that things will work out for you

Leo
July 21 — August 21

Once again, you will be up to your eyes and ears in work It will be duly appreciated You may have much to do with parents and in-laws Home, shop, office and renovation will also take up your time and energy Please expect news from a distant place

Virgo
August 22 — September 22

Those of you who are interested in research, marriage, education, films, commerce, computers, do very well You will set up a fast pace and others will have difficulty coping with it At interviews, conferences, meets, you will be able to give your best and thus win applause

Libra
September 23 — October 22

You will have much to do with loans, finances, transactions and perhaps legal issues as well Soon, it could be engagement time or even wedding bells for you What you do now will have a ripple effect Time for travel, conferences and socialising on a massive scale

Scorpio
October 23 — November 22

There will be the urge and the pressure to perform, to outshine and outdo others Mars will help you considerably to do so Alliances and paradoxically, separations are emphasised this week, because of the full moon A journey or an outing with a stop-over is probable

Sagittarius
November 23 — December 20

While health could be a bit of a problem, rest assured that you will recover, go in for a possible job-hop and work extra hard Ganesha says loans and debts have an extra edge to it Behind-the-scene-activity will be of tremendous importance

Capricorn
December 21 — January 19

You will be just a wee bit faster than your opponents and that is the secret of your success You will be helped by human as well as divine forces A little bit of loving and lots of laughing is how it will go for you Many will be looking for adventure now

Aquarius
January 20 — February 18

It will be just that last minute heave and tug which will get you neat at the top and you jolly well deserve to be there A minor or major wish-fulfillment is ordained for you Do expect visitors and relatives to descend upon you Home becomes the centre of attraction

Pisces
February 19 — March 20

Long-distance connections and the luck of the draw are very definitely highlighted this week Many Pisceans will be mid-way through a change in attitudes, lifestyle, job, profession, business or just a general outlook Only by the end of next year will the change be complete

BIRTHDAYS

November 5: Success after struggle, but the success will be doubly sweet, announces Ganesha, and therefore, worth it. Children and creativity give satisfaction.

November 6: The moon helps you to reach out to people and places by all possible media of transport and communication. You will enjoy the fruits of your labour.

November 7: Security and financial surge. The full implications and impact will be felt next year, but this December it should all start. Romance blooms.

November 8: Inspirational moves, journey, slipping overseas on business, artistic moves and talent are foretold. Try to be pragmatic and level headed.

RUSKIN BOND'S  COLUMN

LITTLE MADHU

I met little Madhu several years ago, when I lived alone in an obscure town near the Himalayan foothills I was in my late twenties then, and my outlook on life was still quite romantic, the cynicism that was to come with the thirties had not yet set in

I preferred the solitude of the small district town to the kind of social life I might have found in the cities, and in my books, my writing and the surrounding hills, there was enough for my pleasure and occupation

On summer mornings I would often sit beneath an old mango tree, with a notebook or a sketch pad on my knees The house which I had rented (for a very nominal sum) stood on the outskirts of the town, and a large tank and a few poor houses could be seen from the garden wall A narrow public pathway passed under the low wall

One morning, while I sat beneath the mango tree, I saw a young girl of about nine, wearing torn clothes, darting about on the pathway and along the high banks of the tank

Sometimes, she stopped to look at me, and, when I showed that I noticed her, she felt encouraged and gave me a shy, fleeting smile The next day I discovered her leaning over the garden wall, following my actions as I paced up and down on the grass

In a few days, an acquaintance had been formed I began to take the girl's presence for granted, and even to look for her, and she, in turn, would linger about on the pathway until she saw me come out of the house

One day, as she passed the gate, I called her to me

'What is your name?" I asked "And where do you live?"

"Madhu," she said, brushing back her long untidy black hair and smiling at me from large black eyes She pointed across the road, "I live with my grandmother "

"Is she very old?" I asked

Madhu nodded confidingly and whispered "A hundred years "

"We will never be that old," I said She was very slight and frail, like a flower growing in a rock, vulnerable to wind and rain

I discovered later that the old lady was not her grandmother but a childless woman who had found the baby girl on the banks of the tank Madhu's real parentage was unknown, but the wizened old woman had, out of compassion, brought up the child as her own

My gate once entered, Madhu included the garden in her circle of activities She was there every morning chasing butterflies, stalking squirrels and mynahs, her voice brimming with laughter, her slight figure flitting about between the trees

Sometimes, but not often, I gave her a toy or a new dress, and one day she put aside her shyness and brought me a present of a nosegay made up of marigolds and wild blue-cotton flowers

"For you," she said, and put the flowers in my lap

"They are very beautiful," I said, picking out the brightest marigold and putting it in her hair "But they are not as beautiful as you "

More than a year passed before I began to take more than a mildly patronising interest in Madhu

It occured to me after sometime that she should be taught to read and write, and I asked a local teacher to give her lessons in the garden for an hour everyday She clapped her hands with pleasure at the prospect of what was to be for her a fascinating new game

Sometimes, but not often, I gave her a toy or a new dress; and one day she put aside her shyness and brought me a present of a nosegay made up of marigolds and wild blue-cotton flowers. 'For you,' she said, and put the flowers in my lap

In a few weeks, Madhu was surprising us with her capacity for absorbing knowledge She always came to me to repeat the lessons of the day, and pestered me with questions on a variety of subjects How big was the world? And were the stars really like our world? Or were they the suns and daughters of the Sun and the Moon?

My interest in Madhu deepened, and my life, so empty till then, became imbued with a new purpose As she sat on the grass beside me, reading aloud, or listening to me with a look of complete trust and belief, all the love that had been lying dormant in me during my years of self-exile surfaced in a sudden surge of tenderness

Three years glided away imperceptibly, and at the age of 13, Madhu was on the verge of blossoming into a woman I began to feel a certain responsibility towards her

It was dangerous, I knew, to allow a child so pretty to live almost alone and unprotected and to run unrestrained about the grounds And in a censorious society she would be made to suffer if she spent too much time in my company

She could see no need for any separation, but I decided to send her to a mission school in the next district, where I could visit her from time to time

"But why?" said Madhu "I can learn more from you, and from the teacher who comes I am so happy here"

"You will meet other girls and make many friends," I told her "I will come to see you And, when you come home, we will be even happier It is good that you should go"

On her dark arm she still wore a small piece of ribbon which I had playfully tied there about a year ago. She had given her heart, even before she was conscious of possessing one, to a stranger unworthy of the gift

It was the middle of June, a hot and oppressive month in the Siwaliks Madhu had expressed her readiness to go to school, and when, one evening, I did not see her as usual in the garden, I thought nothing of it, but the next day I was informed that she had fever and could not leave the house

Illness was something Madhu had not known before, and for this reason I felt afraid I hurried down the path which led to the old woman's cottage It seemed strange that I had never once entered it during my long friendship with Madhu

It was a humble mud hut, the ceiling just high enough to enable me to stand upright, the room dark but clean Madhu was lying on a string cot exhausted by fever, her eyes closed, her long hair unkempt, one small hand hanging over the side

It struck me then how little, during all this time, I had thought of her physical comforts There was no chair, I knelt down, and took her hand in mine I knew, from the fierce heat of her body, that she was seriously ill

She recognised my touch, and a smile passed across her face before she opened her eyes She held on to my hand, then laid it across her cheek

I looked round the little room in which she had grown up It had scarcely an article of furniture apart from two string cots, on one of which the old woman sat and watched us, her white, wizened head nodding like a puppet's

In a corner, lay Madhu's little treasures I recognised among them the presents which during the past four years I had given her She had kept everything On her dark arm she still wore a small piece of ribbon which I had playfully tied there about a year ago She had given her heart, even before she was conscious of possessing one, to a stranger unworthy of the gift

As the evening drew on, a gust of wind blew open the door of the dark room, and a gleam of sunshine streamed in, lighting up a portion of the wall It was the time when every evening she would join me under the mango tree She had been quiet for almost an hour, and now a slight pressure of her hand drew my eyes back to her face

"What will we do now?" she said "When will you send me to school?"

"Not for a long time First you must get well and strong That is all that matters"

She didn't seem to hear me I think she knew she was dying, but she did not resent it's happening

"Who will read to you under the tree?" she went on "Who will look after you?" she asked, with the solicitude of a grown woman

"You will, Madhu You are grown up now There will be no one else to look after me"

The old woman was standing at my shoulder A hundred years—and little Madhu was slipping away The woman took Madhu's hand from mine, and laid it gently down I sat by the cot a little longer, and then I rose to go, all the loneliness in the world pressing upon my heart

TRYST WITH TRUTH

There are many people who seem to belong to India, even if they weren't born here One of them is Diana Eck, the American scholar who's spent years of her life travelling the pilgrimage routes of India and living in the sacred cities Her book Banaras City of Light is a luminous account of tradition there

So it came as a surprise to me to be confronted with her American self To discover her as a Methodist Christian from small town Montana whose forefathers were Swedes — pioneers who migrated to America around the turn of the century and who lived in primitive log huts in remote forest

For these pioneers, their most important book was the Bible — for many it was their only book

Diana herself was brought up in a community with an unquestioning belief in Christianity, a sturdy faith in God which was reinforced by the summer camps of young Methodists where she sang hymns around camp fires, and kept watch with prayer as the sun rose In her environment there was no other God but the Christian God, she met no one but Christians and didn't even come across modern concepts like feminism

Then she encountered native Americans, and saw men going to the Vietnam war She wanted to come to Asia - -the continent of Vietnam — but the course she applied to from her university took her to South Asia — until then she didn't know the difference She came straight to Benaras and that changed her life

But not quite as I might have thought It transformed, but did not destroy her Christian faith

"India's theological gift to me," she writes, has been the "discovery that God can be addressed as Mother, can wear the ashes of the cremation pyre, or can beckon us to dance"

Through Indian thought she also learnt more about prayer and meditation When she was diagnosed as having breast cancer, it was meditation as well as radiation which helped to heal her She writes of stilling the mind, "Just being awake, alert, attentive is no easy matter I think it is the greatest spiritual challenge we face"

Through the image of Kali, she learnt to think again about the nature of death and how to be still and be in God's presence in places where we confront it She herself has had to confront death in many places not least in a morgue in Mexico where her brother's body had been taken after police had beaten him so hard and long they had ruptured his spleen

With the German philosopher, Schopenhauer, she found the Upanishads "the most elevated reading the world has to offer" From the Rig Veda she learnt that "truth is one, the wise call it by many names"

Her spiritual transformation has now made her one of the most persuasive preachers of pluralism, of true dialogue between believers of different faiths and non-believers too Her passion for pluralism is clear in her new book, Encountering God She discourages people from any religion from saying, "I am right, and therefore everyone else is wrong" Ultimate Truth is too big for any group of humans who know totally Neither does she feel true dialogue comes from the attitude that "we have the true way and others have lesser ways" That implies superiority We have, she argues, to actively try to glimpse the truth in other faiths, to appreciate their values, to establish a proper relationship with them

As she writes, "There is no question that religious traditions have been part of the problem as one surveys the divisions and conflicts of the present world, and there is no question that religious traditions will also have to be part of the solution"

To India which has an ancient history of pluralism rooted in a broad Hindu ethos, these ideas are not new But they are to many people of the world and specially to many Christians, Jews and Muslims who believe that there is only one holy story to be told and to be participated in by the faithful

Eck sees the exclusivism of many presentday groups as a revolt against the secularism of modernity As an example she cites the burst of Christian fundamentalism in the Seventies and Eighties in America

But she sees hope in new American diversity, in the fact that she finds Los Angeles the most complex Buddhist city on earth, that there are over 600 mosques in the US, as well as innumerable Hindu and Jain temples and Sikh gurudwaras The US is, now, the most ethnically diverse nation on earth — and simulataneously one of the most religious-minded But this still has to be converted into genuine pluralism If only America could do that, and people like Diana Eck are continually towards this goal, then it really might be able to stake a claim as a great civilisation

(Sanctuary Features)

As she [Diana Eck] writes, 'There is no question that religious traditions have been part of the problem as one surveys the divisions and conflicts of the present world; and there is no question that religious traditions will also have to be part of the solution'

INTERVIEW

'I am not the first one to do so'

Supercop Kiran Bedi tells the Magazine

Kiran Bedi: Making a point

The feisty police officer, who takes to headlines like a duck takes to water, was recently in the eye of a storm again when she was chargesheeted for Tihar for breach of security Anuradha Raman spoke to the woman of steel in Delhi about her decision to commission a biography and her future plans Excerpts from the interview

What is the purpose of this book? Was it intended as a biography? Do you think you should have waited a little before coming out in the open?

The publisher and Khuswanth Singh visited the prison and were impressed by the community programmes and various other measures that were taken to integrate prisoners in Tihar

They then, hit upon the idea of writing on what was happening in Tihar At some stage, I think, the publisher wanted the writer to go beyond Tihar to find out about the person behind Tihar Was there a prior link to this corrective work that was taking place? And so on As for waiting for sometime, it depends on each individual

You are looking back in anger, hitting back at people who have hurt you in the past.

It is not a sudden anger I have spent 24 years in the service The anger did not erupt suddenly in 1995 It was on from day one

It is anger that made me join the services in the first place Anger can play a positive role When you are not angry, nothing moves When you are angry about someting, you are letting other people know that you will not tolerate nonsense

As for hitting back at people, that may be one purpose of writing Writing is also a creative exercise Sometimes, it can be to share information with others

Are you trying to share information with the readers?

I am not drawing any conclusion (Elsewhere, Kiran Bedi is reported to have said that if a police officer comments on knots in the system, what is wrong with that? No state secret has been shared There is no harm in government officers coming out openly and criticising the system If I have come out against the system, I am not the first one to do so)

What were you hinting at when, following Rajan Pillai's death, you asked for an inquiry to go beyond just Tihar mismanagement and simultaneously you said that this was not possible. in feudal bodies with democratic gowns?

I am a professional and I understand the administration well As a senior police official, I understand my responsibilities well If I am the head of a department, I have certain responsibilities, and if I do not exercise them, I am answerable

Unfortunately, in our work culture, the seniors get away with non-performance while junior officers are targeted Unfortunately, we don't debate on non-performance and the non-performance at senior level decides the performance level of others below him I am questioning non-performance I need to be judged too

By just wearing a gown, you cannot be democratic, you have to be functionally democratic In Tihar, we met the objectives of governance We gave everything The sad part is that the 9,000-odd people there got a big jolt While they feel left alone, I am the one left to answer

Will you enter politics?

I cannot say anything about the future I may be pushed out of Delhi As long as I have the energy, I will work for the community How long this will last, I don't know

INTO STORMY WATERS

BY PARMESH DANGWAL

"Out of the average of 300 prisoners coming in every day, 50 are drug addicts The incidence of drug-related crimes being so high, it is most essential that this problem be dealt with effectively in the prisons We still have far too little space in our treatment centres We are, therefore, trying to institutionalise them And, for that we have sent a proposal to the Ministry of Health, Government of India, for establishing treatment centres like "Navjyoti" in the prisons to be run by the superintendent of the jail We have requested for funds, in the form of grants from the government, so that the superintendent can employ a team of homoeopaths, vocational trainers, yoga instructors, psychiatrists and social workers It would involve an amount of Rs 10,000 to Rs 12,000 per superintendent per month to enable him to do so These funds would go to the prisoners' welfare fund and be at the disposal of the respective superintendents to provide a holistic infrastructure to deal with the drug problem in prisons The proposal is under active consideration of the government and is also being considered by the UN Drug Control Programme NGOs have their own limitations and the institutionalising of the programme would bring in much greater control in functioning by the jail staff itself One large prison is on the verge of being declared a demonstration project to be steered by Dr Harinder Sethi of Aasara (an NGO)

Yet another serious problem I noticed concerning the prisoners' health was their problem of smoking Quarters in the jails are confined and smoking was creating bronchial and other respiratory tract problems even in non-smokers through passive smoking But this was a problem in which very large numbers were involved and I kept my mind open to opportunities that might enable me to stop this One day, on my rounds in the adolescent wards, I was standing behind a prisoner when he coughed and spat a little distance away It landed in front of a boy sitting in his educational class I pounced on the opportunity and declared to the lot sitting there that this was how a privilege given to inmates was being abused Spitting into a class was sacrilege and if concessions like smoking were causing this then I had no option but to stop it henceforth

Smoking was immediately banned for the adolescents and strict instructions were issued that no visitor would bring beedis for his or her ward Just like liquor brings a lot of money to the government's coffers so also were beedis and cigarettes bringing in a lot of money to the prisoners' welfare funds in the jails But my superintendent agreed with me that we would rather bear the financial loss but we would ban consumption of tobacco in the jails Since we had approached them at the psychological level the youngsters realised that it was because of their misuse of privileges that this ban had been imposed and therefore they were quite silent about it They were all young with flexible and receptive minds and they opted for showing obedience to the ban orders This affected their mind control a lot and they soon realised they were better off with the ban They reported that spitting in the barracks had come to a stop They were now living in cleaner barracks and a lot of their throat and chest problems had disappeared

That made us happy

The problem now was with the mroe hardened and longer addicted adults! How should we set about effecting the ban for them? The opportunity presented itself one day On one of our rounds in Jail 3 one of the prisoners attending classes pointed out to me that a particular prisoner was selling beedis in black ie, charging more than the normal rates I asked him why he would be doing so when they were freely available in the jail canteen and he told me that sometimes the canteen would be closed for two days, or there would be a short supply On being questioned, the concerned prisoner refuted the charge saying that the other had some personal enmity with him and that is why he was saying so So I ordered a search of his belongings in his barracks and sure enough the search revealed a tin full of beedis I took this opportunity to tell them that this privilege we had been giving them had been misused and that a criminal offence was being committed because of this Blackmarketing would not be allowed to thrive in the prison and therefore I was going to impose a ban on smoking in all prisons I drove on the initiative I had got and expressed my anger at them Here I was, I told them spending over one and a half crores of rupees on their health problems and at no cost would I let them undo all that I had been trying to do I told them that here I was trying to cure them of TB and bronchial and other problems, and spending so much money on them, and they dared to take tonic from me and poison from the prisoners No more would I permit this, I told them If they wanted to continue taking the poison then let them pay for the cure I certainly was not going to do it!

Immediately on imposing the ban market forces exerted themselves in the jails' townships People started hoarding whatever stocks were available and there was a flourishing black market We were aware this would happen, and we were also aware that this would last only till such time as the stock started to dry up Massive searches were conducted and violators punished Stocks soon petered out and so that concern of ours was over with The major concern, however, was the withdrawal symptoms that had begun to become apparent Also, the convicts realised that the undertrials got a chance to smoke when they went to the courts but for them there was no such opportunity This was putting them into depression The response to this move was a mixed one, as was expressed through the petition box system Some claimed that it was a good thing I had done but there were very vituperative and abusive responses also I did not react to them I was accused of having done the most stupid thing and that all my efforts at providing them b tter living conditions, and a more liberal atmosphere, had all come to nought

How much of a dependence they had developed on beedis became apparent just 24 hours after this The cooks said they could not work in the langars without their beedis A large number of prisoners refused to eat because of stomach aches they had developed I wondered if my superintendents would be able to manage the situationa and whether I had not bitten off more than I could chew But then I realised what an opium-like effect their smoking had on them and that knowing this and yet permitting it would, for me, be absolutely immoral I, therefore, let the ban continue My superintendents cooperated with me totally They persuaded them, they counselled them and showed determination to continue along with me This gave me heart The superintendents had to do a lot of excess work and face a lot of hassles but they stood by me Without their implicit support it would just not have been possible We kept on at it We gave them extra milk, fruits, medicines, anything to keep their minds off smoking It required tremendous effort but then the results started becoming apparent I was told that their habits had started improving and that they were saying that I was very strict and that they might as well learn to do without smoking

I recommenced my rounds in the jails Groups started forming, some telling me I had done the right thing and some started pointing out that eve n the Jail Manual gave the prison in charge the prerogative of issuing two beedis a day to each prisoner I said this was impossible because the logistics were too cumbersome, and also that it was not possible to find out who smoked and who did not so that the sum total would again be a situation where there was excess smoking and blackmarketing Some of the staff members who were heavy smokers themselves were not supportive of the ban and therefore we gave them external duties where they did not have to interact with the prisoners The situation had come to a make or break stage If we could hold our own for a little while longer, then we were through, and if we failed now then it would never be possible to attempt such a thing ever again

Then came my most crucial test, like a bombshell, I entered the prison for one of our regular performance appraisal meetings Normally, the prisoners would clap and thus show their approval of the way I was handling and managing things That day there was no such clapping I thought probably they had come to the conclusion that it was a silly thing to do and that it might be construed as hypocrisy, and that is why they had stopped the practice My superintendent, Tarseem Kumar, had been telling me that he was facing a lot of problems here but that he was managing to cope His problems soon became apparent I lectured the prisoners on the reasons for the ban on smoking and tried to get the prisoners to agree with me There was absolutely no response So I told them it was getting late and that we would, as usual, all stand up and say our prayers No one stood up! So I told them it was alright if they did not want to stand and that we would say our prayer sitting There were about 1200 of them with the convicts on my right and the undertrials in front of me I managed to get a group of the undertrials to sing along with me and then I told them to go back to their barracks With little persuasion the undertrials went away but the convicts remained sullen and unmoved I told them that I would listen to their complaints later and that they should go now Some of them then spoke up and said that they would only leave if they were given beedis They claimed that I was doing injustice to them They did not want eggs and milk or fruit they wanted their beedis, which, they said, was like their beloved and that they could not live without them "If you do not give it to us then we will all commit suicide" For the first time I started to sweat The other three jails had effectively accepted the ban, if I gave these convicts any concessions then everything would be undone I had to overcome the situation and so I plunged headlong into it I told them that what was making them behave like this was because of the withdrawal symptoms What they were undergoing was the tootan phase (a period of withdrawal where the body seems to be breaking) At that they all laughed and said, "Madam knows what is 'tootan'" I said yes, and that I would provide six more doctors so that they could get medical assistance in this difficult period They would administer a homoeopathic drug called 'tobaccum', I told them, and that would reduce their desire for tobacco

We had a lot of discussion that day about what I should do and what I should not So ultimately I told them that I would hold discussions with doctors and psychiatrists and only then tell them what had been decided Till then, I told them, the ban continues" ■

THE MOOR, MIRRORED

Bhupen Khakhar tries to catch Salman Rushdie's reflection on canvas

The man in front of the canvas is definitely one of the most controversial figures of the decade. His portrait, too, is all set to become the most by the National Gallery, London.

The portrait was commissioned for a BBC documentary on Salman Rushdie and his latest novel, The Moor's Last Sigh.

The man behind the canvas is Bhupen Khakhar the chartered accountant-turned-painter-turned-playwright — a man with many inclinations.

Kapil Jariwala, who plans a display of Khakhar's paintings at his own private gallery and hit upon the idea of Rushdie's portrait, revealed that "Salman really likes it", and is also a "keen collector of Bhupen's works for many years".

So enamoured is the author with his own likeness that he is "next on the list if the National Portrait Gallery does not buy it".

Khakhar, a not too familiar name in the international art circuit or among the Indian diaspora, has his fictitious counterpart, a chartered accountant, appearing in The Moor's Last Sigh.

Khakhar paints men who come and go and who may or may not talk of Michelangelo; leaps past the apparent realities and rewinds his ideas to unravel shocking images.

Here, too, he tries to go beyond his immediate subject and outlines the setting of the novel with allusions to Bombay, Rushdie's home town, and Cochin. The profile of the author is modelled on the Moghul tradition of miniatures.

"I like the obvious resonances to his life and cultural connections," observed Charles Saumarez Smith, director, London Gallery, who makes no secret of his intention to go ahead with the acquisition of the painting.

The artist would be happy if his painting "goes to a public gallery". Khakhar had many sittings with Rushdie before he completed his work at his Baroda studio.

But be it Rushdie or his image — thy name breeds strife. The reason is obvious. The author is still under a death threat from Iran's hardliner groups. Khakhar is also aware of this: "They want the painting p because il situation."

A critic, on seeing the work of the painter was reminded of a line from a Beatles number — "I look at all the lonely people" This time, too, it is a profile of a lone writer, or, perhaps, a portrait of an artiste in exile. ■

Melody Where East Met West

■ A golden era in film music has ended with the passing away of R.D. Burman and Salil Chowdhury ('Symphony No More', September 24).

Once, in an interview, RD had complimented Salil Chowdhury's ability to fuse Western and Eastern tunes, an ability which he himself had

If Salil Chowdhury was a legend, RD was a phenomenon and we cannot forgive the Magazine for not having carried a cover story on him.

Such masters will obviously be missing in today's film scene where there is no regard for humility and creativity and where money dictates taste, values and originality, where a number like Come September is used simultaneously in two films and where lyrics like Main to raste pe ja raha tha. become superhits

There is no need to compose music nowadays, just litt a tune from a popular Western number, add some idiotic words and you've created a hit song!
Gautam Bose,
Dibrugarh

■ I was fortunate enough to meet Salil Chowdhury personally along with Basu Bhattacharya at the former's daughter Tulika's residence in Kurseong some years ago I was so touched by the modesty and amiability of this musical genius
I.K. Singh,
Kurseong

■ Spontaneity and effortlessness are the two qualities that constituted the genius called Salil Chowdhury He, in-league with Hemanta Mukhopadhyay, gifted Bengal some of the most melodious numbers ever to be composed. Ranar chhutechhe, Abak prithibi, Kono ek gaanyer bodhu

The reason why these songs are still popular is obvious they are pristine works of art where vulgarism has no place
Rajib Mukherjee,
Bandel (W B)

■ I need to congratulate the Magazine for its excellent tribute to Salil Chowdhury Anil Grover's translations of two Salil Chowdhury hits, Toote hue khwabon ne and Koi hota jisko apna. , were marvellous for he managed to retain the lyrical flow as well as the musical rhythm

For lines like Toote hue khwabon ne he translates 'Splintered dreams of mine' Or 'Wish there was no sleep in my eyes/ And only tears were afloat in them'/ And I stayed awake even in my dreams'.

Anil Grover not only understands poetry, he appreciates the beauty of each line

On the other hand, Bablu Bhattacharya's translation of Gaanyer bodhu and Path harabo boleyi ebaar was quite dull and literal There is no sense of poetry when he says 'I have descended on the path only to lose my way '

However, there are one or two lines where he sounds good 'The tale is a garland/Dew-drenched buds of which/Had blossomed in the spring of life'
Pinky Ghosh,
Calcutta

R.D. Burman: Another legend, like Salil Chowdhury

To B Or Not To B

■ The Magazine should give us a cover story on the return of the film giant, Amitabh Bachchan We expected some sort of a congratulatory writeup on the Big B's recent birthday in the Magazine, but we were disappointed
A Mukherjee,
Calcutta

Jayanta Mahapatra will be abroad for a while Readers may please send their poems to him after the third week of November

NAMASTE HOLLYWOOD

That is where lies the pot of tinsel and gold And even there, some Indians are doing very well, thank you, says Arthur J. Pais

Jessica Tandy and Bridget Fonda in Camilla

"IN THIS TOWN, YOU HAVE TO BE ON YOUR TOES ALL 24 HOURS, KNOW HOW TO WRESTLE WITH the lions and swim with the sharks," says Ashok Amritraj, a former tennis champ, and a producer of a dozen movies.

"People in Hollywood are friendly, and full of suggestions but unless you are always alert, and have a sharp business mind, you cannot deal with them "

Amritraj, who has also served as the executive producer for actor-producer Michael Douglas' hit movie, Double Impact, is working on three medium-budget ($12-$15 million) movies. "I like to have a mixed production bag," he says. "An erotic thriller, a costume drama, perhaps a comedy, and a big budget film."

Amritraj also says that he shares the fiscal conservatism of his Indian peers. "We are the new kids on the block," he says. "We cannot make $30 million movies (that being the cost of an average Hollywood movie) immediately. We must learn to walk steadily before we try to run with the big box-office "

Amritraj is among a dozen Indian producers making movies for Hollywood Their products range from erotic thrillers to historical themes. The total budget of their movies under production and in preparation exceeds $200 million. And most of these movies deal with American subjects Indians are also into directing movies.

In an industry where women directors count less than a dozen, there are three Indian women who have directed movies: Radha Bharadwaj (Closet Land, a political drama with Alan Rickman and Madeline Stowe), Mira Nair and Deepa Mehta.

"We are into mainstream movie-making," says director Jagmohan Mundhra, who specialises in erotic thrillers His Improper Conduct, a story of sexual harassment, was released a few months ago in more than 300 movie houses across America, a good show for a low-budget movie. It got some good reviews, too, particularly from The Los Angeles Times.

Many of these producers started in the business when Amritraj was finding his footing in Hollywood For instance, Sharad Patel, who owned movie theatres in East Africa, began his Hollywood career with a low-budget but rousing movie on Idi Amin, the Ugandan dictator.

With the success of that film, he ventured into making an American comedy. Bachelor Party, which Sharad Patel produced for 20th Century Fox, was a runaway hit a little more than a decade ago; it made Tom Hanks a star.

Following his work in Bachelor Party, Hanks drew the attention of major Hollywood directors, including Penny Marshall, and went on to work in some of the biggest hits, including Big and Forest Gump

But Sharad Patel suffered several setbacks when two of his ventures failed However, he is back in business in a big way, having got Walt Disney to distribute Jungle Book The $25 million live-action movie will hit more than 1,400 screens across America in a few months

Sharad Patel and his son Raju are not the only immigrants from East Africa who have made a home in Hollywood Sunil Shah, the producer of Lion Heart, the movie that made Jean-Claude Van Damme a star, and his three brothers inherited their movie business sense from their father Raminikbhai Shah who owned movie theatres and video distribution companies in Kenya

When East Africa began expelling Asians in the Seventies, the Shahs left for England When Raminikbhai Shah sought to revive

MUNDHRA'S EROTICA

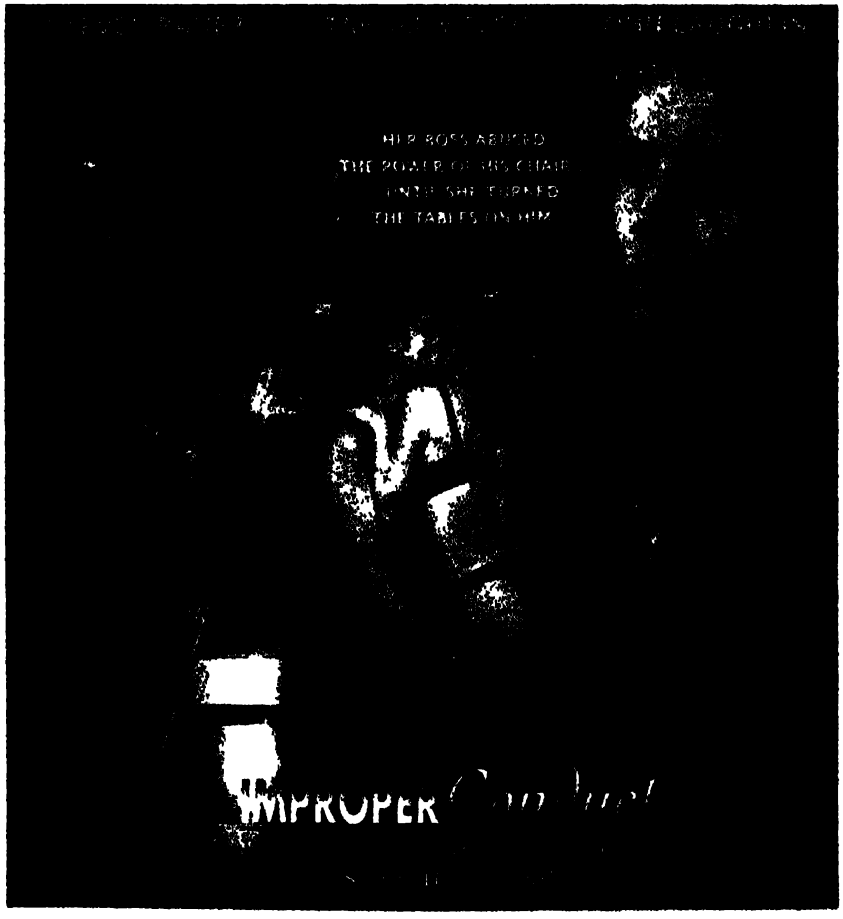
Tahnee Welch, daughter of the glam actress, Raquel Welch, has been seen in some of the big Hollywood hits, including Cocoon But her career hasn't really taken off, and when she heard that a smalltime director, Jagmohan Mundhra, was casting Improper Conduct, Welch sent feelers and grabbed the lead.

Mundhra, most of whose movies are made on shoestring budgets ($2 million, against the $26 million Hollywood average) and are seen widely on video in America and in theatres elsewhere, does not hear his name at the Oscar times Nor do his movies get awards.

But he is considered one of the most successful of Hollywood's Indian directors. Though the films he had made in his home country Vish Kanya among them have flopped, he has truly developed a Midas touch in Hollywood. And that is the reason the likes of Tahnee Welch want to be seen in Mundhra's movies.

His movies are described as erotic thrillers. But Mundhra says he has nothing to feel ashamed of

"Isn't it a legitimate genre?" he asks "You take a heart-pounding story, lace it with sensuous scenes, and unless you are a damn fool, you will not lose money." He pauses for a moment "I have had more fun making these films than in a classroom " Mundhra, a graduate of India's prestigious IIT, has three masters degree and a doctorate from Michigan State University He has also taught for several years in America.



Having directed 15 such films in a decade, Mundhra knows what he is talking about With such hits like The Other Woman and Night Eyes, his films have grossed a conservative $150 million. "They would cost less than $34 million," he says. Because most of his films feature new faces, they are released on video across America and are shown regularly on pay-for-view cable In Europe and Asia, where it takes less money to release them in movie houses, Mundhra's movies enjoy typically a week or two in theatres

A movie career was a natural for him. "When you grow up in a country like India, film culture seizes you," he says "You come to America with an electrical engineering degree, you get a masters degree in business administration and you're working on your doctoral thesis at Michigan State University about marketing of movies, and all the time you wonder `When am I going to make my own films?'"

So hooked was he on movie business that even as he was teaching at Loyola Marymount College a course in consumer behaviorism, he distributed Indian movies to Los Angeles theatres for weekend showings and worked as an unpaid intern in an American movie company, but his first film was far removed from the erotic thriller he would specialise in

With all his savings, borrowed money and advance from distributors, he made a film called Suraag in Hindi in 1982, an also-ran film. It starred Sanjeev Kumar

Improper Conduct* : Voyeurism at its best ?

his business in England, his sons migrated to America, and began producing small budget action dramas

Like most Indian producers in Hollywood, the Shah brothers refuse to put their eggs in one basket "There is no point in trying to do a $45 million movie, and suffering a lot of heartaches," says Sunil Shah

Ashok Amritraj with other Hollywood producers and Shabana Azmi He later made Kamla with Marc Zuber and Deepti Naval, it got him some good notices, but wasn't a hit. Some years ago, he made Vish Kanya toplining Pooja Bedi The movie flopped.

About 12 years ago, Mundhra got connected to erotic thrillers, thanks to a chance meeting with former tennis champ Ashok Amritraj who was branching into making Hollywood films They made Night Eyes, about a voyeuristic security expert The 1989 movie cost about $1 2 million, but grossed over $30 million It "opened the floodgates of erotic thrillers," declared Entertainment Tonight show The Video Source Book counts 35 erotic thrillers last year, up from 11 in 1991

"I had made a couple of crime and horror films before,' Mundhra says "But they didn't fly It was when one added sex to the genre, things began to change "

Mundhra's formula is simple· Have a story with a good twist, fill them with steamy but not explicit sex scenes, pack them with Playboy centrefolds such as Kathy Shower, the ravishing stunt double of L.A. Goddess or a model such as Lee Anne Beman who played a hardnosed reporter in The Other Woman

"My films are made on such small budgets that any free exposure you get from the actors is welcome," he says. Playboy playmates or Penthouse pets are natural for his films.

` Mundhra, a burly man with a soft voice, bristles when his movies are called soft porn by some writers. "Sharon Stone or Melanie Griffith take off their clothes in a $30 million movie and that's okay for many," he says. "But a $2 million venture with erotic scenes is dubbed porn."

He admits he shoots two versions of his films the videostore bound version with steamy bedroom scenes, and a television theatre version with less sex "I never go for gross or explicit sex," he asserts Since he writes the story and script for most of his films, he knows where to draw the line between "decent sex and pornography," he says.

And he believes the audiences should be surprised continually In The Other Woman, for instance, the investigative reporter suspects her psychologist-author husband of adultery When she confronts the suspect, she discovers the call girl/model is merely an innocent fan of her husband "And then comes the twist that explains the movie's title," Mundhra says "The reporter falls in love with the call girl And complications follow"

Mundhra, 45, turned a producer with his newest Improper Conduct which deals with sexual harassment in office.

"All these years I saw all my movies make plenty of money," he says "But for someone else " He hope to have Improper Conduct in movie halls. "I know it's difficult Once you're branded a video director, you may stay put there "

But his wish came true recently. Improper Conduct opened in about 200 movie houses, not a bad deal for a small-budget movie, and promises to do respectable business.

Would he want to try another genre? "Am I doing something wrong?" he asks with a chuckle "Or are you afraid that I shall run out of ideas?"

` If the $45 million movie does not work out, we may not be able to get up and walk for many years So what we do is to produce a $20-$25 million budget movie and several others that cost about $10 million"

His recent film, Double Dragon, a martial-art drama set in futuristic Los Angeles, cost about $15 million Though the film did not do good business, it is bound to do well in video sales, Hollywood insiders say

Shah, along with his two brothers, is working on two movies starring his favourite Jean-Claude Van Damme `Even those movies, we shall try to keep under $25 million," he says "Jean-Claude Van Damme is a big star now, but he appreciates when a producer tries to keep the costs down because he knows that if the film's budget soars and it does average business, often the star gets blamed for its non-success "

Mira Nair, whose $25 million project on the Buddha fell through last year when another acclaimed director, Bernardo Bertolucci, started his own movie, Little Buddha, is making a $12 million movie that is already being talked about as an Oscar contender The Perez Family, starring Oscar winners Marisa Tomei and Angelica Huston, is described as a searing drama of a Cuban immigrant family in Miami

Its theme is aptly summed up in its ad-line "From a life of turmoil to a future of promise, a family had become strangers And strangers became a family Due in theatres in December (just the time when Oscar-race begins in earnest), The Perez Family is described as a make-you-laugh, make-you-cry heartwarmer. It focuses on two Cuban refugees looking to America to fulfill their romantic fantasies

Juan Perez (Alfred Molina), just released from Castro's prison, goes to Miami to find his wife (Huston), whom he has not seen for 20 years On the boat he meets Dottie (Marisa Tomei), a free spirit whose idea of America comes from pop music and movie stars. In spite of themselves, the two fall in love

Unlike Nair, who got Hollywood recognition through Salaam Bombay! which was nominated for an Oscar, and Mississippi Masala, Deepa Mehta is a relative stranger to the film city But she has plenty of experience behind the camera. As a co-founder of Sunrise Films, a Canadian TV and movie production company, she worked with her husband Saltzman on several adventure episodes in the Thunderbay series shown by the Disney Channel

Seven years ago, she moved into features with Martha, Rich and Edie, which was followed by the culture-clash story, Sam and Me She also directed an episode of the Young Indiana Jones chronicles for George Lucas and ABC TV

After she separated from Paul Saltzman, Mehta directed what many believe is her breakthrough film, Camilla. A gentle road movie starring Jessica Tandy and Bridget Fonda, it is being released in November by Miramax, a distribution wing of Walt Disney

Last Call: One from Amritraj's 'mixed bag'

Deepa Mehta was offered $11 million to do Camilla. By Hollywood standards, $11 million is not a millionaire's budget but for a Canadian filmmaker it was a big fortune. 'Oh my God, what am I going to do with $11 million? I could do 10 films with that money in Canada'

Mehta, whose father was a movie distributor in India, remembers asking him many years ago,

Daddy, why don't you pick up films that do well. Wouldn't it be nice to be rich?"

Her father replied: "There are two things that you don't know about One is when you are going to die and the other is how a film is going to do "

Mehta must have remembered this when she was offered $11 million to do Camilla By Hollywood standards, $11 million is not a millionaire's budget but for a Canadian filmmaker it was a big fortune.

"Oh my God, what am I going to do with $11 million? I could do 10 films with that money in Canada "

Nair and Mehta are among many independent filmmakers who live far away from Hollywood and yet cannot resist the great tinsel city Add to this list the names of Ismail Merchant (his partners, director James Ivory and writer Ruth Prawer Jhabvala) and Amin Q. Chaudhri, who live in New York and Pennsylvania, respectively Anant Singh, one of the most successful filmmakers in South Africa, also makes Hollywood films.

Singh's interest in Hollywood began three years ago when he could not raise money for the anti-apartheid musical, Sarafina!. Though based on an internationally successful musical, which had played in New York for more than a year, and in London over seven months, he found distributors hesitating to back his $7 million project "Get a Holywood star, any black star from Hollywood," said one distributor And Singh did just that He persuaded Whoopie Goldberg to play a pivotal role in Sarafina! and overnight Walt Disney grabbed the movie Impressed by Singh's efficiency, Disney gave the greenlight to his next project, Father Hood, a $20 million project

Sarafina! was a modest hit but Singh stumbled with Father Hood, a road movie about a convict and his children who beg him to take them away from a badly-run orphanage The movie stared Patrick Swayze, a box office durable, and yet it ran out of gas Seeing the bad response it got in the limited release, Walt Disney yanked it out of theatres in the third week Its gross? $10 million

But street-smart Singh is back in business He has just completed Mangler a $10 million horror movie based on a Stephen King novella, and directed by Toby Hooper (Poltergeist) And Sony Classics has grabbed Yankee Zulu a shoe stringbudget satire about race relations in new South Africa In South Africa, Yankee Zulu has grossed bout about $4 million, Academy Award winner (1990) Whoopi Goldberg stars as Mary, a passionate school teacher in South Africa in Anant Sing's Sarafina!

Jagmohan Mundhra with Steven Bauer in Improper Conduct making it the most successful movie ever produced there

Merchant has stayed out of Hollywood for nearly three decades, with one exception The Guru, made in the Sixties for 20th Century Fox But three years ago, he felt that Orion Pictures, an independent firm tottering on bankruptcy, could not do justice tohis Howards End, and he accepted a bid by Sony Classics, a wing of Columbia Pictures Howards End bagged three Oscars and grossed $26 million in America (about $40 million abroad)

Columbia then asked Merchant if he could produce The Remains of the Day based on a Booker Prize-winning novel The movie was originally to be produced and directed by Mike Nichols (Working

'Since the Merchant-Ivory team is known for making movies for $10-$12 million budget, and make them look as if they cost about $30 million,' says film historian and critic Andrew Sarris, 'Columbia must have thought them to be natural for the project [The Remains of the Day]'

Leaps of Faith

Mehta who has been making television and feature films in Canada for the past decade, could not resist a good Hollywood offer. Her first American film, Camilla, was made on a modest budget of $6 million — one fourth the budget of regular star-studded Hollywood pictures.

She got an assignment on the strength of her last film, Sammy and Me, a little seen but critically acclaimed movie about friendship between an elderly Jew and a young India immigrant (Ranjit Chowdhery), both outcasts of sorts

Sammy and Me was released about 18 months ago. Mehta was then married to Harry Saltzman, one of North America's most successful television filmmakers, and whose hits include Danger Bay adventure series for Walt Disney Channel

Mehta, who has adegree in philosophy from Delhgoi University, was a cofounder of Sunrise Films Limited, along with Saltzman She also directed one of the episodes of George Lucas's Young Indiana Jones Chronicles.

Girl and Regarding Henry) but Nichols not commit to make the movie on less than $ 30 million budget Columbia thought that the movie would have limited appeal

`Since the Merchant-Ivory team is known for making movies for $ 10-$ 12 million budget, and make them look as if they cost about $ 30 million," says film historian and critic Andrew Sarris, "Columbia must have thought them to be natural for the project "

The Remains of the Day, nominated for threee oscars, grossed about $ 55 million worldwide "Since it was made for $ 12 million, it turned out to be a profitable venture," says film critic George Russel Had it cost $30 million, it would have ended in the red " (A

A scene from The Remains of the Day

A romantic comedy about two young women — one moving the end of her life(the late Jessica Tandy in her last role), the other just starting out (Bridget Fonda) — who take to the road together in an old VW, it is being released through Miramax, an arm of Walt Disney. The two are brought together by their common interest in music but soon discover that despite a gap of more than 50 years, they have plenty of things in common

The journey takes three days, and although not a great distance, it is long enough to realise that it is never too late to follow your dreams and allow yourself the room to set your spirit free.

"The movie is reality rooted in a fantasy," Mehta says. "For me this combination is very important because I don't think we have enough magic in our lives."

"When you take a leap of faith— whether it is within yourself or whether it is for somebody else— magic happens."

"I think you have to believe in people however off centre or fantastical they might be," she continues, `but at the same time, they must strike some cord of reality within you To bring that out in the actor's performances was of prime importance to me."

Tandy, who starred with Marlon Brando on the stage in A Streetcar Named Desire, and whose few movies including Driving Miss Daisy brought her great accolade, surprised everyone when she said that she was looking forward to working with Bridget Fonda.

Daughter of Peter Fonda (Easy Rider) and niece of Jane Fonda, Bridget Fonda has been about five years in the movie business but starred in such h its as Single White Female and Singles Tandy was in the 80s when she began working for Camilla, and died in mid-1993 after completing all her work

Said Tandy who plays the title role, "I was delighted to hear that Bridget wanted to do the picture not only because she liked the part, but because she wanted to work with me I felt the same way about her There is a lot I can learn from young actors, specially someone like Bridget who has so much more experience in films than I do "

Fonda says that Camilla and Freda have a wonderful relationship in the movie but it was not easy to prepare for the part. "At first my chartacter (Freda) finds herself a little intimidating," she says, "But the hunger and the desire to share her love of music with someone is so strong that it forces her to overcome her shyness and fear Music is the common ground that brings us together initially, but as the movie progresses, we find out that we have more in common than we thought ".

Tandy said that the friendship between the characters is unusual, that not all older women will get on with younger women. But, in this case, said Tandy, "We each have our music which is very important to us. More important to us than it is to our husbands."

Though music plays a key element of the film, the stars could not play any instrument. But they refused to opt for music doubles, and took elaborate lessons in playing guitar and piano for more than two months.

movie has to gross two and a half times its budget to breakeven)

As The Remains of the Day was being released, Columbia was also distributing Age of Innocence a $35 million project based on an American classic, and directed by Martin Scorsese Both movies had plenty in common both were period dramas, and dealt with unrequietted love Both were well received by the critics but ended up making almost the same amount of money But Age of Innocence was not profitable because it had cost a hefty $35 million

Merchant and h is team are getting ready to release their first movie for Walt Disney in the next few months Jefferson in Paris starring the Oscar winner Nick Nolte in the title role, is going to be a controversial project The film details Jefferson's personal life including his alleged affair with his black mistress

Amin Q Chaudhri, whose hit movies inlcude Tiger Warsaw (with Patrick Swayzee) has not inked a deal as yet with a Hollywood studio for his ambitious project Gunga Din The film was to be made five years ago as a coproduction between Chaudhri and a Soviet film firm It was to be shot in a central Soviet republic But wtih the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the deal fell through Chaudhri is trying to revive the project

"We are here to stay, and Hollywood bigwigs know that we are dead serious of what we are doing," says Sunil Shah "Remember the Alan Arkin movie, Russians Are Coming, Russians are Coming?

"Well they say in Hollywood, `Indians are coming, Indians are coming'" ■

USING CONNECTIONS

K.R.K. Prasad catches his wife using the telephone well and proper

Ever since bureaucrats were equated with call girls by that righteous election commissioner, even the old girl at home started winking

All actions were being X-rayed And then I got an opportunity to corner her misdeeds The Calcutta Telephones gave the break

"You should own up at, least on moral and ethical grounds," I told my wife

"Whatever for?" she questioned back

"Tapping telephones is bad and you have done it"

She looked puzzled

"You remember how you got the new recipe for that paneer-stuffed-capsicum? You got it word by word over the line," I accused her

"Oh that! I had lifted the receiver to fix an appointment with my hair dresser When I heard this conversation of two ladies discussing a recipe, it was too tempting to be ignored So I kept on listening"

"You mean eavesdropping?"

"How mean! I did not know who they were They were not aware that I was on the line You may call it eaves-hearing Honestly, whoever expected a cross connection of their conversation on our phone They continued yapping for another hour and all my engagements went haywire for the day"

"Nonetheless you added one more recipe to your repertoire and that too by tapping their telephone," I repeated

She kept quiet Strike when the iron is getting warmer

"It was downright immoral to have snatched a bridegroom by tapping the phone" I persisted

She budged She looked down That was a clear sign of retreat She seemed to take an eternity to reply

"There was nothing immoral I will tell you how it happened Our phone rang after remaining dead and buried for three full days I ignored the ring knowing fully well that the telephone operator would enquire whether our line was through and once he disconnected it would again go kaput

"But on an impulse I lifted the receiver, I had not even said 'Hello' and the lady who appeared to suffer from verbal diarrhoea, rattled off, 'Oh! Sarla! Where were you? I have got the best news of the year A real scoop and million dollar lottery ! I have got a wonderful alliance for your daughter ! The boy is a computer engineer from IIT and an MBA from IIM He is working in the US and is a Green Card holder Has earned tons of money Wants to settle down in India after a year or two He is the only son of his parents Vegetarian He does not smoke A 26-year-old handsome young man Does not touch alcohol I wish I had a daughter You know what, I am the first one to know

They contacted me on arrival They do not want any dowry and want immediate marriage They do not want any fuss and are not even prepared to advertise ' She went on

"It was too good, how could I say that I was not Sarla and that it was a wrong number when I have a niece waiting in the wings to marry only a Green Card"

"So I murmured, 'Address?' hopefully expecting my caller not to recognise my voice

"She dictated the address, gave some more details about the parents, the way the subject should be broached, their likes and dislikes and a million other tips and added 'best wishes', 'prayers', et al She then hung up as if to catch the next plane to the US

"Without giving me a chance she cut off What else could I do I told my brother Boy met girl Parents liked the alliance — chat mangnee phat biya On the seventh day, the couple took off for California We cooed bye-bye to the newlyweds How can you accuse me of evil designs? This is downright unjust"

"But you tap your own daughter's phone That is criminal" I smiled, unable to mask my delight at her discomfiture

"Don't be silly Lifting the receiver on an extension when there is a parallel line is a legitimate weapon of a possessive parent, ' she thundered

"That brat was saying sweet nothings to that nincompoop son of your colleague After coming to know their rendezvous I changed my voice and misled him Several such mishaps and missing of meeting points ultimately led their friendship to nowhere I have no regrets I practise value-based parental tactics"

"But it was immoral nevertheless," I repeated

' I tap your phone also Do you know that? Otherwise how can I run an Armageddon of this house and keep people under control?" ■

Bonomali Banerjee had the audacity to book the DC, traffic—for a right cause Yes, he's around to put the signals straight

It is a familiar sight on Calcutta roads traffic snarls at any important crossing and an indifferent constable looking away or busy collecting bribes from the drivers

Often ministers and top bureaucrats made news when they nabbed constables accepting bribes from erring drivers

But this is a story of a traffic constable taking drivers of ministers and senior bureaucrats, who usually care for nothing, to task for violating traffic rules

Bonomali Banerjee, a traffic constable, has been giving 150 to 200 'pocket-book summon' cases a day to the Calcutta traffic police The state government earns several lakhs of rupees from the fines realised from the erring drivers of cars

It is not an uneasy task to distinguish this cop with a formidable moustache manning Shyambazar five-point crossing No irregularity, be it a rash driving or illegal parking or ignoring traffic signal, will miss his eyes He will immediately pounce on the driver or note down the car number

Bonomali who used to man the road in front of Writers' Buildings has recently been transferred to Shyambazar He made an appeal for a transfer to a less important crossing since he had a major eye operation

"I was really proud to see that chief minister Jyoti Basu could recognise me the other day I was manning the Ultadanga crossing and the chief minister was travelling from the airport to his Salt Lake residence As I saluted him he looked at me from his speeding car and smiled Perhaps, he recognised me because he used to see me manning traffic in front of Writers' Buildings"

Once he spotted the then deputy commissioner, traffic, Chayan Mukherjee's car parked in front of Writers' Buildings and noted its registration number Though his colleagues told him that his days of duty in front of the state secretariat were over as he dared to book the DC traffic, he was relieved after Mukherjee patted and congratulated him for his honesty and integrity

Mukherjee published his name and photograph in the Calcutta traffic police bulletin He also recommended his name for the Indian Police Medal award But the file is gathering dust He, however, received an award last month from a non-government organisation, Saptodipa, for his performance

Only the other day he did not spare the car of a judge near Shyambazar crossing When Bonomali joined the profession in 1960 his boss was Tim saheb Bonomali was Tim's favourite for his uprightness In 1966 he was awarded a one rupee coin by the then DC traffic in recognition of his work

So the man carries on, with his unwavering tenacity and vigour, keeping vigil over truant drivers or those daring to flout traffic rules

Take a chance, be it romance, property deals, finance, or just a trip Communication is the key and that means letters posters, ads calls telex telegrams, deeds and contracts will be signed and these should naturally, have a direct bearing on finance property and marriage

May 21 — June 20

For Taureans and Geminis the second and the sixth will be electrifying and, therefore try to home in on it if possible The focus is certainly on your finances and family buying, selling, investing, housing renovation and decoration A family get together is on the cards

Cancer
June 21 — July 20

Partnerships at all levels, that is, from business to purely platonic, act as the main trend of the week Your ability to handle human relationships will be fully tested Tuesday, Friday and Saturday find you taking crucial decisions Journey, and ceremony foretold

Leo
July 21 — August 21

Hidden things, including assassinations, now definitely come to light Servants, colleagues, pets subordinates almost dictate the tenor of your life The second half of the week promises success, despite expenses and a bad bout of health

Virgo
August 22 — September 22

Best to do your duty, however irksome Also, you will find yourself in the limelight of publicity because of your intelligence and a generous slice of luck You will be restless raring to go Childbirth, conception, creativity a new line of work are the other highlights

Libra
September 23 — October 22

Ask for favours, be it business, job, romance, loans, promotion and perks Also, the month gives you an opportunity for an alliance at all levels, inclusive of the strictly personal it would be best to be friendly and amiable as contacts formed will stand you in good stead

Scorpio
October 23 — November 22

Luck of the draw will be with you Therefore, try a lottery Unemployed Scorpios should land at least a part time job, the employed could be in for a raise Businessmen will think of a radical change Pilgrimages, prayers and trips with a possible stop-over are likely this week

Sagittarius
November 23 — December 20

Open up full throttle, specially after the middle of the month as work will be done and the situation will be under control Loans, funds and finance will be easier to secure and that should ease the situation A home away from home is possible

Capricorn
December 21 — January 19

Despite the position and hassles, you will have the resources and the wherewithal to carry on bravely Decisions on the personal and the professional level will have to be taken, most certainly so Investments buying and selling are the other paramount features

Aquarius
January 20 — February 18

While there could be some opposition to plans and health hazards, there is no need to despair, says Ganesha as Jupiter gives you the grit, the imagination and the tenacity to overcome all hurdles Monetary gains are possible on the second half of the week

Pisces
February 19 — March 20

Ganesha claims a job-hop, or a better pay packet for you Also, children give rare delight, hobbies, prove relaxing, a journey is not ruled out, and the home has a facelift Contacts and contracts are also on the cards Investments, cheques and deals figure importantly

BIRTHDAYS

November 12: It is absolutely certain that joint-finance and loans will be very important. Kids too will play a useful role. Health safeguards essential.

November 13: For you too, health is suspect and beware if signing a contract, entering into an important partnership or a joint-venture. Expenses will multiply.

November 14: Your potential will be realised and that is saying a lot. Those in import, export, sales, collaborations do well.

November 15: A fine time it is for artistes, direction, dealings could gain.

November 16: Nothing stops you, unless you put the brakes on yourself. In other words, be daring and different Promotion, love and money foretold.

November 17: Mixed results, but you should be in the money, and that is comfort. If there is opposition to plans, do it methodically.

November 18: Changes may not be all that pleasant, dially if they refer to finances and social standing Journeys ajay.

RUSKIN BOND'S  COLUMN

AN ENCOUNTER WITH KIPLING

I was sitting on a bench in the Indian section of the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, when a tall, stooping, elderly gentleman sat down beside me I gave him a quick glance, noting his swarthy features, heavy moustache, and horn-rimmed spectacles There was something familiar and disturbing about his face, and I couldn't resist looking at him again

I noticed that he was smiling at me

"Do you recognise me?" he asked, in a soft pleasant voice

"Well, you do seem familiar," I said "Haven't we met somewhere?"

"Perhaps But if I seem familiar to you, that is at least something The trouble these days is that people don't know me anymore — I'm a familiar figure, that's all Just a name standing for a lot of outmoded ideas "

A little perplexed, I asked, "What is it you do?"

"I wrote books once Poems and tales Tell me, whose books do you read?"

"Oh, Maugham, Priestley, Thurber And among the older lot, Bennett and Wells " I hesitated, groping for an important name, and I noticed a shadow, a sad shadow, pass across my companion's face

His face brightened up at once, and the eyes behind the thick-lensed spectacles suddenly came to life

"I'm Kipling," he said

I stared at him in astonishment, and then, realising that he might perhaps be dangerous, I smiled feebly and said, "Oh, yes?"

"You probably don't believe me I'm dead, of course "

"So I thought "

"And you don't believe in ghosts?"

"Not as a rule "

"But you'd have no objection to talking to one, if he came along?"

"I'd have no objection But how do I know you're Kipling? How do I know you're not an imposter?"

"Listen, then

When my heavens were turned to blood,
When the dark had filled my day,
Furthest, but most faithful, stood
That lone star I cast away
I had loved myself, and I Have not lived and dare not die "

"Once," he said, gripping me by the arm and looking me straight in the eye, "once in life I watched a star, , but I whistled, her to go "

"Your star hasn't fallen yet," I said, suddenly moved, suddenly quite certain that I sat beside Kipling "One day, when there is a new spirit of adventure abroad, we will discover you again "

"Why have they heaped scorn on

'I've spent most of my life in India — not your India, but an India that does still have much of the colour and atmosphere that you captured. You know, Mr Kipling, you can still sit in a third class railway carriage and meet the most wonderful assortment of people. In any village you will still find the same courtesy, dignity and courage that the Lama and Kim found on their travels' me for so long?"

"You were too militant, I suppose — too much of an Empire man You were too patriotic for your own good"

He looked a little hurt "I was never very political," he said "I wrote over 600 poems, and you could only call a dozen of them political, I have been abused for harping on the theme of the White Man's Burden but my only aim was to show off the Empire to my audience — and I believe the Empire was a fine and noble thing Is it wrong to believe in something? I never went deeply into political issues, that's true You must remember, my seven years in India were very youthful years I was in my twenties, a little immature if you like, and my interest in India was a boy's interest Action appealed to me more than anything else You must understand that"

"No one has described action more vividly, or India so well I feel at one with Kim wherever he goes along the Grand Trunk Road, in the temples at Banaras, among the Saharanpur fruit gardens, on the snow-covered Himalayas Kim has colour and movement and poetry"

'I'm Kipling,' he said. I stared at him in astonishment, and then, realising that he might perhaps be dangerous, I smiled feebly and said, 'Oh, yes?' 'You probably don't believe me. I'm dead, of course.' 'So I thought'

He sighed, and a wistful look came into his eyes

"I'm prejudiced, of course," I continued "I've spent most of my life in India — not your India, but an India that does still have much of the colour and atmosphere that you captured You know, Mr Kipling, you can still sit in a third class railway carriage and meet the most wonderful assortment of people In any village you will still find the same courtesy, dignity and courage that the Lama and Kim found on their travels"

"And the Grand Trunk Road? Is it still a long winding procession of humanity?"

"Well, not exactly," I said, a little ruefully "It's just a procession of motor vehicles now The poor Lama would be run down by a truck if he became too dreamy on the Grand Trunk Road Times have changed There are no more Mrs Hawksbees, in Shimla, for instance"

There was a faraway look in Kipling's eyes Perhaps he was imagining himself a boy again, perhaps he could see the hills or the red dust of Rajputana, perhaps he was having a private conversation with Privates Mulvaney and Ortheris, or perhaps he was out hunting with the Seonee wolf-pack The sound of London's traffic came to us through the glass doors, but we heard only the creaking of bullock-cart wheels and the distant music of a flute

He was talking to himself, repeating a passage from one of his stories "And the last puff of the daywind brought from the unseen villages the scent of damp wood-smoke, hot cakes, dripping undergrowth, and rotting pine-cones That is the true smell of the Himalayas, and if once it creeps into the blood of a man, that man will at the last, forgetting all else, return to the hills to die"

A mist seemed to have risen between us -- or had it come in from the streets? — and when it cleared, Kipling had gone away

I asked the gatekeeper if he had seen a tall man with a slight stoop, wearing spectacles

"Nope," said the gatekeeper "Nodoby been by for the last ten minutes"

"Did someone like that come into the gallery a little while ago?"

"No one that I recall What did you say the bloke's name was?"

"Kipling," I said

"Don't know him"

"Didn't you ever read The Jungle Book?"

"Sounds familiar Tarzan stuff, wasn't it?"

I left the museum, and wandered about the streets for a long time, but I couldn't find Kipling anywhere Was it the boom of London's traffic that I heard, or the boom of the Sutlej river racing through the valleys?

GILLIAN WRIGHT'S  COLUMN

MOORS, CASTLES AND WHISKEY

At London's King's Cross Road station, I joined a queue waiting for the premier express of the east coast route to Scotland — The Northern Lights The journey from London to Dundee takes only six hours, but for the English and the Scots this is a long journey indeed, a journey from the English capital to a country whose inhabitants have long regarded themselves an oppressed people

Whenever you mention to the Scots the ill effects of colonial rule in I dia, you can be sure of the echo, "Just as happened with us and the English"

The queue moved, and I climbed into a carriage with my copy of the Scotsman, the nation's leading newspaper It seemed only natural that the main feature article concerned the poet Robert Burns The article concentrated on the national poet's last years, when he was crippled by rheumatics which eventually killed him

His employers at the excise department, were shown to be heartless men When he'd become too ill to work they'd just reduced him to penury by cutting his wages

The 85-year-old lady sitting opposite me offered me some nuts and raisins She was, like me, travelling to Dundee, a city once famous for jam, jute and journalism It has long links with India — notably through jute

My companion told me she'd joined a jute mill in Dundee when she was just 14, but had left when she had married "It was the Indians," was her view "They started manufacturing jute themselves"

The jute factories have a long history According to a local historian, these factories and those for cotton too, were built in a rough triangle along two burns, or streams The first factories were powered by water and had a dual purpose as 'meal' mills grinding Scottish oats

Then steam replaced water as the source of power But once the industry declined it never revived and it now a shipment of jute arrives from India to feed the handful of remaining mills, it's worth a story in the local newspaper

The train sped through the green of England to the border country where my companion told me I'd be sure to notice the change of air — it was always colder in Scotland To the right was the deep blue of the seas

We stopped briefly at Edinburgh's Waverley station, built in the bottom of the drained loch that once formed part of the city's defences Above the station towards the castle, standing on a huge rock, and in the other direction was a mountain of unspoilt moorland

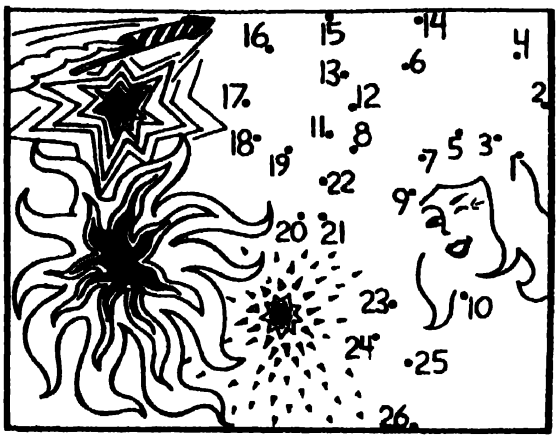
To the north the Firth of Forth cut deeply into the coast To reach Dundee the train rumbled over the Fourth bridge, one of the most dramatic pieces of railway engineering there is, and then over another great bridge spanning the River Tay

Just across the Tay lies Dundee, with its tall stone buildings and their sash windows which rattle like the gates of hell when the wind rises from the North Sea The view across the Tay is breathtaking Indeed, if there is one thing which most obviously separates Scottish cities from most English ones It is that they have not let themselves be destroyed by roads, multi-storey car parks and ugly buildings of inhuman scale

This has required effort and imagination When I moved on from Dundee to the city of Glasgow, I discovered I had arrived on the very day that the man who had saved the city from the developers died

Sir Robert Grieve, poet and polymath, engineer and planner, had been appalled by plans to turn Glasgow into what he termed a "pincushion city" with 650 tower blocks His care was for the social aspects of town planning, for properly balanced communities, and he understood well that Glaswegians wanted their children to grow up with gardens to play in

Due to his intervention only a few of the tower blocks were built, and they proved so disastrous they were dynamited at the beginning of the Eighties



Glaswegians look down on Edinburgh to the east, and the people of Edinburgh on Glasgow — but an outsider can see the beauty in all the great cities — in the castle of Edinburgh, the merchant grandeur of Glasgow and the glistening granites of Aberdeen

The Scots may feel exploited by the English, but they haven't let English "colonisation" make them in any way inferior They are proud of their continuing literary excellence, engineering prowess, art schools, football, cultural festivals, whiskey and a tradition for independent thinking that has virtually wiped the Conservative Party from the face of the land The state of their cities perhaps best shows their wisdom and the most positive side of national pride

DOLL OF A DOLL

This plastic paragon may have been mired in controversy, but that has hardly stood in the way of her popularity if the New York art exhibition starring the doll is to be believed. Lisa Sabbage chronicles her transition

When Ruth Handler created the Barbie doll for the Mattel toy company in 1959, she had no idea that 36 years later her brainchild would be the most popular doll in the world or that Barbie would be the star of her very own New York art exhibition.

Truth, as they say, is stranger than fiction, and there are few stories as strange as that of the Barbie doll

Chronicled in all her pink plastic glory in 'Art, Design and Barbie· The evolution of a Cultural Icon' at the Liberty Street gallery, Barbie's life had surprisingly unwholesome and un-American beginnings.

Ruth Handler, co-founder of Mattel with her husband Elliot, wanted to add a doll to the company's growing range of toys and was searching for inspiration when she happened to come across the Bild Lilli doll

Lilli, a titillating novelty doll sold to men in post-war Germany, crystallised everything Handler had been look-

Like Lilli, Barbie was given an adult body with cone-shaped breasts and a waspish waist. However, Barbie was reduced to 11-and-a-half and was given a wardrobe, accessories, her own home and furniture.

"Mattel saw the adult doll as a focal point for a whole concept, a whole world," explains Susan Hedrick, one of the exhibition curators and a member of the Barbie generation of the prosperous Fifties.

"It was a ripe time for it," she says "There were a lot of kids growing up in the baby atmosphere of the Fifties Barbie was part of the whole fantasy of growing up and having a wonderful figure like that, and all these clothes and shoes and accessories, and having a dream house and car and boyfriend"

As well as tracing the evolution of Barbie, the exhibition also gives a carte blanche to 50 artists to explore their own — not always nice — feelings toward Barbie and her perfect lifestyle

Jill Greenberg blows her up into a giant 50-' woman attacking New York in a large format photograph, Barbara Nessim draws her in 'Imelda Marcos Ain't Got Nothing on Me' proudly displaying her exquisite collection of shoes, and Holger Scheibe pictures her being kissed passionately by a muscular male model

Now 36, Barbie has gone through a lot of changes — 500 professional makeovers in fact

"The original Barbie has a very sophisticated Fifties-style fashion model face, with arched eyebrows and hair in a pony tail," says curator and fashion writer Valerie Steele.

"Then over the course of the Sixties, her hair changed Her makeup changed Her eyebrows became less arched. She got a lot of different hairstyles — the bubble cut, the page boy. And gradually in the Seventies, the face got younger, the hair got longer, the face got sweeter-looking, less sophisticated."

Steele says the burgeoning youth culture and the new feminine ideal of the Sixties triggered this metamorphosis.

"You see it in the fashion models, this switch away from the very glamorous 1950 model, who was often a woman of 30, very sophisticated, very soigne — to a younger, swinging chick fashion model, like Jean Shrimpton or Twiggy in the Sixties and Seventies.

BARBIE FACTS

- Barbie dolls outnumber the population of Canada.
- Nearly 1 billion Barbie dolls and family members have been sold since 1959
- Placed head-to-toe, the dolls would circle the earth more than 11 times
- Barbie has about 120 new outfits designed for her each year
- Two Barbie dolls are sold every second somewhere in the world
- Barbie had more than 500 professional makeovers
- Look out Imelda, Barbie has more than one billion pairs of shoes
- The dolls are sold in more than 140 countries
- More than 910 million Barbie fashions have been produced since 1959
- An original Barbie doll can fetch up to US $4,500

Barbie's permutations have not been popular with everyone, however American journalist David Trinidad believes Barbie hit her peak in the Sixties with her haute couture, Jackie-O-influenced fashions

" In the Seventies, Barbie took a nosedive with her poorly made Bicentennial and Olympics costumes and her Farrah Fawcett Superstar look," he says scathingly.

"Though she managed to bounce back in the Eighties with a line of Dynasty-esque dresses, the doll never fully recaptured her initial sense of style"

It's not just Barbie's fashion sense that has come under fire in recent years. The doll and her manufacturers have been accused of perpetuating sexist stereotypes, and bombarding girls with unrealistic images of women.

Groups of Barbie survivors are apparently forming all over America, meeting like Alcoholics Anonymous to share stories of their painful relationship with Miss B

True, the exhibition's Sixties' section features the painfully gender-bound Dr Ken and Nurse Barbie, Ken the pilot and Barbie the stewardess.

True, Barbie has no nipples or hips, her eyes are twinklingly blue, her hair is perfectly blonde and, most bizarre, her feet are permanently on tip-toe

Indeed, American plastic surgeons have reported that some women come to them in a desperate effort to look like Barbie

But Mattel has taken some of the criticism on board Twenty years ago, Barbie's career aspirations may have gone no further than beauty queen and the vague 'career girl', but since the Seventies, she has attained eminently more sublime job titles, including surgeon, business executive, paediatrician, scuba diver, firefighter, Unicef amabassador, summit diplomat and even presidential candidate

Then there is the faintly ridiculous rap musician, rollerblade skater, Radio City Music Hall rockette, Air Force Thunderbird squadron leader and Ice Capades star

And since 1980, Mattel has sought to redress Barbie's racial bias by manufacturing a multi-cultural range, including the Native American Barbie, Oriental Barbie, Nigerian Barbie, Russian Barbie, and even a Royal Barbie of England

Ironically, the debate over Barbie's politically correctness seems to matter not one iota to the children who adore her, regardless.

Two Barbie dolls are sold every second somewhere in the world, and last year more than 1 5 million of the plastic paragons of feminine virtue were sold each week

Indeed, American girls between the age of three and 10 own on an average of eight Barbie dolls each In Italy it is seven, and in both France and Germany, it is five

It seems that in the Nineties, the whole world is ripe for Barbie

Wildflowers

Are you too doomed to haunt these sands?
They too passed this way
On their way to the desert mirrorland
Mirror Mirror on the wall
Do you recall?

It was a caravan to another time
Spurred on
By the Vision luring minds

Through hail and mists
Deserts of snow
Through the forests of iron trees
On the craggy highland silences
Few returned
Of their trials upon the Lake of Fire
Of their climb up the Crystal Mountains
There remain no traces,
Between the Then and Now
There lingers scattered
A few stubborn bleached bones
And handfuls of wildflowers here and there
Caught amongst the weeds and stones

(. So, a spirit without roots is an injustice
It rejects the beauty that is offered it) — Pablo Neruda, (Exile)
I toddled a winded path yesterday
Through a forest of voices,
Burrowed landscapes, strange hats, funny lingo
(Did I choose? Was there any choice?)
Bubble feet rising to the crest
And dreaming another man's dream
We became such agreeable exiles in our own land
In this surge of time
The ocean tides climb the mountains
Are we to be submerged in the sea forever, brother?
What hands played the cosmic dice
To chance this harsh sarcasm
That tonight I stand amidst the waters
A shell in hand
Trying to trap a lost wind of the hills
From uncertain leagues under the sea.

Anatomy of Terror

It is the day of the jackal
The red hot eyes the sun of the day
A corpse lies in the street
His face away from this greedy world
A lot of blood smears the road
Witness to the fire in his heart

Silence reins as the blank faces
Look down the road,
They have learnt to disdain at heart
But respect in open, the fearsome God
The deadly God is omnipresent,
It looks down upon them with its Thousand heads and numerous hands
An army of weapons,
Out terrorising people,
The minds of whose have been
Dumb since the last blast of ideals
The silence of the lambs
Deafens my mind,
I want to speak aloud my terror.
And my disdain for those
Who practise it and their kind.
But the fear is grippening
And the lambs are silent

BOOKS

Brando sings at last!: There must be at least a dozen books on Marlon Brando, one of the greatest actors of our times (some nasties call him one of the greatest mumblers of our times). But they were largely dismissed as inaccurate, based on hearsay, sensationalist or plain prurient.

But Brando: Songs My Mother Taught Me, written in collaboration with Robert Lindsey (Random House; distributed in India by IBD (Bombay) Limited; Rs 675) will be the most definitive work on the intriguing star. Lindsey, chief West Coast correspondent for The New York Times, previously collaborated with Ronald Reagan on his autobiography, An American Life.

Here, Brando narrates his life in his own words "so that my children can separate the truth from the myths that others have created about me, as myths are created about everyone swept up in the turbulent and distorting maelstrom of celebrity in our culture".

Apart from brutally frank accounts of career and life, there are a whole lot of fabulous and rare pictures right from a nine-month-old Marlon and his house. A fascinating read and, as Brando says, "I never get tired of waiting for the next magic."

FASHION

Hallmark: Harmony

■ Chandan Mitra's tribute to Salil Chowdhury was excellent ('Symphony No More', September 24).

Salil Chowdhury's hallmark was his vibrancy and lilting tunes. Each of his compositions bears his distinct stamp: that of harmony.

During those halcyon days of the IPTA movement the musical master discovered that music was a juxtaposition of tune and rhythm. And so his Alor patha jatri and Runner have this harmony at their core

In the sphere of Bengali modern music (adhunik gaan) Salil Chowdhury brought out the best from talented singers like Shyamal Mitra (Jak ja gachche ta jak), Dhananjay Bhattacharjee (Jhanan jhanan baje), Dwijen Mukhopadhyay (Pallabi go sancharini) and Subir Sen (Aei ujjwala din).

Some of Salil Chowdhury's compositions with Hemanta Mukhopadhyay and Lata Mangeshkar have greatly enriched the repertoire of Indian music.

Salil Chowdhury with Lata Mangeshkar: Magical melody

The genius and his music will forever be a source of great inspiration
Jayanta Mitra,
Calcutta

■ I cannot agree with your headline, 'Symphony No More'. Music is immortal and as long as man lives symphony will be there

Also, I dispute a particular fact in the cover story It says Salil Chowdhury introduced Lata Mangeshkar to Bengali songs in 1959

To the best of my knowledge it was Satinath Mukhopadhyay who introduced Lata to Bengal with that unforgettable number, Aakash pradip jwale doorer tarar pane cheye...
Nirmalendu Chakraborty,

■ Never one to be swayed by lucre, the communist Salil Chowdhury believed in simple living and high thinking

■ One by one the best names in the music industry are passing away Mohammad Rafi, Kishore Kumar, Mukesh, Hemanta Mukhopadhyay, R D Burman, Salil Chowdhury the men who could enthral listeners and move them to tears

Singers with such mellifluous voices or music directors with such rare talent will not be born again. We will have to live with their clones

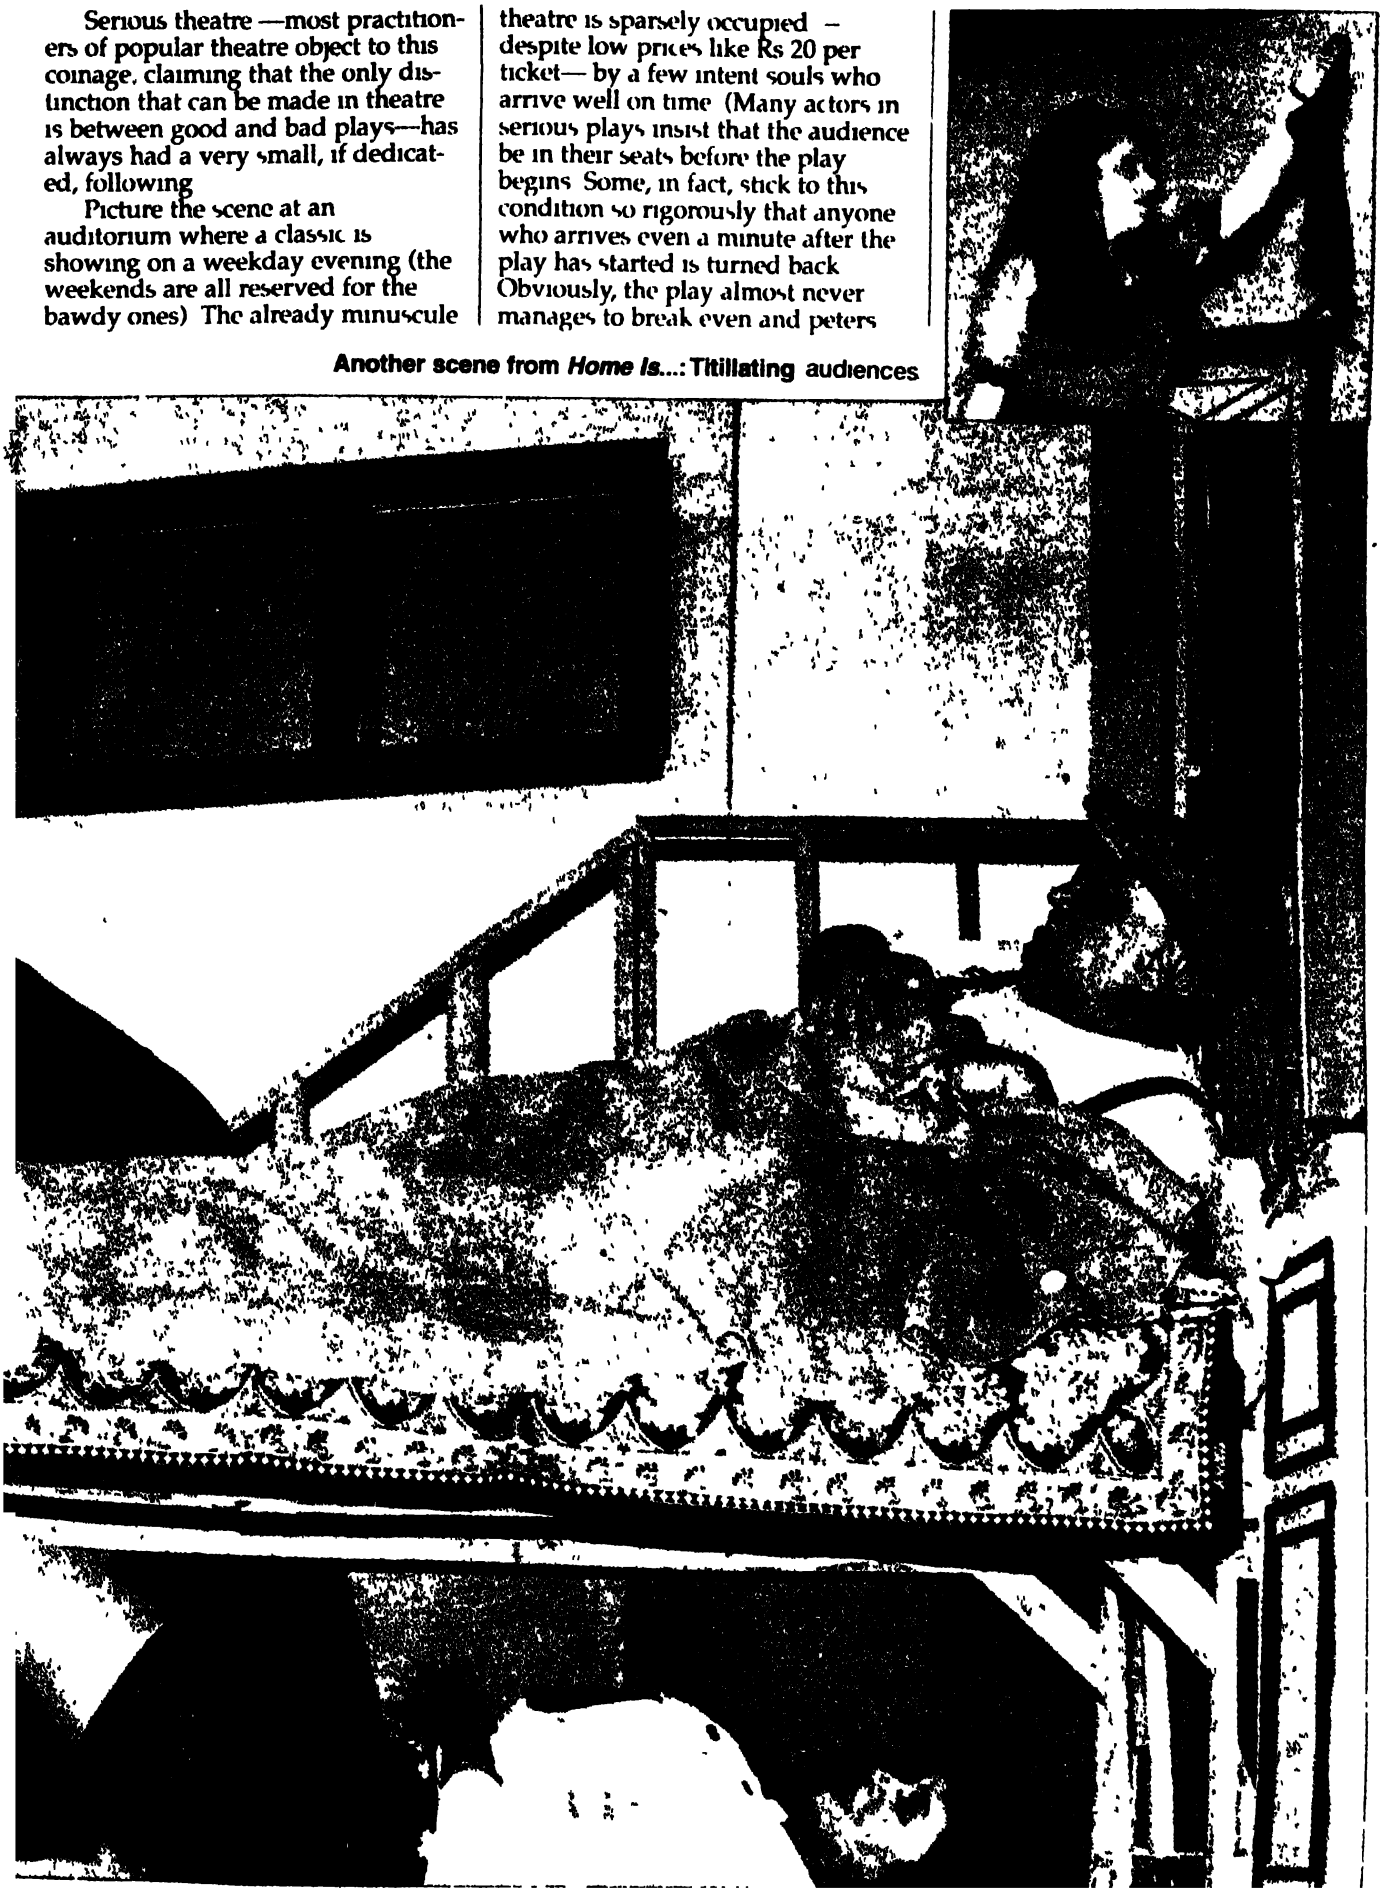
COVER STORY

The LOW-DOWN

A good evening out for most Bombayites seems to be the popular theatre, either in English or in Gujarati Most of it, however, is nothing more than two hours of smutty one-liners of the tritest variety, with some cheesecake thrown in for added spice Vaishali Honawar checks out its hold on the teeming audiences

Photographs by Prashant Arora

IT IS THEATRE THAT THE PURISTS CLAIM they "wouldn't touch with a bargepole". Theatre that no critic wants to write about in the papers because "it's just not theatre". Theatre that is all about double entendre and girls strutting around in hotpants, leaving little to the imagination as they tell a story that is best forgotten, if it is absorbed at all, by an audience that is too busy looking and laughing.



Popular theatre often, if not always, a euphemism for laugh-a-minute sitcoms with some bare flesh thrown in may be shunned by the classes, but who cares? Certainly their makers do not. Who wants a few lines or a review in the papers when the ticket sales could not be better? Whether the classes like it or not popular theatre is here to stay And to flourish, say the statistics.

Home Is Where Your Trouser Is : Light-hearted fun

Serious theatre —most practitioners of popular theatre object to this coinage, claiming that the only distinction that can be made in theatre is between good and bad plays—has always had a very small, if dedicated, following

Picture the scene at an auditorium where a classic is showing on a weekday evening (the weekends are all reserved for the bawdy ones) The already minuscule theatre is sparsely occupied – despite low prices like Rs 20 per ticket— by a few intent souls who arrive well on time (Many actors in serious plays insist that the audience be in their seats before the play begins Some, in fact, stick to this condition so rigorously that anyone who arrives even a minute after the play has started is turned back Obviously, the play almost never manages to break even and peters

out after a few shows)

Compare this with the bustling, lively crowd that descends on a 700-seat auditorium in a city suburb late on a Sunday night where Monkey Business, written and directed by Bombay's most-loved name in popular theatre, Bharat Dabholkar, is showing Tickets, as a rule, have to be booked in advance for even Lady Luck cannot work her miracle for you in case you are the 11th-hour type This, despite the fact that the cheapest ticket costs as much as Rs 50 Even the Rs 200 rows are full

The crowd, hold your breath is not made of single, lecherous males as you expected, but of bubbly Gujarati and Parsi families with their brood of five and 10-year-olds, or teenagers out for an evening of mirth and, perhaps, a little titillation Single males account for as little as one per cent of the audience As Bharat Dabholkar, the man whose pen and directorial wand weave this Sunday-night spell, says "Theatre has become a family outing"

So it has The scene before the curtains go up resembles that at a party as people spot friends and chat over cups of hot tea and batata wadas in the lobby Visibly, this is a regular pastime No wonder, then, that while Monkey Business itself is into its 50th show and thriving, others of this genre have done as many as 500 runs

Significantly, all these plays are staged in theatres in the suburbs where the family audiences are, while shows in the city areas are kept to a minimum

"Theatre is the only form of live entertainment available to people in the city today," says Marzban Patel of Burjor Patel Productions, which has produced such popular plays as

Pooja Bedi: The leggy attraction in Carry on Papa; (right) Viju Khote and Harish Patel in Bottoms Up

All that the audiences here seem to demand is two hours of one-liners about the plumber coming home to screw the right one... that will have them in splits. And, of course, the current box-office siren or leggy girl thrown in for a bit of sizzle and sparkle

Run For Your Wife, My Darling Daughter, the Bottoms Up revues, the Carry On series and Monkey Business

"Marathi theatre is popular even in small towns and Gujarati theatre is doing extremely well too," he says. In Bombay, particularly, popular theatre (English and Gujarati) seems to be the undisputed king of the marquee. "It is the only kind of theatre people want to watch," says Dabholkar who, in his 10-year involvement with popular theatre, has churned out 13 hits, including two children's plays. His other successes include the Bottoms Up revues, the Carry On series, Run For Your Wife and now, Monkey Business. Good Night Baby Dino, one of his children's plays, is running to packed houses currently and is an "experimental" popular play where the players are all puppets. "Serious theatre is not the only experimental and artistic form of theatre in existence. We, too, have done a lot of experimentation in our plays," says Dabholkar. "I once did a Marathi classic called Purush which was running alongside a popular play of mine called The Last Tango In Paris. But we found that The Last Tango was doing better in its 50th show than Purush in its 10th!" An incident that seems to have strengtheshened his belief that theatre is for entertainment, for people to enjoy.

"There really is nothing like serious and popular theatre," he says. "The only difference is between good and bad theatre. If a play doesn't work, you cannot say that the audience is stupid. Good theatre is something that people want to see and something which has not been done before. They want to see something entertaining, something different and not just something which only the director and writer will understand."

He cites here the words of the noted Maharashtrian playwright, P.L. Deshpande, who once said that "if a director says that his theatre is something that everyone cannot understand, then he shouldn't be advertising it." "Instead, he should just stage it for his few friends and family members who he feels will understand it."

Says Alyque Padamsee, theatre director who has done such 'straight' English plays as Evita, Othello and Roshni, "Theatre covers a wide spectrum and the key to theatre is involvement. If puns and jokes with double meaning involve the audience, there is nothing wrong with it."

He cites the Phallus Comedies of the ancient Romans where the actors hit each other with penises, and Shakespeare's plays which often had bawdy jokes. "Theatre can only exist between the actors and the audience and if one of the parties is missing namely, the audience, then there is no theatre, high-brow or low-brow."

But what about the fact that popular plays often do not follow a storyline worth mentioning, concentrating only on titillation and puns? Dabholkar denies this is the case with most popular plays. "I myself have done different kinds of things, including topical revues such as Bottoms Up. We would weave in such issues as politics, the airlines, MTV songs and even Rabindrasangeet, with humour being the mainstay. In fact, no two shows of Bottoms Up were ever similar."

Darling Darling: A big hit

Director-writer Shafi Inamdar feels that people come to the theatre after a long, hard day's work to be entertained. And that is what he will give them. Inamdar himself has done quite a few serious plays like Anjan Shaher, Ekshuff and Neela Kamra in addition to comedies such as Baa Retire Thaye Chhe which did as many as 500 shows, and Doctor Tame Pan which did 150 shows. And while his serious plays, he claims, did almost as well, he prefers to do popular plays more often "because I would like to perform before maximum audiences."

He finds the clearcut distinction between popular theatre and serious theatre not too correct. "When Samuel Beckett's Waiting For Godot was staged for the first time, it was performed in a jailhouse. And it was widely appreciated That just goes on to show that something need not be titillating or funny to be popular"

Unfortunately, that is not the way the wind blows back home All that the audiences here seem to demand is two hours of one-liners about the plumber coming home to screw the right one (most of them trite and as stale as the schoolboy jokes of your father's times· perfect recent example being Dinyar Contractor's Home Is Where Your Trouser Is) that will have them in splits And, of course, the current box-office siren or leggy girl or two thrown in for a bit of sizzle and sparkle (cinema cabaret artistes like

A scene from Hotel Motel Patel

Poonam Dasgupta/great bods like Pooja Bedi, or a pretty young thing holding up a bra accompanied by a smutty wisecrack)

"When we used to do straight English plays, we found that after doing 50-60 shows the audiences would peter out," says Marzban Patel "Now we prefer doing Hinglish theatre with Bharat Dabholkar which the audiences love"

This, he is quick to add, does not mean that straight English plays are not doing well at all He points out, as an example, Hosi Vasunia's Sound Of Music which has been doing very well and is said to be the number one play in the city today

Inamdar feels that the popularity of comedy can be used by the director and writer to put across a message "If I have something to say, something with a popular appeal, I can tell the story in my own way After all, people see the situations that arise in a play going on around them all the time What they are interested in is your side of it, in your approach"

Says Dabholkar, "Often we take up a serious subject and try to take it to the masses in a language they can understand We Indianised Evita as Savita and used a lavani as the opening song The audience was thrilled," he recalls

Inamdar points out that his Hindi comedy, All The Best, which is another runaway hit, is also a different subject and is devoid of any double-meaning dialogue But does this mean that he keeps away from dirty puns all the time? "I rarely use them," he says "What I do is give the actors a situation and leave it to their imagination to interpret it Actors themselves tend to catch on to what they feel was popular in the previous show"

But he has, he admits, used bedroom scenes and double entendre in his comedies like Chungching. "That play had a different rhythm and required that kind of handling People liked it a lot" That is certainly the response to most popular plays The crowds, as Marzban Patel says, "simply lap up all the stuff", puns and all The dirty lines have them rolling in the aisles And the parodies evoke hearty applause

But how artful is it, one wonders, to use dirty puns and titillation to entertain people for a price -- an expensive ticket?

"Our plays never cross the vulgarity line," says Patel in defence "I have heard of theatre-owners asking directors to tone down their lines and of people walking out when the vulgarity gets overbearing, but that has never happened with us"

The punning itself, he says, has to be done artfully "We have different writers doing different kinds of work We often stage plays by the British playwright, Ray Coony, and he has his own style of punning while Dabholkar has his own style It is difficult to come by a comedy which does not use double-meaning dialogue But the audiences love it, so what's wrong?"

Padamsee feels that the only danger with the growing popularity of these kind of plays is that an audience that is constantly titillated (instead of undergoing a deeply felt human experience) gradually loses its sensitivity to appreciate serious theatre

There is here, perhaps, a lesson for the makers of serious theatre who often churn out boring, heavy stuff under the name of classics or meaningful plays Says Padamsee, "The answer lies not in doing plays that turn off the audiences, but in doing plays that have serious themes which also grip the audience's imagination"

His advice to young playwrights, then, is to "not just grip the mind, but the hearts as well"

He himself watches popular theatre and enjoys it, he says, citing the skits in the Bottoms Up series which he found very satirical and revealing "in the best sense of the word" "I believe Bharat Dabholkar is a perceptive satirist and not just a libidinous satirist," he says

Personally, however, Padamsee prefers doing theatre "that engages not just the senses, but the mind as well I'm quite prepared to see any theatre, but when it comes to making plays, I'd rather do the Theatre of Ideas"

One finds that the Gujaratis and Parsis constitute nearly 90 per cent of the audiences of popular plays which is, perhaps, one of the reasons why, as some critics point out,

Gujarati theatre is mostly dirty theatre Paresh Rawal, Hindi film actor who also acts in and directs Gujarati plays of the serious kind, denies this "Gujarati audiences are quite discriminating when it comes to good and bad theatre I have been in this field for 20 years and despite my third-rate reputation as a Hindi film villain, my Gujarati viewers have always given my plays a fair judgment," he says He points out, as an example, Sujata Mehta's serious play, Chitkar, which has done as many as 450 shows

'The answer lies not in doing plays that turn off the audiences, but in doing plays that have serious themes which also grip the audience's imagination.' Alyque Padamsee's advice to young playwrights, then, is to 'not just grip the mind, but the hearts as well'

But no matter how well the serious theatre*wallahs* do, the pop theatre*wallahs* do better After all, the masses are with them Which is what seems to keep them going despite the fact that most of them are busy balancing their theatre work with other professions

That is a necessity, says Patel, for English theatre in this country is just not professional enough for one to make a living out of it Even the staggering amount brought in by the ticket sales and the fact that most of the actors' clothes are sponsored is not enough to earn the director, writer and actors their bread and butter "All we seek to do is break even in the long run," says Patel "We're not into theatre for the money"

Which is also the reason why they have not yet got around to getting their plays fully sponsored "as we're too busy from nine to nine" But that is an area he would certainly like to look into as the "shows offer invaluable sponsorship opportunities for 900 quality people every week"

But until the money comes in, the sheer excitement of pulling in the audiences and giving them two hours of laughs keeps the mare going

Entertainment is all

SCENE? OR OBSCENE?

And what's it like in Calcutta? The set kind, says Anil Grover

What's entertainment? At the best of times, entertainment is a nebulous word What was entertainment, certainly not plain hard work, for Hugh Grant in the backseat of his BMW, was merely a "lewd act" for most others Ditto for the cabaret artistes (accent on the noun) who were arrested by the Calcutta Police while performing and, no doubt, entertaining a packed Minerva theatre audience last fortnight which was there ostensibly to see a play, Madame X And with them went the entire ensemble, producer, director and all

Where does one draw the line, as many concerned parties have asked And a very valid point is how is the police competent to be our moral guardians? What, after all, is a 'lewd act' (at the Oscars next time, Hugh Grant will be thanking his mom, dad and family dog while the rest of the world will be thanking him for adding a new phrase to international entertainment vocabulary)? A vamp in a play throwing off her clothes one by one to show how terrible such girls are in society? A fat old businessman character mouthing obscenities, slang and double entendre for a belly laugh? Or a traffic constable hauling up a truck driver with a baton raised in one hand and the other palm extended towards the driver's shirt pocket?

It also reminds one of a Khushwant Singh crack in one of his columns ages back in The Illustrated Weekly of India A great defender of non-censorship and anything even remotely lewd, he was writing about customs piling on to people coming from abroad and grabbing cigarettes, foreign liquor (those days, electronic goods hadn't really been invented) and pornographic magazines known basically through two names, Playboy and Penthouse

During that time, Al Goldstein had come out with the mother of all porn literature called Screw Khushwant Singh narrated a story of how they allowed that magazine to pass, mistaking it to be an engineering magazine!

Debashish Chowdhury

Cabaret dancers being arrested from Minerva Theatre

But the people who read or see such stuff know In the Seventies, a play, Baar Bodhu, had become a sensation because of its daring presentation and theme, and hoardings showing its nubile heroine, Manju Chakraborty, in a bedroom scene with the director-hero, Ashim Chakraborty, and her black bra strap showing on a bare shoulder from which the negligee had slipped It had become a cause celebre, banned, unbanned, blah blah

Since then, the Left Front became our moral guardian Jumping up from the lewdest of lewd acts, that is, politics, they summarily banned cabarets in hotels, including five-star ones So, the famous Lido Room at the Grand Hotel stopped presenting Luscious Lola, who had become the heartthrob of the cocktail circuit then, and soon stopped existing, too Now, you have the Firpo's Market there selling office shirts at Rs 135, fixed price

But cabarets and other allied art forms are like a piece of cork you push it deep down into the water, but it has a bad habit of jumping up elsewhere So, cabarets were introduced to Bengali commercial theatre as their highlights and something where the Miss Shefalis and Miss Js could continue their art form and survive

And what was the audience like? The middleclass bhadro families, who also pride in entertaining themselves through intellectual pursuits only such as dance, Rabindrasangeet, theatre (of all kinds — one wall, jatra, dance dramas, Group Theatre, Third Theatre, commerical theatre, adda)

At the commercial theatres, the middleclass families (sometimes the top cops and their families were special invitees when scenes would be cleverly edited to get an approval and recommendation) fool themselves that they are watching theatre, that most intellectual of pursuits, and therefore entertaining themselves fruitfully unlike the philistine non Bengalis There were some plays which were watched even by children of the family, but they had been taken to watch theatre, not cabarets, so there But it was titillation in the garb of intellectualism, that's socialism, after all

To extend the political argument further, cabarets in the Lido Room were watched by the upper crust and in a sort of exclusive surrounding Cabarets in the seedier joints were watched by those who will ferret out such items or equivalents anywhere in the world, they still do in the patli gali restaurants in the name of gyrating to the tune of Hindi film music being blared out by Kumar Sanu and Mohammad Aziz clones

But children and family is out unless approved by themselves (as in the Lido Room) and only for the well heeled (who would also be able to afford it in some other form anyway) That sort of 'self censorship', in fact was stopped by the act of banning cabarets in hotels Instead, cabarets were offered for Rs 10 for family and children in commercial theatre Plus, a clean conscience you didn't have to look over your shoulders, first right, then left, and right again, and then slink into the joints You could now proudly take your family and children for theatre, not titillation (it is a moot point whether those lower division clerks now more of that on Zee TV's Hindi film countdowns or Doordarshan's MTV telecast showing Prince mouthing, "Put your pussy on my face")

Well, that's entertainment, folks Intellectual, with-it entertainment ■

Women — 5: Cityscapes

(1)
New Delhi, is a young socialite who has all the string pullers, the power-peddlars, brokers, middlemen and pimps tied to her apron strings
She has her acne, you'd never know under the layers of make-up and foundation
A nip here, a tuck there to rejuvenate her sagging assets Always ready to dazzle you with the latest accoutrements, and push the old, forgotten patrician lady, Old Delhi into permanent eclipse

(2)

Calcutta is a woman at a dangerous age—menopause Not yet decided whether to look young or old be fertile or barren remain virtuous or go the way all flesh
But when the sun is down and the light kindlier
you can get a glimpse of what was
You either love or hate her

(3)

Bombay is a transvestite,
Neither here nor there, ready for all takers
as they come, all
The sum of the parts not adding up to the whole
In spite of all the bounties a poor substitute
the real thing

ESSAY

MISTER BHARAT: HOW MAHAAN?

Ramendra Kumar holds forth on a 'beauty pageant' to decide on the man of substance...*

Deb Nair, the high-profile editor of Bharat's first adult magazine, Threadbare, and Randy Joshbhare, the publisher, were sitting in a five-star Irani Hotel, in the heart of Mumbai, sipping one-by-two chai and munching bun-maska

Both were feeling depressed The copies of the last issue of their magazines had been seized by the Government of Mumbai and burnt at street corners Bal Thoko Rav, the super CM of Mumbai, had found the contents obscene He felt the magazines reflected a culturally bankrupt and a morally moribund society and were against the high moral standards set by Chhatrapati Shivaji and Maa Jeejabai

Thoko Ray was particularly upset by Joshbhare since he was a Maratha "How could a true blood Maratha indulge in such depravity?" he had thundered in chaste Marathi

In the latest issue, Nair and Joshbhare had not included any human nudes Instead they had printed photo-photographs of the Khajuraho and Konark sculptures and detailed extracts from the Kamasutra

But how long could they sustain the magazines on mythological and historical porn? They wanted fresh 21st century stuff

Suddenly, Nair jumped up "I have got a terrific idea We should, perhaps, follow Femina?"

"What? You mean we should start writing about nail polish, negligees and nariyal barfee?"

"No, stupid We should organise beauty pageants for men "

"I can't imagine men strutting around in evening gowns and two-piece bikinis And, moreover, they already have a contest called Adonis or something "

"Let me explain It will not be a beauty contest in the typical sense The contest will be for men of substance It will judge not physical beauty, but qualities like charisma, intelligence, wisdom and leadership. The winner will be given the title of Mister Bharat "

"But what will that give us?"

"It will be organised by Threadbare and Blue Flicks This will give our magazines terrific publicity and also some respectability Our sales will zoom and any politician will think twice before burning copies of our magazine "

"It is a great idea But how do we select the contestants?"

"We'll form a committee and finalise the contestants "

Two months later the finals of the Mister Bharat contest began in the Maa Jeejabai Auditorium in Mumbai

The comperes were the famous couple, Madhu Supari and Milind Moron Moron and Supari wanted to appear on the stage dressed only in Stuff shoelaces, but Thoko Ray had objected "How can a Maratha couple indulge in such indecency?" he had screamed As a result Madhu was wearing Nau vari, the traditional Maharashtrian saree and Milind was sporting dhoti kurta As a final obeisance to their Maratha roots both were wearing Kolhapuri chappals

Moron introduced the judges to the audience Kaya Palti (the Queen Minister of Andhra Pradesh), Thobda Day (the Porn Queen of India), Jhoolan Devi (the bandit queen), Lachmi Saraswati (the dethroned Queen of Telugu Nadu), Madari Fixit (the Queen of Hearts) and Joy Lolita (the Empress of Idlypuram)

"The only round in today's finals is the question-answer cum favourite dress round The contestants will be judged on the basis of their answers as well as their attire The first contestant is the daring, dynamic and deadly Bal Thoko Ray, the super CM of Mumbai," declared Moron

Thoko Ray marched onto the stage in the attire of a Maratha warrior It was Kaya Palti's turn to ask him a question

"Mr Thoko Ray, who is the person you admire most and why?"

"My hero is Adolf Butler, the great dictator I admire him for his convictions and ideals Like him, I too want to indulge in ethnic cleansing I do not want any non-Hindu to pollute this sacred land of ours I'll drive all of them away and rename our country Hindia," Thoko Ray declared, and after glaring at Moron, strode back to the strains of a Marathi battle song

The next contestant was T N Tension, the chief de la chief election commissioner He walked on to the stage bare-chested, dressed in dhoti and munching a cucumber

Thobha Day looked at him adoringly and purred, "Dear Mr Tension, I'll ask you three simple questions— 'What is your idea of perfection?'"

"T N Tension"

"What is the single most important event in the history of our country? Why?"

"T N Tension and the answer again is obvious"

There was polite applause Tension removed a carrot from the folds of his dhoti, bit it, and declared, "Gajar khao, accha hai" With these immortal words he waddled off

Suddenly, there was a kind of hush Shuffling of tired feet could be heard The lights had dimmed A tall, portly figure could be seen entering As the figure reached the centre of the stage the lights brightened and the audience stared mesmerised at Empty Trauma Rao clad in a bright red saree and sporting a red earring in his right ear There was some movement where the judges were sitting As the audience craned their necks to look they could see Lachmi Saraswati swaying from side to side and singing, "Mera piya ghar aya, o' Ramjee, mera piya ghar aya, o' Ramjee"

Lots were drawn and it was the turn of Saraswati to ask questions

She got up, made an elaborate namaskaram and said, "Oh! My Brahma, my Vishnu, my Mahesh, my Lord, my Swami, please accept the most respectful obeisance of your most humble daasi With your kind permission I take courage to offer my questions as petals at your mighty feet My first question is— 'Who is the person you love the most?'"

"You, my dear Lachmi, you"

"What was the happiest moment of your life?"

"When I first saw you"

"If you were granted a wish by the Almighty, what would you ask?"

"I would ask for a hundred rebirths in each of which you would be my wife and Chandranana Naidu my pet chimp"

"Oh! My Lord, you are simply divine" With these words Saraswati rushed onto the stage and fell at Trauma Rao's feet He picked her up and embraced her The two of them then walked away, arm in arm, singing, "Khullam khulla pyaar karenge hum dono, is duniya se nahin darenge hum dono"

The next contestant was Laddoo Yadav, the monarch of Patli Putra He was dressed nattily in a bright green two-piece, dark maroon dhoti and yellow tie He was wearing dark glasses, ankle boots and smoking a pipe

"Laddooji, what is your ambition in life?" asked Jhoolon Devi

"I want to export the philosophy of Mandalism to the West In America, they will soon have Blacks, Blacker Than Blacks, Somewhat Blacks, Some Other Blacks, Blacker Than Whites, Creamy Blacks, Whites, Some Other Whites, Somewhat Whites, Whiter Than Blacks, Whiter Than Whites and Creamy Whites I will also ensure the Yadavisation of India In every state, the governor and chief minister will be a Yadav, Bhoputi will become the grandmother tongue and milk will become the national drink"

There was a deafening applause from one section of the crowd Laddoo took an elaborate bow and walked out swinging to the tunes of Apache Indian's Chock There

Macbull Faiyda Husain entered He was clad in a spotless white kurta and dark blue jeans He was as usual barefoot

It was Madari Fixit's turn to ask questions

"Mac, or should I say, Bull*jee*, what has been your greatest achievement?"

"Painting you, my dear Madari Through you I have rediscovered my genius Now I want to paint you on the backs of buses, on trash can lids, on the bald pate of T N Tension, in fact, on any bare surface"

"Then you can paint her on my backside as well as Moron's backside when we are, unlike today, more conventionally dressed," giggled Supari

"Painting Madari on your backside would be a pleasure For painting Moron's backside I can guide Ashok Gay Kavi," retorted Macbull

"What is your message to the common man?" asked Madari

"My message is quite simple Each one should see Hum Aapke Hee Hain at least 50 times In fact I would advise you, my dear Madari, to contest in the presidential elections Before that, of course, the Bharatiya system should be changed from the parliamentary to the presidential one Once you get elected, as you are bound to, then you will be able to solve all our problems "

"How is that, Bull*jee*?" asked Madari

'Quite simple, really When you go to the White House and sing Dhak, dhak karne laga in front of Bill, he will stop peddling arms to Pakistan and run after you singing, Choli ke peechhey kya hai, choli ke peechhey And when you go to Pakistan and sing, I k din banoongi main Nawaz ki rani, in the ears of Nawaz Badmash, he will stop screeching at Bharat and instead sing, "Madari de do, I 16 le lo"

Madari blew a kiss, Macbull bowed and walked out singing, Pehla pehla pyaar hai "

Elkay Oddvani, the the pujya pitamah of Bhajan Mandali, the powerful Hindutva party, walked in dressed in a dhoti and kurta I here was a bow slung over across his left shoulder and he was sporting a quiver full of arrows around his waist He carried a trishul in his left hand and a kamandal in his right In the background could be heard shrieks of Garv se kaho hum Muslim nahin hain and I hum se jo takrayega Barbari Masjid mein mil jayega

Joy Lolita, clad in a golden cape, who was sitting behind her own cutout, got up "Odd*jee*, if you were made the emperor of Bharat for a day what would you do?"

"In the name of positive and constructive secularism I would destroy all the mosques and churches I would formulate an ordinance as per which executives would wear dhoti and kurta to their offices and carry kamandals instead of suitcases The army would fight with bows, arrows and gadas instead of the silly weapons they are using now I would also rename all cities and major streets and business centres Delhi would become Indraprastha, Mumbai Hastinapur, Calcutta Ashwattamanagar and Madras Eklavyapur Connaught Circus would be renamed Kekayi Chowk and Connaught Place, Bharat Chowk Juhu Beach would become Angad Udayan and Cuffe Parade Jamvant Sarani, ityadi ityadi "

There were cries of Jai Shri Ram, as Oddvani bowed and strode off

"With this we come to the end of the Mister Bharat contest While we wait for our analyst to compute the points and declare the winner, we have a presentation " Supari stopped suddenly There was a commotion backstage and a middle-aged man entered He was wearing a shabby kurta and dhoti, his feet were bare, he sported a stubble and his face was drawn and tired

"Who the hell are you and what the hell are you doing here?" demanded Moron advancing menacingly

"I I , the man stuttered "My name is Bechara Seedha, I am a common man Someone told me that there was tamasha going on here I came hoping to get some food for my wife and two children We haven't eaten for days "

"What do you do?"

"I was a teacher I've done my MA in history and won a gold medal I was working as a maali in a government-run school The school closed down due to lack of funds and I was thrown out Since then, I am jobless "

Moron looked at the the audience and declared, "Ladies and gentlemen, I have had a brilliant idea While the analyst computes the scores why don't we request our judges to ask this common man the question they asked our honourable contestants That way we can compare and find out how uncommon our brilliant contestants are "

The suggestion was greeted with a burst of applause Moron handed the mike to Bechara and the questions came hurtling at him

"What is your idea of perfect happiness?"

"A full stomach, a roof over my head and a warm quilt in winter "

'Whom do you admire most and why?"

"A politician because without any intelligence, sincerity, honesty and hard work, he can make millions and rule the country for years "

"If you are granted a wish, what would you ask for?"

"I would ask never to be born again in Bharat as a common man "

"What has been your greatest achievement?"

"My greatest achievement is that in spite of the best efforts of politicians I have still been able to adhere to my principles of honesty and integrity and survive "

"If you were made the emperor of Bharat for a day what would you do?"

"I would jail all the politicians for the rest of their lives and make the common man the emperor for life "

I here was a thunderous applause

Moron took the mike and declared, "Ladies and gentlemen, after this humour break, we have the results and the winner is "

"We know the winner," there was a shout from the crowd Moron looked up surprised

"Yes, we know who should win this contest ," yelled a man getting up and waving his hands

"W who?" stammered Moron

"Bechara Seedha the Common Man," the first man shouted

"Yes yes yes ," roared the crowd rising to its feet and surging ahead

Moron and Supari backed away, as the judges and the honourable contestants huddled in a corner

There were hurried consultations between Deb Nair and Joshbhare Nair rushed forward and whispered in Moron's ear, "Moron, just do as the crowd says or else they will tear us to pieces And it is safer this way in the long run If we declare any one of our contestants as the winner, the other five will make our lives miserable So go ahead and announce the name of Bechara "

"L ladies and gentlemen, as you all have rightly chosen — the winner is Bechara He is conferred the title of Mister Bharat and presented a cheque of Rs 10 lakhs "

"I ten lakhs " stammered Bechara and slumped down

Moron rushed forward and tried to make him get up After a few minutes of fruitless efforts, he checked his pulse

Moron then got up and shaking his head sadly said, "Ladies and Gentlemen, I announce the demise of the winner of the title of Mister Bharat, Bechara Seedha, due to heart failure " ■

When Nathu Broke the Bank

Nathu grumbled to himself as he swept the steps of the Pipalnagar Bank, owned by Seth Govind Ram He used the small broom hurriedly and carelessly, and the dust, after rising in a cloud above his head settled down again on the steps As Nathu was banging his pan against a dustbin, Sitaram, the washerman's son, passed by

Sitaram was on his delivery round He had a bundle of freshly pressed clothes balanced on his head

"Don't raise such dust!" he called out to Nathu "Are you annoyed because they are still refusing to pay you an extra two rupees a month?"

"I don't wish to talk about it," complained the sweeper-boy "I haven't even received my regular pay And this is the 20th of the month Who would think a bank would hold up a poor man's salary? As soon as I get my money, I'm off! Not another week I work in this place" And Nathu banged the pan against the dustbin several times, just to emphasise his point and giving himself confidence

"Well, I wish you luck," said Sitaram "I'll keep a lookout for any jobs that might suit you" And he plodded barefoot along the road, the big bundle of clothes hiding most of his head and shoulders

At the fourth home he visited, Sitaram heard the lady of the house mention that she was in need of a sweeper Tying his bundle together, he said, "I know of a sweeper boy who's looking for work He can't start from next month He's with the bank just now but they aren't giving him his pay, and he wants to leave"

"Is that so?" said Mrs Srivastava "Well, tell him to come and see me tomorrow"

And Sitaram, glad that he had been of service to both a customer and his friend, hoisted his bag on his shoulders and went his way

Mrs Srivastava had to do some shopping She gave instructions to the ayah about looking after the baby, and told the cook not to be late with the mid-day meal Then she set out for the Pipalnagar market place, to make her customary tour of the cloth shops

A large shady tamarind tree grew at one end of the bazaar, and it was here that Mrs Srivastava found her friend Mrs Bhushan sweating in the heat Mrs Bhushan was fanning herself with a large handkerchief She complained of the summer, which she affirmed, was definitely the hottest in the history of Pipalnagar

She then showed Mrs Srivastava a sample of the cloth she was going to buy, and for five minutes they discussed its shade, texture and design Having exhausted this topic, Mrs Srivastava said, "Do you know, my dear, that Seth Govind Ram's bank can't even pay its employees Only this morning I heard a complaint from their sweeper, who hasn't received his wages for over a month!"

"Shocking!" remarked Mrs Bhushan "If they can't pay the sweeper they must be in a bad way None of the others could be getting paid either"

She left Mrs Srivastava at the tamarind tree and went in search of her husband, who was sitting in front of Kamal Kishore's photographic shop, talking with the owner

"So there you are!" cried Mrs Bhushan "I've been looking for you for almost an hour Where did you disappear?"

"Nowhere," replied Mr Bhushan "Had you remained stationary in one shop, I might have found you But you go from one shop to another, like a bee in a flower garden"

"Don't start grumbling The heat is trying enough I don't know what's happening to Pipalnagar Even the bank's about to go bankrupt"

"What's that?" said Kamal Kishore, sitting up suddenly "Which bank?"

"Why the Pipalnagar bank of course I hear they have stopped paying employees Don't tell me you have an account there, Mr Kishore?"

"No, but my neighbour has!" he exclaimed, and he called out over the low partition to the keeper of the barber shop next door "Deep Chand, have you heard the latest? The Pipalnagar Bank is about to collapse You'd better get your money out as soon as you can!"

Deep Chand who was cutting the hair of an elderly gentlemen, was so startled that his hand shook and he nicked his customer's right ear The customer yelped with pain and distress, pain, because of the cut and distress because of the awful news he had just heard With one side of his neck still unshaven, he sped across the road to the general merchant's store where there was a telephone He dialled Seth Govind Ram's number The Seth was not at home Where was he, then? The Seth was holidaying in Kashmir Oh, was that so? The elderly gentleman did not believe it He hurried back to the barber's shop and told Deep Chand "The bird has flown! Seth Govind Ram has left town Definitely, it means a collapse " And then he dashed out of the shop, making a beeline for his office and cheque book

The news spread through the bazaar with the rapidity of forest fire From the general merchant's it travelled to the shop, circulated amongst the customers and then spread with them in various directions, to the betel-seller, the tailor, the free vendor, the jeweller, the beggar sitting on the pavement

Old Ganpat, the beggar, had a crooked leg He had been squatting on the pavement for years, calling for alms In the evening someone would come with a barrow and take him away He had never been known to walk But now, on learning that the bank was about to collapse, Ganpat astonished everyone by leaping to his feet and actually running at top speed in the direction of the bank It soon became known that he had a thousand rupees in savings!

Nathu arrived next morning to sweep the steps of the bank. He saw the refuse and the broken glass and the stones cluttering the steps. Raising his hands in a gesture of horror and disgust he cried: 'Hooligans! Sons of donkey! As though it isn't bad enough to be paid late, it seems my work has also to be increased!' He smote the steps with his broom scattering the refuse

Men stood in groups at street corners discussing the situation Pipalnagar seldom had a crisis, seldom or never had floods, earthquakes or drought, and the imminent crash of the Pipalnagar Bank set everyone talking and speculating and rushing about in a frenzy Some boasted of their farsightedness, congratulating themselves on having already taken out their money, or on never having put any in, others speculated on the reasons for the crash, putting it all down to excesses indulged in by Seth Govind Ram

The Seth had fled the state, said one He had fled the country, said another, he was hiding in Pipalnagar, said a third He had hanged himself from the tamarind tree, said a fourth, and had been found that morning by the sweeper-boy

By noon, the small bank had gone through all its ready cash, and the harassed manager was in a dilemma Emergency funds could only be obtained from another bank some 30 miles distant, and he wasn't sure he could persuade he could persuade the crowd to wait until then And there was no way of contacting Seth Govind Ram on his houseboat in Kashmir

People were turned back from the counters and told to return the following day They did not like the sound of that And so they gathered outside, on the steps of the bank shouting "Give us our money or we'll break in!" and "Fetch the Seth, we know he's hiding in a safe deposit locker!" Mischief makers who didn't have a paisa in the bank,joined the crowd and aggravated their mood The manager stood at the door and tried to placate them He declared that the bank had plenty of money but no immediate means of collecting it, he urged them to go home and come back the next day

"We want it now!" chanted some of the crowd "Now, now, now!"

And a brick hurtled through the air and crashed through the plate glass window of the Pipalnagar Bank

Nathu arrived next morning to sweep the steps of the bank He saw the refuse and the broken glass and the stones cluttering the steps

Raising his hands in a gesture of horror and disgust he cried

"Hooligans! Sons of donkeys! As though it isn't bad enough to be paid late, it seems my work has also to be increased! He smote the steps with his broom scattering the refuse

"Good morning, Nathu," said the washerman's boy, getting down from his bicycle "Are you ready to take up a new job from the first of next month? You'll have to I suppose, now that the bank is going out of business "

"How's that? ' said Nathu

"Haven't you heard? Well you'd better wait here until half the population of Pipalnagar arrives to claim their money" And he waved cheerfully he did not have a bank account and sped away on his cycle

Nathu went back to sweeping the steps, muttering to himself When he had finished his work, he sat down on the highest step, to await the arrival of the manager He was determined to get his pay

"Who would have thought the bank would collapse!" he said to himself, and looked thoughtfully into the distance "I wonder how it could have happened "

The Voice of Ram

I have often heard Bengalis express their distaste at the fact that India since Independence has been dominated by the "cow belt" They will, therefore, be gratified to hear of at least one way in which the Bengali ethos has fought back in the Hindi heartland through Durga Puja

Durga Puja, of course, does not belong to Bengalis In UP, the worship of the goddess is ancient too, but Tulsi Das made the R mayan the focal point of faith, devotion and culture In villages and cities, Ram Lilas based on his Ramayan were sponsored by rajas and zamindars, with all communities co-operating with arrangements

Nevertheless, "fortresses" of Bengali culture grew up in the cities of Varanasi, Allahabad and Lucknow Well organised committees of educated Bengalis collected donations to ensure that Durga Puja was a big event and with time that puja has spread

In Varanasi, pandals are found the length of the city, impeding the movement of traffic at every turn Huge images stand surrounded by flashing multi-coloured illuminations at the end of avenues of tubelights sponsored by the manufacturers of ayurvedic medicines This modernity, sophistication and organisation appeals to Bengalis and non-Bengalis alike, attracting upwardly mobile urbanised and urbanising Hindus, the educated Hindu middle class and the new rich

The celebration of this urban Durga Puja has gained ground throughout the state In Gorakhpur, even the smallest crossroads seems to have its pandal

In Faizabad, next to Ayodhya, contributions are collected from shopkeepers, hotels and hotel guests for Durga Puja but not for Ram Lilas which take place at the same time

Ram Lilas are closing down In the rush for modernisation and a smart materialistic life Durga appears glamorous while Ram, who fought the greatest demon of his age on foot and barefoot, appears in danger of being dismissed as ganwar or contemptibly rustic, only fit for the village

Even in villages all is not well with Ram Lilas One of my best friends is called Ram but used to play Lakshman in his own village near Allahabad, and is a natural for the part His village players use the lilting verse of the Radheshyam Ramayan, but he says there are no longer any good actors to be found to take the Lila seriously The Ram Lila committee itself is beset with arguments

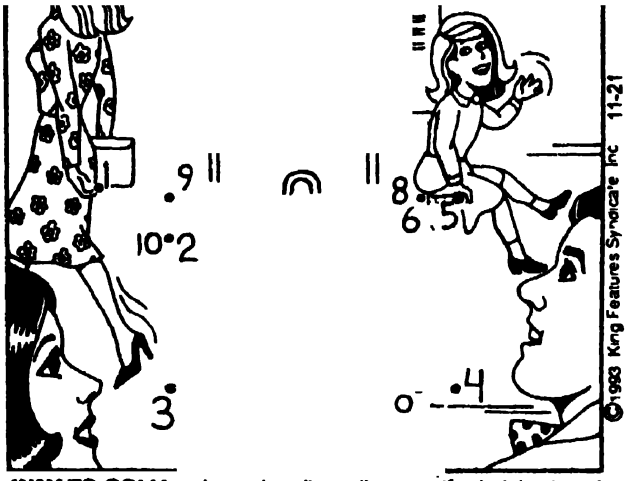
In many other villages, the situation is the same The political awakening of the Dalits, giving them now a new hero in Periyar Ramaswamy Naicker, has led them to challenge upper castes and the traditional concepts of God and helped to destroy the community spirit of the Lila

The abolition of the zamindari has robbed the Ram Lilas of patrons and space to perform A good Ram Lila is nothing less than a mela with thousands of spectators Space is essential and now land has been carved up between owners who have fenced their boundaries

And then there is law and order In places where 20 years ago people did not think twice about walking home at midnight, they now fear robbers, dacoits and murderers And the Ram Lilas are still mainly in the hands of old "pandit-types", rural and traditional, who do not appeal to the young The brighter, better educated boys in any case take to the cities and don't stay at home to play Lakshman any more

The maharaja of Benaras, then, is all the more to be congratulated for maintaining in this new age the most beautiful, and intellectual of all Ram Lilas You need the self-discipline born of culture to appreciate his Ram Lila at Ramnagar otherwise you can't hear anything

At Ramnagar there is no blaring music, there are no tubelights, no loudspeakers or microphones stylised sing-song to carry to the back of the audience, complemented by priests who sing together the words of Tulsi's Ramayan, sitting at the feet of the elephants of Kashi Naresh



The Lila isn't as grand as it once was The gold crowns of Ram and his brothers are dulled with age The monkey and demon armies are a fairly ragged bunch But the maharaja ensures there are enough funds to perform the 31 nights of the Lila and himself attends every single one

His Ram, too, though, is under threat from modernity Audiences are increasingly restless Stallholders who set up shop near the performance are increasingly intrusive And the greatest threat of all is symbolised by the new road bridge rising to cross the Ganga at Ramnagar The new Varanasi bypass will come to Lanka, where the climax of the story is played Then the voice of Ram may well be forever drowned in the roaring of the demons of the road (Sanctuary Features)

The abolition of the zamindari has robbed the Ram Lilas of patrons and space to perform. A good Ram Lila is nothing less than a mela with thousands of spectators. Space is essential and now land has been carved up between owners who have fenced their boundaries.

WAY TO GO! Mom has a handle on things in this holiday travel scene. To complete picture, add lines dot to dot.

WORD PLAY! "How can you make TEA HOT in five steps?" asked Lewis Carroll. That is to say, change one letter in each step to form a new word. Can you comply?

TEA, ten, ton, tot, HOT is one way.

WINNING WAY WITH WORDS

YOU CAN WIN every step of the way in this exercise. Object is to find stepped-off WIN words in accord with these definitions.

1. Take all the marbles (WIN, in place)
2. Eye-flicker signal
3. Show pain with a grimace
4. Snowy time
5. Blowhard's twin
6. Aeroplane measurement
7. Largest lake in Wisconsin

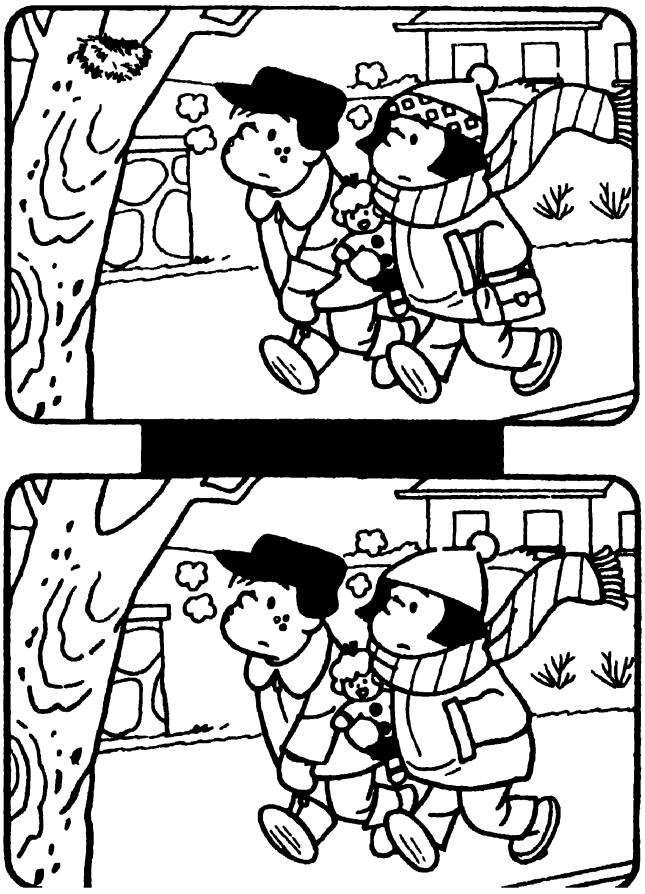
How quickly can you find all of the words?

Time limit: 2 minutes.

1 Win 2 Wink 3 Wince 4 Winie 5 Wind bag 6 wingspan 7 Winnebago



SUM UP! You are asked to complete the addition problem below by inserting digits 1-7 in such a way that each digit in the lower three rows is one more than the digit immediately above it. To begin, for instance, insert 2 under 1,3 under 2 etc. (repeating digits as necessary) until all blanks are filled. What is the sum?

It is simply a matter of digit positioning.

See if you can work it out?

The Dilemma of DRAUPADI

Like Nakul, Sahadev was modest and gentle, but sparing of speech He did not speak unless it was necessary Was talking indispensable? Lines of poetry were written in his very limbs Dreams gathering thick in his eyes conjured up the love-tryst Though he was ever immersed in profound thought, on looking at him it would seem as if you were hearing the rhythm of poetry

The moment he saw me poetry bloomed in his dreamy eyes For some moments he kept staring at me unblinking Drowned in embarrassment, I sat stiff He kept gazing, enamoured, lost Then, somewhat sadly, sighed deeply I got worried What was his grief and why?

He said nothing Should I speak first on the wedding night?

He spoke first "Krishnaa! On earth man alone is aware of death and conscious of the future Therefore, he is afraid, is anxious, has dreams, gets lost in thoughts of the future He suffers too The beast has no worry about the future, the present is its supreme moment This is the difference between man and beast Man planning for the future commits sins as well as virtuous deeds Since the ancient times man's mind has been filled with irrepressible curiosity and anxiety regarding the future Your future flashed before my eyes the moment I saw you in the swayamvar hall Your future is so romantic that on that very day I wished to make myself a partner in it We are princes of Hastinapur but are facing a severe trial What his purpose is in uniting you with our lives, only Govind knows I know only this that you can become a fitting companion on our life-paths On knowing this, the irrepressible desire to get you that had arisen in my heart has been fulfilled But remember one thing when I speak I cannot be wholly frank because since childhood I have been over-sensitive We are twin sons of mother Madri . Nakul is more handsome than me, lively and strong Therefore, he leaves me behind in everything So much so that even in getting the love of our parents I used to be left behind

"Father left us in childhood Ma Kunti filled that vacancy As a child, being quiet by nature, I was not able to think about myself Bhim used to keep Ma Kunti so preoccupied that I did not feel like bothering her much Therefore, I remained content with whatever I got You are my wife, but the other four brothers have equal rights over you Because of their power and strength if all leave me behind in the race for your affection, respect, intimacy, I will not blame you I will not assert my rights by force either My principle is to remain content with whatever comes my way But it is the duty of the wife to understand her husband's mind If you keep performing your duties properly, I will never have to speak my mind about anything"

I sat quiet Why did God give me so many qualities that all five brothers had found their various inclinations and likes in me? What if I failed to satisfy everyone fully?

Can anyone please everyone? Even God cannot satisfy everyone If you try to satisfy everyone no one gets satisfied Your own mind gets weighed down Merely on thinking of this, you lose confidence in yourself I felt helpless and distressed I asked myself, "Who will help me? On whom shall I depend? Govind, who has turned my life into a joke? Does he find happiness in this? All right, Govind, I, too, will find happiness in this Because you are my husband's dear sakha If you are happy, then my husband will be happy It is just in this that my life will become meaningful"

For five days the marriage festivities went on Music, lights, dance and songs, gifts, feasting with all this the Panchal capital echoed with joy like Indra's palace

The weddings were over Now the bridegrooms and the bride were to be sent off It was my misfortune that my husbands had been driven out of their kingdom To save themselves, they were roaming in the forests Where, in which forest, would they keep the gifts given by Father? He had given each son-in-law a thousand begemmed, gold plated chariots with pennants, a thousand sand white elephants decked with gold ornaments, loaded with jewels, many types of luxurious items and beautiful slaves and maids For each son-in-law expensive garments had been given as presents For me, specially, pots of my favourite flowers on a thousand chariots, my pets, my library, my musical instruments, various types of clothes and jewellery Much had come as gifts from Father's allies Krishna, ruler of Dvarka, had sent many presents Among them was a ring set with a blue sapphire and also a maid named Maya

Then Krishna had said, "These two are my favourite things I give you this blue-sapphire ring as my blessing It is my most precious ring I have been wearing it personally There is a special quality in it On gazing at its centre concentratedly for some time many dilemmas are resolved "

Indicating the extremely lovely maid Maya, Govind said, "Since childhood she has been with me She has always taken full note of my needs She loves me so much that she cannot tolerate anyone else serving me In case anyone bothers me, she is ever alert by my side But, whoever stations her in her heart, she envelops him with her love to such an extent that nothing else is visible to him This maid of mine, Maya, is as much the cause of grief as the remover of grief Several tasks of mine are achieved through her If she did not exist, it would have been difficult to resolve the many problems of Dvarka, Hastinapur and these Pandavs Arjun, despite being a younger brother, is also my priya sakha As his wife, from today, you are my priya sakhi Hence my first gift to you is dear Maya "

I was grateful and said, "She has been with you for such a long time and is your helper in solving all your problems How will you carry on your work if you give her away to me? Who will look after your needs and take care of you?"

In a grave voice Govind said, "We shall see Your predicament is of greater significance at present than my problems Now you have to live with five husbands You will have to face new problems all the time In solving them, Maya will surely be of help to you That is why I am leaving her with you Otherwise, you will be in difficulty Troubled with the difficult responsibility of having five husbands, sometime or other you will want to become an ascetic and take to the forest At that time who will stand as a barrier in your path?" Govind's soft smile left much unsaid I forgot everything in that smile Standing beside Maya, I kept gazing at him I was grateful to Govind My helplessness was truly known only to him However much arrogance I might display outwardly, sakha Krishna could comprehend that I was cast into terrible danger because of five husbands Though Nitambini was dearest to me among the sakhis, she was not as intelligent as Maya That was why along with other gifts he had given Maya to me

But where would I go with so many gifts?

Sizing up the entire situation Father said, "As long as they wish, the five Pandavs and mother Kunti can live as guests in the Panchal kingdom Glory will redound to Panchal by playing host to them " Father would feel even happier if that happened

But how could I be pleased with this proposal? Where was my pride in this? In fact, my self-respect would suffer if that happened I would feel that I was seeking sanctuary in my father's kingdom For how long would it be tolerable to live as a dependent of my father and my brother? The kingdom which was mine till the day before, I would be a guest there now! Truly, how strange were the ways of society!

How long could one stay as a guest? The reputation of my husbands, too, would suffer After some time people would start looking down on them This was the way of the world It was now my task to see to it that not even the hint of a slur was cast on my husbands in my father's kingdom How could I tolerate it if it was otherwise? While living in my father's house, I had followed the daughter's dharma Now the time had come for following the wife's dharma My five husbands, having lost their kingdom, were poor and without a home But there had not been any doubt regarding their valour, their heroism and character Why should I not be proud of them?

Being wealthy may be a cause for prowess and fame, but acquiring wealth by unfair means cannot be termed manhood The Kauravas, having deprived the Pandavs of their kingdom by unfair means, were now ruling over vast Hastinapur But that did not mean that their prowess was greater than that of the Pandavs Now the Kauravs were being condemned all over Aryavart Bereft of wealth, the five Pandav brothers were the very souls of virtue That was why throughout Aryavart their praises were being sung Therefore, despite my not becoming a queen, there was no slur on my reputation Truly, I was proud of my five husbands

But it is one thing to be proud of one's husband's prowess and quite another to be happy with one's husband Keeping the husband happy is an even more complicated task

This was the problem before me After the marriage ceremonies were over my actual married life was about to begin It was easy to get married one by one to five husbands But how complicated it was to live a married life successfully with them! I did not know how in the past someone had accepted seven husbands or eleven husbands for the sake of dharma But at that time, in all of Aryavart, except me there was not a single woman married to more than one husband, let alone five husbands! Therefore, Aryavart waited with curiosity and amazement to watch the farce of my married life I wondered if my life would ultimately turn into such a farce At one time it was proper for me to accept the wish of everyone I had never imagined that I would be shouldering such a huge responsibility in life Then I had not thought that the desires, inclinations, hopes and personalities of five men would be so different from one another Now, considering the entire matter, I felt utterly helpless

Even if I devoted three hours of a night to one husband, that would mean one husband's night going fruitless Then how was I to divide the night or divide myself?

The first day of my married life began In the morning, having bathed and dressed as a new bride, I *pranam*ed mother Kunti Mother's blessing was, "Krishnaa, may God keep you happy! You have been able to fill my daughter's place Make your husbands happy with all your heart and soul Concentrating on their lotus feet, serve guests and visitors as if they were the Divine I am blessed in having so learned a person as you as my daughter-in-law"

Having taken Mother's blessings, I proceeded towards Yudhishthir's bedroom Krishna was there Mother had directed that I should prunam him Some unknown visitor was in Yudhishthir's bedroom Their conversation could be heard He was saying, "But Govind! What is the purpose behind your putting Devi Krishnaa into such a terrible predicament? In the abode of the Gods everyone is waiting with eager and curious eyes to observe the love, estrangement and conflict of Draupadi, the heroine of five men Why did you thrust her into such shame? For the Gods there is a custom of having many wives This has enhanced the fame of their prowess But have you given a thought to the shame and guilt suffered by a woman marrying many husbands? By this, womanhood is insulted Does the lord of Dvarka not know this?"

My feet turned to stone I was listening to the tale of my shame and insult Whoever the visitor might be I could not make up my mind to face him I turned back towards the restroom Benumbed, I sat down on the bed My reflection gleamed on the smooth marble of the walls I felt that I was breaking down under the onslaught of grief, shame and anxiety The very next moment within the new bride Krishnaa, Yajnaseni, born of the sacrificial flames, rose in revolt She stood up in revolt against the laws of the abode of the Gods, according to which one man might accept as many women as he wished, but if one woman married more than one husband she would be branded a sinner Who had laid down this law? It must be some male God! Otherwise how could there be such a distinction of virtue and sin between male and female?

All the rituals and rules that had been created in society built around the distinction between rich poor, high-low, brahmin-chandal, male-female and such others, the profound inequities that had been set up based upon considerations of virtue and sin against all of these a lifelong war would have to be waged

Actually, the acceptance of five husbands was a challenge to the entire race of women As though it were a golden opportunity for proving that even after marrying many men together, the pristine purity of a woman's character could remain unsullied

If a woman confined to the inner chambers, having no opportunity to see the face of a man other than her husband, was faithful, some possibility of her chastity being in doubt remained But even after having married many men if she could remain faithful to them then she could be called sati Perhaps that was why, despite having more than one husband, Tara and Mandodari were still satis who were saluted at every dawn Lakshman's wife Urmila led the life of a prisoner for 14 years in the inner apartments waiting for her husband Yet, Ayodhya city did not resound with shouts of praise hailing sati Urmila Devi Sita was abducted by Ravan and imprisoned in the Ashok forest She lived there in the midst of the demon king Ravan and many demons, facing many lewd advances from them Yet she spent her time single-mindedly waiting for her husband Therefore, she could become famous as a sati On the other hand, Urmila remained absent from public view

What heroism is there in a man clinging on to values in circumstances where he has no alternative but to cling to them? True heroism lies in remaining steadfast in ones values in adverse circumstances In this world of good and evil it is not possible to appreciate the goodness of virtue without sin Without sin how can the fame of virtue be established? If there is no adharma then how can dharma be established? Without darkness how shall we comprehend light? It was, after all, because of the wicked that God incarnated on this earth again and again I thought it was sin that had made virtue so noble It was because of the wicked that saints were considered great men This was the difference between my thoughts and those of an ordinary princess

When I saw or heard that in every king's royal apartments many queens, bedecking themselves, kept waiting for him, while, according to his whim, the king might or might not visit one queen's apartments, then I wondered how it would be if it were the other way about? One queen and a thousand kings! They would spend night after night waiting for her! He whom the queen loved best would be made the "Chief King" by her Hearing my views the sakhis used to laugh, "Princess! Keep these thoughts to yourself Do not open your mouth to anyone People will cry shame! Everyone will say, the princess is surely unchaste if not physically, at least in thought One woman accepting many men what an impossible situation you are imagining!"

I would get angry, "Chaste woman! Unchaste woman! In the same way why don't the scriptures speak of chaste men and unchaste men? Are men's hearts made of gold that sin cannot tarnish them? Have the scriptures prescribed lists of sins only for women?" ■

How about Madonna as President?

The latest passion of JFK Jr is George, a political glossy. But why him, and why this, wonders Rajlakshmi Bhattacharyya

The irony is delicious. The man who has spent his life escaping the media has actually joined forces with them. Though John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the 34-year-old son of the assassinated President, knows only too well the nightmares of being a celebrity, he will now be making celebrities out of others

In September, he launched George, a pop glossy on politics Always helping to sell millions of magazines for other people, John is currently trying to sell them on his own steam

He has earned epithets that varied from the hunk and the sexiest man alive to being America's most eligible bachelor But the dilettante at last seems serious of having found the vocation of his life

America's recollection of JFK Jr goes back to the time when he was born days after his father was elected President, in 1960. Just when he should have been celebrating his third birthday, the boy lost his father to an assassin's bullet Since then, Jacqueline strove fiercely to protect her children from the paparazzi's glare.

Junior was not exactly a bright student at school, but as he matured into manhood, showed great prowess at what the Kennedys were legendary for : chasing skirts.

He was a district attorney in New York for a while and twice failed the Bar exams prompting tabloid headlines to jeer, `Hunk flunks . But that was barring the six cases he prosecuted and won. After four years, Kennedy gave up, thoroughly bored, confiding to a colleague that he did not want "to be just another passenger on a liner"

Restlessness has been a dominant factor in JFK Jr's genes. Like his father he thinks boredom is the greatest sin and is always on the move roller blading, hiking, dancing, throwing footballs and frisbees.

As those hurly burly days of his life lacked purpose, his sister Caroline's took on a more decisive turn. She married, had children and became a legal scholar

But that was before his decision to bring out George with his old buddy Michael Berman in the wake of the 1992 presidential elections The magazine, feels Berman, is intended to be to politics what Rolling Stone is to popular music, Forbes is to business or Allure is to beauty It is going to talk about the people behind the scenes and would have snazzy graphics, quite unlike any political magazine of its time

The cover of the first issue is of supermodel Cindy Crawford dressed up as a seductive burlesque of George Washington after whom the magazine is christened

She appears again in a Revlon advertisement, and later, as fashion editor in conversation with designer Issac Mizrahi on political style.

There are conjectural stories on Madonna as president, Julia Roberts on how she was victimised by the press on a UN trip to Haiti and an Exit Poll which finds that Lamar Alexander prefers Oprah Winfry to Uma Thurman.

Politics may have been the staple of the Kennedy family, but neither JFK Jr nor Berman had any publishing experience before They admitted to attending a two-day seminar called, 'Starting Your own Magaz ine'

The media conglomerate Hachette Filipacchi would hardly have pumped in $20 million had it not been for the magic of the Kennedy name Nor would the advertisers have bought 175 pages in the first edition

But for once, at least, Kennedy has taken a risk, judging by the the number of political magazines floundering in the American market And the Americans, too, have never been more disillusioned with their politicians

Kennedy under pressure from Hachette has abandoned his earlier plans of a magazine for the high-minded few to one that would have a much wider circulation, catering to the committed college educated crowd (25-49 age group) including the untapped women readers

Should George fail to deliver, JFK Jr would be shorn of much of the enigma that seems to have been his birthright Right now, he is bounding with ideas "of ending up as president " of, if not the nation, but, "a very successful publishing venture", churning out pop-political magazines that look more like Mirabella and Elle-- youthful and exuberant Something like the man himself ■

Self Policing

■ Presentday hooliganism and the sense of insecurity that have spread in the city and its suburbs is actually the product of Bengal's 'para culture' ('Para Troopers', October 1).

This culture has, in fact, spawned another culture which can be referred to as the 'goon culture'. The proliferation of local clubs has increased inter- and intra-para conflicts; money is forced out of residents as chanda for every occasion and any refusal to comply will lead to injury to one's self or property or both.

Come any festival, microphones are installed playing film songs in full volume, often late into the night, regardless of the discomfort being caused to the entire neighbourhood. Examinations of the young and the inconvenience caused to the aged and sick have little consideration.

Para dadas idle away invaluable time striking coins on the carrom board or making catcalls at passing girls.

It is this culture which is adding to the woes of the citizens. If the activities of these clubs are controlled, then the people would be a more happy lot.

Dipak Kumar Agarwal, Howrah

■ I protest the wrong and motivated statement of a resident of Lake Gardens that people from the rail colony in the neighbourhood terrorise the area.

I have been living in Lake Gardens for 34 years and am associated with different social organisations of the area. Govindpur, Mollahati and Masjidpur areas have social clubs which are seriously dedicated towards eradicating illiteracy, curbing antisocial activities, organising blood donation camps and tree plantation drives.

Shovanlal Bakshi, Calcutta

■ Every part of Bengal has its own story about the cult of lawlessness perpetrated by the cadres of the ruling party: land-grabbing, eve-teasing, lynching have become the order of the day.

If vigilant groups have sprung up in every locality, it is a poor reflection of the people's faith in the law enforcing machinery. It is no use basking in a sense of glory which does not exist anymore.

As long as Marxist dadas continue their reign of terror and people die in police lockups, we should not talk about Bengal being a great state.

COVER STORY

Sarson Da SAGA

Khushwant Singh talks about his epic love for Pakistan, among other things, in his explosive autobiography, to be published shortly. Also about poetry, bottles and zip fasteners— no jokes!

I AM AMONGST THE FEW INDIANS FORTUNATE enough to have visited Pakistan many times. Only once did I sense hostility towards me. This happened to be soon after Partition when feelings against Indians, particularly Sikhs, ran very high.

I was passing through Karachi on my way to London. I had a few hours to spare and hired a taxi to see the sights of the city I had never visited before. I asked the driver to take me to Mr Jinnah's grave. As soon as I stepped out of the cab, a crowd began to collect. I heard someone shout, "What business have these people to come to Pakistan?" The taxi driver took me by my arm, put me in his cab and drove away.

Anti-Sikh feelings had spread throughout the Muslim world, where wildly exaggerated stories of Sikhs massacring Muslims were circulated. I sensed this at Cairo when I stepped out of my hotel to take a stroll. I heard people shout "Sikh" and realising that they did not mean to be friendly, retraced my steps to the hotel.

I never experienced this animosity against Sikhs in Pakistan again. On my subsequent visits, I was singled out for a special welcome. Tongawallas and cab drivers refused to take money from me, shopkeepers gave away things free, plied me with tea and cold drinks I recall my visit to Murree with Manzur Qadir, who was then Pakistan's Foreign Minister We happened to pass by a shop selling walking sticks. Manzur wanted one for himself, I thought I would take one as a memento After we had selected what we wanted, Manzur asked for their price. On being told, I remarked to Manzur in English that you could get them cheaper in Shimla Manzur translated my remark to the shopkeeper "Aap durust farmaatey hain (You must be right)," replied the shopkeeper "This one is a gift from me to our Sikh visitor, you pay me half for the other" I asked him if he knew who the person with me was "I do," he replied "I see his pictures in the papers He is our Foreign Minister He pays for what he buys, you don't pay for anything in Pakistan"

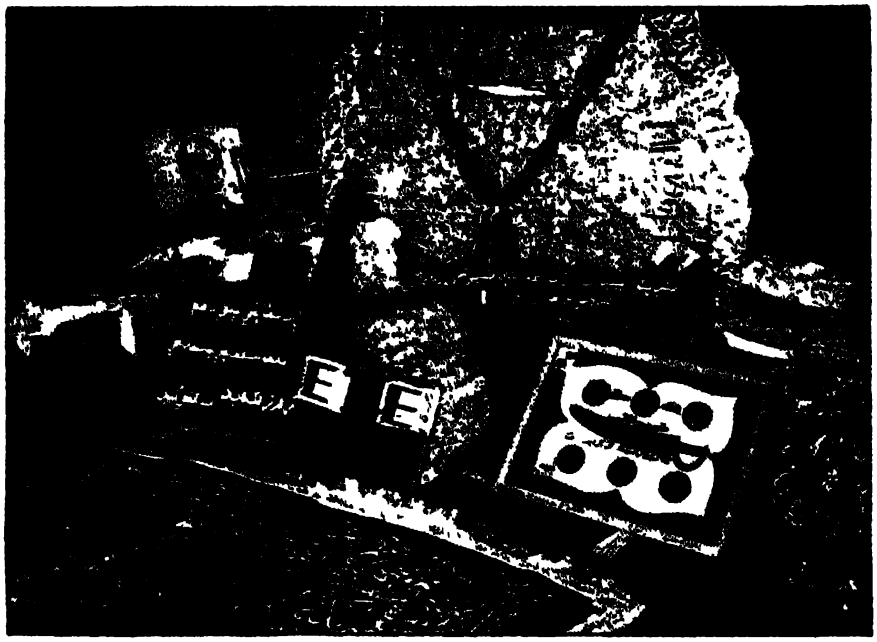
Besides the general goodwill Sikhs, whom they had once hated, educated Pakistanis also knew how often I had stuck my neck out in their support For Jinnah's birth centenary celebrations they invited two Indians to read papers in their seminar The other delegate failed to show up I was the sole Indian amongst a galaxy of European and American scholars on Indo-Pak affairs When my turn came to speak, I referred to my father's friendship for their Qaid and his being the Chief Guest at my wedding I went on to quote Jinnah's first speech as Governor-General of Pakistan in which he assured Hindu and Sikh minorities of equal treatment and exhorted them to regard Pakistan as their motherland He had never wanted the two-way migration of religious minorities I stated categorically that Indians accepted the right of Pakistan to be a sovereign, independent state, what we did not, nor ever would accept, was the two-nation theory of Muslims being a nation apart from Hindus and Sikhs. My speech was applauded But soon Pakistani delegates began to heckle me. "If you don't accept the two-nation theory, you don't accept Pakistan," they maintained I stood my ground, argued that we conceded Pakistan because the majority of the population of the regions concerned wanted to have independent states of their own and not because they were Muslims. If we accepted the two-nation theory, what were we to do with the 90 million Muslims who remained in India? I got a second round of applause from colle-

'You have been saying nice things about Pakistan, now tell us the truth. Do you really think Pakistan is going the right way and is doing as well as India?' they asked me. I told them 'Pakistan Standard Time is 30 minutes behind the Indian. You are 30 years behind us in development'

ge students in the audience They invited me to their campus to speak to a selected number of students on Indo-Pak affairs "You have been saying nice things about Pakistan, now tell us the truth Do you really think Pakistan is going the right way and is doing as well as India?" they asked me

I told them "Pakistan Standard Time is 30 minutes behind the Indian You are 30 years behind us in development I had seen a large number of fancy cars on the road, all imported from Japan, Germany, England or the United States — not one manufactured in Pakistan In India foreign automobiles were a rare sight "However, rat-khatua our cars may be, they are made in India," I said with rat-khatua pride Even match boxes and the lavatory paper in my hotel room came from China They were talking of having colour TV when they could not produce simple items like bicycles in their own country



"Why do you think this is so?" they asked

"You can either build new mosques or make motor cars," I replied "You can't do both at the same time" I told them of the dozens of modern mosques I had seen going up in every new quarter in Islamabad Of course, what I said was somewhat of an exaggeration, but they understood that I was doing so to drive my point home And they knew I was a friend

Once I happened to be in the Karachi International Hotel I had been out for a late dinner and wanted a little sleep before catching the morning flight to Bombay A tall, dark young man accosted me on my way to the elevator "A Sardarji from nowhere," he said jovially, grabbing my arm "Come and have a drink with me" I protested that I had already had enough and wanted to retire "You will have one with me before you go," he said as he dragged me into the bar. He was a powerful man There was no escape I ordered a Drambuie "You some kind of businessman? You from Iran or Afghanistan?" he asked I explained I was from Bombay and was the editor of a paper "In that case you have to have another," he insisted, and ordered a second Drambuie I didn't know how to escape from his clutches Every time I tried to get up he pulled me back on my chair "You may be an editor or something bigger," he said aggressively, "I write the names of the likes of you on my l___a (penis)" I couldn't resist asking him, "Do you write them with a ball point pen?" He didn't catch the pun Fortunately for me, his bladder was full and he had to go to the loo "Don't you run away when I am emptying my bladder," he warned me as he staggered out That is exactly what I did Instead of taking the elevator, I ran up the stairs to the security of my room

I have visited Pakistan almost every alternate year for the past several years One visit was to attend the wedding of my friend M A Rahman's son, and another to deliver the Manzur Qadir Memorial Lecture I wandered about freely and unescorted in the streets of Lahore I made it a point to pay homage at the graves of my departed friends, Manzur Qadir, his uncle Saleem and Mohammad Anwar My association was not restricted to the past every time I went I made new friends, was invited to new homes, they came to mine when in Delhi Amongst my latest acquaintances are the publisher-bookseller Najam Sethi and his moon-faced beauty of a wife who edits Friday, her cousin the poetess Hina Feisal Imam and her sister's husband Aijazuddin of the Hakeem family, three of whom were among Maharaja Ranjit Singh's closest advisers.

Many years later, I was invited to a media seminar in Islamabad on Indo-Pak relations Amongst the other invitees were Prem Bhatia, editor of The Tribune, and Kuldip Nayar Despite the tension prevailing between the two countries, the atmosphere in the seminar was most cordial I had no idea that I was being treated as the leader of the Indian delegation till at a lunch hosted by their Foreign Secretary Nawabzada Yakub Ali Khan, I found myself seated on his right After lunch he delivered a long and lucid oration analysing Indo-Pak tensions and proposed a toast (in plain water) for future good relations I was expected to respond I insisted that Prem Bhatia, being the seniormost amongst us, should reply I only had to raise my glass of water and wish Pakistan prosperity Bhatia made a short, dry speech

That evening there was a farewell banquet for us in the hotel where we were staying Our host was Pakistan's Minister for Information and Broadcasting The evening before I had seen him in a panel discussion on TV He was being heckled by three Maulvi looking types and a lady draped in a burqa with its flap thrown back to reveal her dour face They complained that Pakistani electronic media was not doing enough to inform the people of the beauties of Islam and the validity of the two-nation theory He was having a hard time convincing them that he was doing his best I came to the banquet well-oiled with Scotch At that time there was strict prohibition in Pakistan Once again, I found myself seated on the right of the host Bhatia told me, "Bacchoo (son) this time you have to make your own speech " A printed copy of the minister's speech was handed over to us I didn't have the foggiest notion of how to respond It ruined my appetite for food and soured the whiskey inside me When I stood up to speak, I referr-

Every time I tried to get up he pulled me back on my chair. 'You may be an editor or something bigger,' he said aggressively, 'I write the names of the likes of you on my l___a (penis).' I couldn't resist asking him, 'Do you write them with a ball point pen?' He didn't catch the pun

Jinnah: 'He had never wanted the two-way migration of religious minorities'

After passing through customs and immigration, I had to face Security. The man ran his metal detector over my turban and body. As he was taking it over my middle, there was a loud beep of protest. He paused.... He tried again. Again a loud beep. 'Janab, fauladi hai (Sir, it is made of steel),' I told him. It was my zip fastener which was made of steel, but he understood what I had alluded to ed to the minister being pilloried on TV the previous evening. I told the audience that, despite prohibition, I had my quota of Scotch and if they wanted to do anything about it they better do it fast because in a few hours I would be flying back to India. I said that before leaving Pakistan I would make an offering of an Urdu couplet to the minister, which might come in handy when he next faced the thekedars of Islam It ran

Mullah, gar asar hai dua mein
To masjid hila kay dikha
Gar nahin, to do ghoont pee
Aur masjid ko hilta deykh

(Mullah, if there is power in your prayer
Let me see you shake the mosque!
If not, take a couple of swigs of liquor
And see the mosque shake on its own)

The audience burst out in full-throated laughter My host was most amused and took down the couplet He then told me how fed up he was of the prevalent bigotry and religious fanaticism "You know, they objected to our showing the Chinese women's table-tennis team playing in T-shirts and very short shorts If they had their way, they would insist that our women's hockey team play in burqas '

I don't know how the Pakistani press reported my speech because I left Islamabad in the early hours of the morning for Lahore en route to Delhi I had my last laugh at the expense of the Pakistanis at Lahore airport After passing through customs and immigration, I had to face Security The man ran his metal detector over my turban and body As he was taking it over my middle, there was a loud beep of protest He paused What could I be hiding in the front of my middle? He tried again Again a loud beep "Janab, fauladi hai (Sir, it is made of steel)," I told him It was my zip fastener which was made of steel, but he understood what I had alluded to and ran round telling his fellow security officers what I had said They came beaming with smiles to shake my hand

In my entire life I have never encountered another people as reckless in their generosity as Punjabi Mussalmans The trait is not to be found in Punjabi Hindus or Sikhs, nor to the same extent in Pakistanis of the Frontier Provinces or Sindh It is unique to the people living between the Indus and the Sutlej, down to the confluence of the Punjab's five rivers They have other traits unique to them They are not a humble people and share much of the pride common to most Punjabis Being Muslim adds to their self-esteem Their logic is simple· Punjabis are the world's elite; Islam is the best of all religions Put the two together and you get the best people in the world When puritanical, they can be insufferably narrow-minded and fanatical. A call to jehad brings out all their macho, militant zeal to do or die Then it is best to keep out of their way I have a simple rule avoid making friends with a Punjabi Pakistani who prays five times a day, who fasts during Ramadan — and does not drink

Rahman used to be a healthy drinker after developing a heart problem he occasionally takes half a peg of whiskey to keep others company Our common friend, Ejaz Batalvi, has never been much of a drinker and will fondle his first glass of Scotch all evening Their attitudes towards religion are also different Rahman, though otherwise very liberal-minded, conforms to the spartan traditions of the Wahabis and has no use for Sufism and paying homage at the tombs of saints Batalvi, on the other hand believes that the true spirit of Islamic tolerance is best seen in the teachings of Sufi saints My last afternoon in Lahore was reserved by him to visit the dargahs of Hazrat Mian Meer, who is believed by most Sikhs to have laid the foundation stone of their Harimandir in Amritsar and the tombs of Madho Lal Husain in Baghbanpura near the Shalimar Gardens In the years when I lived in Lahore as a student and a lawyer, I had never visited these places

A strange, unearthly peace pervades the enormous courtyard round the modest-sized mausoleum of Mian Meer At the time I went there it was almost deserted A cluster of women and children sat bunched together on a corner of the platform.

Two beggars sitting a distance from each other were chanting something I could not catch Ejaz bought a leaf-bowl of rose petals to strew on the peer's tomb A couple of old men were at prayer Ejaz recited the Fatiha, came out and gave money to the beggars We drove through the bazaars of Baghbanpura and parked our car a good distance away from the mazaar of Madho Lal Husain The lanes were narrow, winding and smelly. Once again I noticed hardly any women wearing burqas. We arrived at the mazaar. A man with bells round his ankles and on his hands was dancing and singing A group of children followed him dancing in circles Their mothers watched them The mausoleum was not very impressive just two tombs side by side One was of the Muslim Husain, the other of the Hindu Madho Lal They were poets who formed a corporate personality, Madho Lal Husain Maharaja Ranjit Singh used to pay homage at their tombs every Basant Panchmi day, dressed in yellow silk accompanied by his bodyguard of Kashmir women, all likewise dressed in yellow silks To me more interesting than the mausoleum was the cemetery surrounding it Among the graves was one of the Punjabi poet Chiragh Deen, better known as Ustaad Daaman He had been put in jail by the Martial Law regime for reciting a poem

Pakistan deeyan maujaun ee maujaun
Chaarey paasey faujan ee faujan

(Pakistan is having a wonderful time Whichever way you look there is the Army)

On a visit to Delhi he recited another poem regretting the Partition of the country

Akhiyan dee laalee payle dasdee
Tusee vee roey ho, roey asee vee haan

(The redness in our eyes has no secret If you have cried, we too have wept)

Daaman died about 10 years ago and composed his own epitaph which is engraved on the marble headstone of his grave Ejaz copied it out for me on a piece of paper

Sarsaree nazar maaree jahaan andar
Zindgi varg utthalya main,
Daman koee na miliya rafeeq mainoo
Maar kafan dee bukkal tay challiya main

(I gave a cursory glance at the world,
I turned a few pages of the book of my life
I, Daaman, could find no companion
--so
I fling my shroud over my shoulder
And I go

MOST WANTED

When it comes to ruthless, cold-blooded terrorism, too, the female is more equal than the male, says Leyla Swan

In June this year a delicate, pretty, dark-haired woman returned to Ireland after a six-year tour of Europe

But Donna Maguire was far from an innocent traveller The 28-year-old's tour was spent in a string of prisons in Belgium, the Netherlands and finally, Germany, where she served out her sentence as a convicted terrorist

The German court ruled that the former convent girl was a member of an IRA squad which tried to blow up a British barrack in Germany in 1989 by planting a 330 lb Semtex bomb next to a dormitory block

It was not the first time the deceptively doll-like Maguire had been linked to terrorist activities She was a suspect in the shooting of a British Army officer at his home in Dortmund in 1989, the same year she was arrested in Ireland for importing sodium chlorate, a chemical used in bomb-making

Both charges failed to stick, but a year later she was extradited to the Netherlands to face charges of murdering two Australian tourists mistakenly shot by an IRA unit Again, she was acquitted and extradited, this time to Germany, where, finally, she was sentenced for the bombing of the Quebec barracks in north Germany

Women like Maguire, it seems, make the perfect terrorists because law enforcers, and the public in general, have not traditionally associated feminity with the ruthless tactics of violent political groups

Yet Interpol says that up to one-third of terrorists on its most wanted list are women, and according to the experts, the women terrorist is more deadly than the male because she feels she has more to prove

Indeed, Libya's Colonel Gadaffi once proclaimed. "When it comes to the frontline fighter, the female is the deadliest of the species "

Even Hollywood has got in on the act with films like Terminator, in which Linda Hamilton played the founder of a revolutionary movement fighting an oppressive mechanised regime, and The Handmaid's Tale, which saw Natasha Richardson join a band of freedom fighters

There is certainly a long, if hidden, history of the 'gentler sex' resorting to violence for political ends At the turn of the century, Rosa Luxemburg, a Polish-born Berlin Marxist called for international revolution as the only means of helping the working classes Many women joined the Spartacus League she founded in 1914, participating in a revolt in Berlin in which one woman was reported to have killed 20 soldiers

Three years later in the United Sta-

Nathalie Menigon takes aim tes, anarchist Emma Goldman was sentenced to two years in prison for leading opposition to military conscription J Edgar Hoover called her "the most dangerous woman in America", and on her release in 1919, she was deported to Russia

In 1909, Countess Constance de Markievicz, or the 'Rebel Countess', as she was called, donned the green uniform of the Irish Citizen Army to teach young men how to use guns and rifles in the cause of Irish independence from Britain

These women had a lineage that stretches into the final quarter of the 20th century when women have again stepped into the frontline of terrorism In the US, where President Bill Clinton has called for tougher laws to tackle the country's new breed of domestic terrorists, the right-wing Michigan Militia counts mothers and grandmothers among its ranks

In Europe, women are still active with offshoots of the infamous left-wing Baader-Meinhof group and its splinter, the Red Army faction Ulrike Meinhof, perhaps the most feared of all terrorists male or female, founded the group with Andreas Baader to wage a war against capitalism

Until her arrest in 1972, Meinhof was Germany's public enemy number one, creating a climate of fear and masterminding a bloody trail of kidnappings and murders of wealthy industrialists and politicians

When she was eventually caught, she was charged with five murders, 54 attempted murders, bombings, bank robberies and arson After four years in jail awaiting trial, Meinhof hanged herself with a towel in her cell

In the past, their activities have been explained in sexual terms, as a kind of erotomania which gives them a sense of sexual power. But this model discounts the strong political motivations of these women

Experts say that like Meinhof women terrorists are usually intelligent, well-educated and middleclass In the past, their activities have been explained in sexual terms, as a kind of erotomania which gives them a sense of sexual power But this model discounts the strong political motivations of these women

Psychologist Lothar Van Balluseck made a study of women in the frontline of terrorism and suggests that they may be driven by guilt about their social advantages That guilt in turn fed by anger towards their privileged fathers who come to represent the authority which they loathe, he says

There was certainly no shortage of others to take over where Meinhof left off Suzanne Albrecht, a charming, fun-loving blonde who moved freely

TERMINATOR, TOO

If men can do it, so can women. Kathryn Bigelow's film, Strange Days, puts the spotlight on violent thrillers that are no longer a male preserve

No London Film Festival within recent memory has opened with as controversial a choice as Kathryn Bigelow's Strange Days — a violent $40 million futuristic thriller that mixes an innate pessimism with a pyrotechnical display of flash cinematic technique.

That it was made by a woman would be extraordinary if it was not for the fact that Bigelow had already proved with Blue Steel, a tough policier, and Point Break, a successful action thriller, that genres generally considered a male preserve can be confidently handled by a female director.

Scripted and produced by James Cameron, Bigelow's ex-husband, who directed True Lies and the Terminator films, Strange Days is set in chaotic Los Angeles, full of poverty-stricken human detritus and criminal power-brokers, on the eve of the next millennium.

Moving through this neon-lit nightmare is Lenny (Ralph Fiennes), an ex-cop who makes an illicit living selling chips of other people's lives on a digital recording.

They call this version of virtual reality "the wire" and it captures the physical and emotional purity of human experience — sight, sound, taste, smell and touch.

It has become the drug of choice and Lenny is dubbed the 'Santa Claus of the subconscious', who knows what people want and gives it to them. What they want is generally sex. The only clips that he refuses to sell are 'blackjacks' or death clips. But when a former accomplice is raped and murdered, Lenny gets a clip of the crime and is forced to relive it.

He is worried that his former girlfriend (Juliette Lewis) will be next and turns to a security agent, Mace (Angela Bassett), and another ex-cop Max (Tom Sizemore) for help.

The problem for the film, which has so far failed to ignite American audiences, is the old one of painting a dark vision of a violent future which is exciting enough to thrill without glorifying the sex 'n' violence. And it is not one which Bigelow comfortably solves.

The vaguely upbeat ending seems tacked on, the film is too long, and — because Bigelow is so good a technician — the violence and degradation is made to seem almost glamorous.

In the end, no matter what the moral, the film gives off an odour of smart, savvy commercialism.

This is, perhaps, summed up best by Max's shallow cynicism — "You know how I know it's the end of the world, Lenny? Everything's already been done. Every kinda music, every government, every hairstyle. How we gonna make it for another thousand years, for Chris'sake?"

Not by inventing a new hairstyle, at any rate.

Nathalie Menigon and Joelle Aubron were arrested after a shootout with the police in 1980, only to be released to kill again in European high society, murdered her own godfather, banker Jurgen Ponto. Albrecht worked with another German woman, Astrid Proll, in the daring rescue of Andreas Baader from the Berlin prison library in 1970

Proll was eventually caught and charged with attempting to murder two policeman in the gun battle that ensued After three years in jail she was released on bail so she could receive medical treatment for a serious blood disorder She reported to police daily for only 14 days, then in February 1974, she vanished

For the next few years she lived in Britain, masquerading as Anna Puttick, a teacher in car mechanics at the North London Vehicle Repair Workshop for unemployed school leavers

When 12 detectives stormed the workshop and grabbed Anna, still in her oil-stained overall, her colleagues were incredulous to learn they had been harbouring a terrorist

"Anna seemed to know nothing about violence," said fellow instructor John Morris "She was a gentle sort of person I liked her for the way she thought things out"

Appearances can be deceiving In the Eighties, Nathalie Menigon and Joelle Aubron were behind more than 70 terrorist attacks in the name of Action Directe, the French left wing group that Menigon founded in 1979

In 1980, a year after machine-gunning the headquarters of the French Employers' Trade Association, Nathalie was captured in the chic 16th arrondissement of Paris Typically Menigon, described as "the wild beast of terrorism", refused to surrender

Baader-Meinhof member Astrid Proll

She pulled out two revolvers, emptying them at police and screamed, "I am Action Directe"

She was released in 1981 under an amnesty from the newly-elected socialist President Francois Mitterrand It proved an ill-judged decision In 1986, Menigon was on the run again after she and Aubron allegedly murdered George Besse, the chairman of Renault

Eyewitnesses said they saw two women, one of whom was identified as Menigon, waiting outside M Besse's Montparnasse home When his chauffeur dropped him off, the women fired at him three times, once in the eye as he lay on the ground.

"Is that it?" one of the women was reported to have asked calmly

"I'm sure of it," the other replied, before they escaped on foot

Experts says that this apparent ruthlessness is common to all terrorists, whether male or female, and stems from a denial that their victims are individuals

The likes of Ulrike Meinhof, Nathalie Menigon and Donna Maguire see their targets, not as human beings, but as representatives of a system

Tragically, in doing so, they become less than human themselves

HUMOUR

LOO AND BEHOLD!

Champak Chatterji talks about the one bleak spot in a trekker's morning*

It had been a grinding day's trek from Lhandruk and my family and I were at Deorali, 9,000' up on a ridge in the Nepal Himalayas I had asked for the general direction of the toilet, expecting the tea-house owner, our host for the night, to gesture vaguely at the hillside Instead, with the panache of the maitre d'hotel at the Waldorf-Astoria, he handed over a set of keys!

A regular water closet with a lock on the door and I was recovering from the shock of this stupendous discovery in the middle of nowhere, when he stepped up to the wall, took down and handed me horse-whip as well!

I soon found out why It was not as I had feared the ultimate mountain remedy in lieu of roughage in the diet The way to the loo lay through the stables and the whip had to be liberally used to clear the way I don't think the mules liked the idea of being disturbed at dusk Their day, too, had been a hard one, but there was necessity on my side and I flayed away

The mules careered around dashing up and down the hillside, their neck-bells jingling like mad, while we went through Afterwards we christened it the Deorali Vaudeville — Dhaulagiri on the horizon all flame and turquoise at sunset, the music of mule-bells and me the conductor with the horse-whip clearing the north-west passage to the W C

The night before at Lhandruk, we had celebrated my son's birthday We had dined on Tibetan bread and soup by candlelight in the open with Annapoorna looming frosty and enormous in the light of the stars Then early morning, while it was pitch dark, it had been the loo Down the narrowest of mountain goat-tracks with stinging nettles on the sides, an open wigwam like structure and a hole in the ground

Midway through the ritual a great black shape had wandered in and my heart had stopped. Then the 'thing' had mooed companionably and I had been assured that this was not to be the man-eating leopard of Rudraprayag — the next generation

On the mountain path, it is the loo which is the turning point The place where the great outdoors take over after the preliminaries of log fires, moody songs and romantic shilly-shallying I remember the first occasion well For our honeymoon my wife and I had taken off for Yamunotri in the Garhwal Himalayas

Twenty-five years ago the buses stopped at Barkot, but with luck one could get a jeep lift to Saina Chatti from where the long walk began to the 11,000' high shrine

Saina was our first night in the high Himalayas Nightfall and a beautitudinal silence enveloped us There was the black of the mountains and the forests and the canopy of stars overhead Sheer magic till after dinner my wife, city-born and -bred, had popped the question "Where is the loo?" I had then taken her gently by the hand and walked to where the lantern lights of the tavern had disappeared

Finally, there was nothing but the stars, the hills and the dark for company and I whispered, "There, there, everywhere"

I think we began our marriage well — better than those who opiate in five-star hotels Bath tub and marble tile sybarites

Conversations about the loo bring people together on the trek quicker than anything else Corns on the feet, bedbugs and pishoo (blessed ticks that give you a six-month itch), smelly linen, bumps and bruises are passe There is a regular rating system that does the rounds — from three star stuff where you perch on perilous bamboo scaffoldings teetering on hillsides to the five-star luxuries where you are on more secure territory complete with a gunny bag curtain in front!

Sometimes as an added bonus, the five-star ones throw in a 'hot shower' to boot Here you stand in a tiny kiosk under a bowl with holes in it You pour in hot water from a kettle onto the overhead bowl with one hand scrubbing yourself desperately with the other!

There is adventure, too I remember the shy young Bengali bride who burst into our room in the remote mountain hamlet of Dhampus It had rained heavily a few minutes before and we were almost submerged by the leaks from the roof, but this was no time to stand on formalities She seemed to be in the deepest throes of emotion The rather impressionistic loo of the teahouse where we were staying was not only Stygian dark, but also sloped at an impossible angle so that inside one had to belay oneself mountaineer fashion with a stick Romantic soul that she was, she had sought out the great outdoors instead

There alone with the winds of heaven, she had suddenly sensed an upheaval in the elements Focusing her torch beam on the ground, she found that an entire hillside was on the move! An army of leeches was heading towards her, suckers, waving frenetically The retreat from nature had been quick and precipitate!

In 1991, I accompanied an expedition which was trying to climb the North Face of Mt Everest The way lay through Tibet Immense ochre valleys, mountains of the moon, skies of lapis lazuli Intermediate base was at Xegar which at 13,000' on the Lhasa Highway was the gateway to Chomolungma -- as Everest is known in Tibet

The place was spectacular with its soaring hilltop monastery albeit ruined, turbulent Chu (river) and shops selling Dalai Lama stickers and Indian shikakai There was also, wonder of wonders, a small patch of juniper forest The truck-stop hotel where we stayed had a regular dining area and in the rooms there were beds and the management provided hot water in enormous Chinese flasks I thought of Shangrila and, like all bureaucrats, in a happy mood even dictated a letter

They say that mountains can never be taken for granted and hit back when least expected This time it was through the hotel loo Having trekked around from the time I was only 10, I thought I was a true battle scarred veteran, but that loo returned me to amateur status I can do no better than quote from Michael Buckley and Robert Strauss writing about the experience

"The trek to the toilet is an arduous one and you'd best come equipped for the ordeal First, try and not look at the floor Some of these toilets look like they've been backed up since the first century A nose peg and a set of horse halters would be a good idea A swig of whisky before the assault is recommended and some are known to put a dab of Tiger Balm or Chanel No 5 on the upper lip to minimise the overpowering smells"

High altitude sickness hits you at Xegar and in combination with the loo the totality is not something for the squeamish or faint-hearted

Then came Rongbuk Base Camp at the foot of Mt Everest and 17,000' high and everything changed It was a world of grey moraine detritus and boulders and ice-melt, where we pitched our tents Above the sky was blue silk Dominating this world was the great massif of the world's highest mountain, so overpowering that one was tempted to go down on one's knees and pray to the mountain as the monks of the nearby monastery had done for hundreds of years

I was there only for a day At night, I slept by the cairn that honours the immortal memory of Mallory and Irvine Up the next morning in the predawn darkness and ready to go down to the plains, there was, of course, the loo All was quiet at that early hour Alone, I thought of the prowling mountain wolf and the Yeti I was in their domain Then dawn broke over the mountains There was the pearl of the snows and the fang of Everest Nearer, and only a few feet away, I saw a fantastic ballet yellow beaked choughs bracing, balancing themselves against the wind The lowly loo had given me a sight of eternity ■

All is not Lost

I was still a thief when I met Arun, and though I was only fifteen, I was an experienced and fairly successful hand

Arun was watching wrestlers when I approached him He was about 20, a tall, lean fellow, and he looked kind and simple enough for my purpose I hadn't had much luck of late, and thought I might be able to get into this young person's confidence He seemed quite fascinated by the wrestling Two well-oiled men slid about in the soft mud, grunting and slapping their thighs When I got Arun into conversation, he did not seem to realise I was a stranger

"You look li' e a wrestler yourself," I said

"So do you," he replied, which put me out of my stride for a moment, because at the time I was rather thin and bony and not very impressive physically

"Yes," I said "I wrestle sometimes "

"What's your name?"

"Deepak," I lied

Deepak was about my fifth name I had earlier called myself Ranbir, Sudhir, Trilok and Surinder

After this preliminary exchange, Arun confined himself to comments on the match, and I didn't have much to say After a while, he walked away from the crowd of spectators I followed him

"Hello," he said. "Enjoying yourself?"

I gave him a most appealing smile "I want to work for you," I said

He did not stop walking. "And what makes you think I want some one to work for me?"

"Well," I said, "I've been wondering about all day, looking for the best person to work for When I saw you, I knew that no one else had a chance "

"You flatter me," he said

"That's all right '

"But you can't work for me "

"Why not?"

"Because I can't pay you "

I thought that over for a minute Perhaps, I had misjudged my man

"Can you feed me?" I asked

"Can you cook?" he countered

"I can cook," I lied

"If you can cook," he said, "I'll feed you "

He took me to his room and told me I could sleep in the verandah But I was nearly back on the street that night The meal I cooked must have been pretty awful, because Arun gave it to the neighbour's cat and told me to be off But I just hung around smiling in my most appealing way, and then he couldn't help laughing

He sat down on the bed and laughed for a full five minutes, and later patted me on the head and said, never mind, he'd teach me to cook in the morning

Not only did he teach me to cook, but he taught me to write my name and his, and said he would soon teach me to write whole sentences, and add money on paper when you didn't have any in your pocket!

It was quite pleasant working for Arun I made the tea in the morning and later went out shopping I would take my time buying the day's supplies and made a profit of about 25 paise a day I would tell Arun that rice was 56 paise a pound (it generally was), but I would get it at 50 paise a pound I think he knew I made a little this way, but he didn't mind, he wasn't giving me a regular wage

I was really grateful to Arun for teaching me to write I knew that once I could write like an educated man there would be no limit to what I could achieve It might even be an incentive to be honest

Arun made money by fits and starts He would be borrowing one week, lending the next. He would keep worrying about his next cheque but, as soon as it arrived, he would go out and celebrate lavishly

One evening he came home with a wad of notes, and at night I saw him tuck the bundles under his mattress, at the head of the bed

I had been working for Arun for nearly a fortnight and, apart from the shopping, hadn't done much to exploit him I had every opportunity for doing so I had a key to the front door, which meant I had access to the room whenever Arun was out He was the most trusting person I had ever met And that was why I couldn't make up my mind to rob him

A rich man or a greedy man or a careful man wouldn't keep his money under a pillow or mattress, he'd lock it up in a safe place Arun had put his money where it would be child's play for me to remove it without his knowledge

It's time I did some real work, I told myself, I'm getting out of practice If I don't take the money he'll only waste it on his friends He doesn't even pay me

Arun was asleep Moonlight came in from the verandah and fell across the bed I sat up on the floor, my blanket wrapped around me, considering the situation There was quite a lot of money in that wad, and if I took it, I would have to leave town — I might make the 10 30 express to Amritsar

Slipping out of the blanket, I crept on all fours through the door and upto the bed, and peeped at Arun.

My hand took on an identity of its own and slid around under the mattress, the fingers searching for the notes They found them, and I drew them out without a crackle

Arun sighed in his sleep and turned on his side, towards me. My free hand was resting on the bed, and his hair touched my fingers.

I was frightened when his hair touched my fingers, and crawled quickly and quietly out of the room.

When I was in the street, I began to run I ran down the bazaar road to the station The shops were all closed, but a few lights came from the upper windows I had the note at my waist, held there by the string of my pyjamas I felt I had to stop and count the notes tl ough I knew it might make me late for the train It was already 10 20 by the clock tower I slowed down to a walk, and my fingers flicked through the notes There were about a hundred rupees in fives A good haul I could live like a prince for a month or two

When I reached the station I did not stop at the ticket-office (I had never bought a ticket in my life) but dashed straight on to the platform It was moving slowly enough for me to be able to jump on the footboard of one of the carriages, but I hesitated for some urgent, unexplainable reason

I hesitated long enough for the train to leave without me

When it had gone, and the noise and busy confusion of the station had subsided, I found myself standing alone on the deserted platform The knowledge that I had a hundred stolen rupees in my pyjamas only increased my feeling of isolation and loneliness

Leaving the station, I walked slowly through the bazaar keeping to dark deserted alleys I kept thinking of Arun He would still be asleep, blissfully unaware of his loss

I have made a study of men's faces when they have lost something of material value The greedy man shows panic, the rich man shows anger, the poor man shows fear, but I knew that neither panic nor anger nor fear would show on Arun's face, when he discovered the theft, only a terrible sadness not for the loss of the money but for my having betrayed his trust

I found myself on the maidan and sat down on a bench with my feet tucked up under my haunches The night was a little cold, and I regretted not having brought Arun's blanket along A light drizzle added to my discomfort Soon it was raining heavily. My shirt and pyjamas stuck to my skin and the cold wind brought the rain whipping across my face

I walked back to the bazaar and sat down on the step of a closed shop A few vagrants lay beside me, rolled up tight in thin blankets The clock showed midnight, I felt for the notes, they were still with me, but had lost their crispness and were damp with rainwater

Arun's money In the morning he would probably have given a rupee to go to the pictures but now I had it all No more cooking his meals, running to the bazaar, or learning to write whole sentences Whole sentences

They were something I had forgotten in the excitement of a hundred rupees Whole sentences I knew, could one day bring me more than a hundred rupees It was a simple matter to steal (and sometimes just as simple to be caught) but to be a really big man, a wise and successful man, that was something I should go back to Arun, I told myself, if only to learn how to write

Perhaps, it was also concern for Arun that drew me back, a sense of sympathy is one of my weaknesses, and through hesitation over a theft, I had often been caught A successful thief must be pitiless I was fond of Arun My affection for him, my sense of sympathy, but most of all my desire to write whole sentences, drew me to the room

I hurried back to the room extremely nervous, for it is easier to steal something than to return it undetected If I was caught beside the bed now, with the money in my hand, or with my hand under the mattress there could be only one explanation that I was actually stealing If Arun woke up, I could be lost

I opened the door clumsily, then stood in the doorway in clouded moonlight Gradually, my eyes became accustomed to the darkness of the room Arun was still asleep I went on all fours again and crept noiselessly to the head of the bed My hand came up with the notes I felt his breath on my fingers I was fascinated by his tranquil features and easy breathing and remained motionless for a minute Then my hand explored the mattress, found the edge, slipped under it with the notes

I awoke late next morning to find that Arun had already made the tea I found it difficult to face him in the harsh light of day His hand was stretched out towards me There was a five-rupee note between his fingers My heart sank

"I made some money yesterday," he said "Now you'll get paid regularly " My spirit rose as rapidly as they had fallen I congratulated myself on having returned the money.

But when I took the note, I realised that he knew everything The note was still wet from last night's rain

"Today, I'll teach you to write a little more than your name," he said

He knew; but neither his lips nor his eyes said anything about their knowing.

I smiled at Arun in my most appealing way, and the smile came by itself, without my knowing it (Sanctuary Features)

GILLIAN WRIGHT'S COLUMN

One for the Booker

Publishers, like farmers, never admit to doing well And never have they sounded more depressed than they do now That too at the time of the Booker Prize the premier event of the year

Over the summer, six judges writers and critics should have read 141 new novels to find out which are the best The criterion for choosing the shortlist is to judge each book against the other

Very clear, i'm sure you'll agree And given that, the miracle is not that each judge manages to plough through all 141 novels, as judges admit they don't, but that they do not brain each other over the final decision In practice, judges often have to relinquish their favourite novel, if no other judge will support it

But whatever the pitfalls of selection. publishers like the Booker Prize If their author is shortlisted he or she immediately leaps to prominence and the book leaps off the bookshelves into the plastic bags of the purchaser A winner is guaranteed longer sales which increase by at least 40 per cent than that without the Booker label This is so even when the book is so dense as to be for many unreadable.

The many include one of this year's judges, the critic Chris Riddel "Unreadable" was the adjective Riddell used to describe Keri Hulme's Maori novel and Booker Prize winner The Bone People It is one that I would use of Ben Okri's The Famished Road, the 1992 winner, which defeated me by page 169 I am more hopeful of the choice this year because Chris Riddell's comment that it is commonplace at the moment for critics to dismiss or undervalue narrative skill Narrative, to my mind, is a great asset in a novel

To the publisher, though, what matters in a book has to be commercial potential What has them atremor now is the collapse of the Net Book Ageement which guaranteed that their books would be sold in bookshops at the published cover price

The sudden collapse of the agreement, due to overnight changes in the views of the some publishers and booksellers, means that books can be sold at a discount

Now, it would be logical to keep up the prices of guaranteed bestsellers and discount books more difficult to move, like first novels But as often happens in this world, the opposite of the sensible prevails The bestsellers alone have their prices slashed to earn the quickest possible buck

The publishers thought they could control which books the bookshops sold cheaply Again, the opposite has happened The retailers have the publishers by the throat They decide what prices are slashed and the most the publishers can do is to refuse them an extra discount

The publishers thought they could control which books the bookshops sold cheaply. Again, the opposite has happened. The retailers have the publishers by the throat. They decide what prices are slashed and the most the publishers can do is to refuse them an extra discount

The result is free-for-all In Scotland last week, I asked a bookshop manager if he was going to discount Mark Tully's Heart Of India, which I was helping to publicise "I'll wait to see what James Thin does first," he replied, referring to his main competitor

But why should the public worry if the books they buy are cheaper? For one thing, diminishing profits may well limit the range of books published Then, when discounts become greater to retailers who order in bulk, the smaller bookshops a great national institution may not be able to survive

The nightmare is of bookshops and publishers going out of business, and of a narrow range of cheap bestsellers filling the shelves of the massive out-of-town supermarkets which with deregulation are now moving into bookselling About a third of British retailing as a whole has already moved from high streets to these monstrous superstores

This would be a disaster as British, bookshops have never been more exciting places I'm not just referring to the books on display, but to the events organised up and down the land Author's come regularly, not just to sign books, but to talk about their work and listen to what their audience has to say about them

In the current tour for Heart Of India, I've been impressed by the amount of interest and depth of perception about India While enjoying Mark's talk, , I've been sorry to miss some of the other performers on the circuit There are novelists, poets and actors, even American actors

Following Mark in Edinburgh was a man with a cult following, whose career was made, and I suspect blighted, by the part he played in the TV sci-fi series Star Trek His latest book I am Spock seems to show that he has finaliy given up the unequal struggle to distinguish himself from his image But I don't think his publishers will mind that

GROWING DAILY

No scalpel and implants. Hollywood doctor Wanita Holmes just looks deep into her patients' eyes to make them grow bustier. Frank Durham on this exciting new form of hypnotherapy

Flat-chested Hollywood girls are flocking to a doctor with compelling, hypnotic eyes who teaches them to think big

Dr Wanita Holmes looks deep into patients' eyes, puts them into a trance and talks them into growing the bumper-sized boobs of their dreams "Because of the glamour attitude of this town, breasts are men's Number One attraction If you don't have them, they don't look at you," she says

And not to be looked at in Tinsel Town is professional death for an ambitious girl So women afraid of the surgeon's knife and breast implants, happily settle for 'development sessions' on the 66-year-old Dr Holmes' comfortable couch

For less than the cost of a breast enhancement operation, hypnotherapist Dr Holmes adds vital inches to their statistics After the doctor's entrancing treatment, one 32-year-old patient raced straight out to the sexy boutique, Victoria's Secret, to joyfully buy the first bra of her life

Kristen Addix said, "My breasts went from nothing to 34B At first, people accused me of wearing a padded bra because they had never before seen me with cleavage

"My fiance, Peter, said, 'Get back to that doctor straightaway for some more sessions!'"

White-haired Dr Holmes said at her discreet Beverley Hills office, "I use the power of mind over body I release that power to enhance women's breasts I hypnotise a client and suggest that she lets all the nutrition and hormones in her blood stream flood into the tissue of her breasts.

Dr Wanita Holmes measures the results of her therapy

"So far, I have had a 50 per cent success rate."

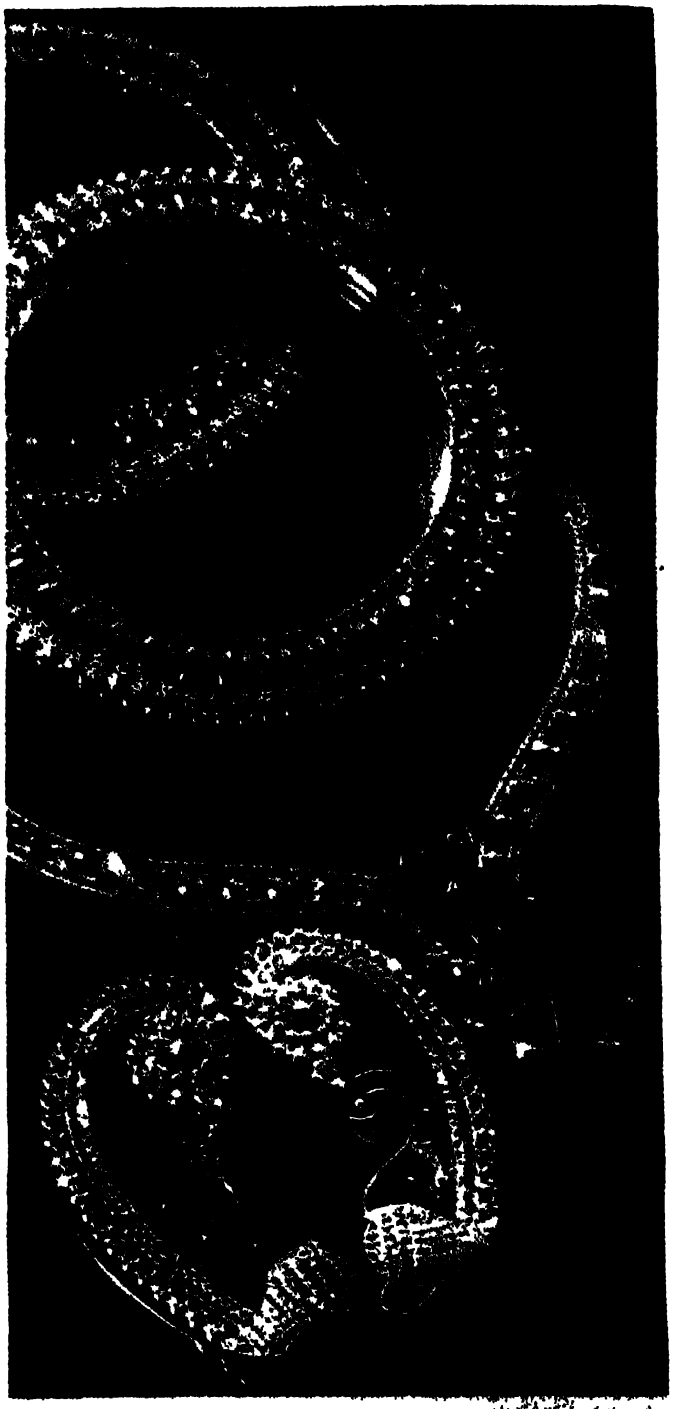
Dr Holmes believes young girls stop their breasts from developing by using the power of their minds, because they are afraid of growing up. "Some small breasted women were sexually abused or were victims of incest when they were small. So the girl child doesn't want to grow breasts because she feels it only makes her more attractive to men.

"Other girls have butch lesbian older sisters, whom they look up to. They feel that if they develop into beautiful women, they will be frowned upon by their sisters. Then there are the 'Daddy's Little Girls'. Father wanted a John, but he got a Jane. So she becomes his buddy and they go fishing and play sport together. This makes the girl very happy. When her breasts start to develop, she tells them, 'Go away! Go away! I don't want you!' She is afraid her father will pull away from her if she becomes more female and womanly. And he will. So this girl's mind actually stops her breasts from growing."

The doctor went on, "I try to unblock the obstacle in these women's minds by telling them that their busts can develop and they should allow themselves to grow as a woman.

"I say they can have wonderful breasts and that they should be proud of their sensuality, not ashamed.

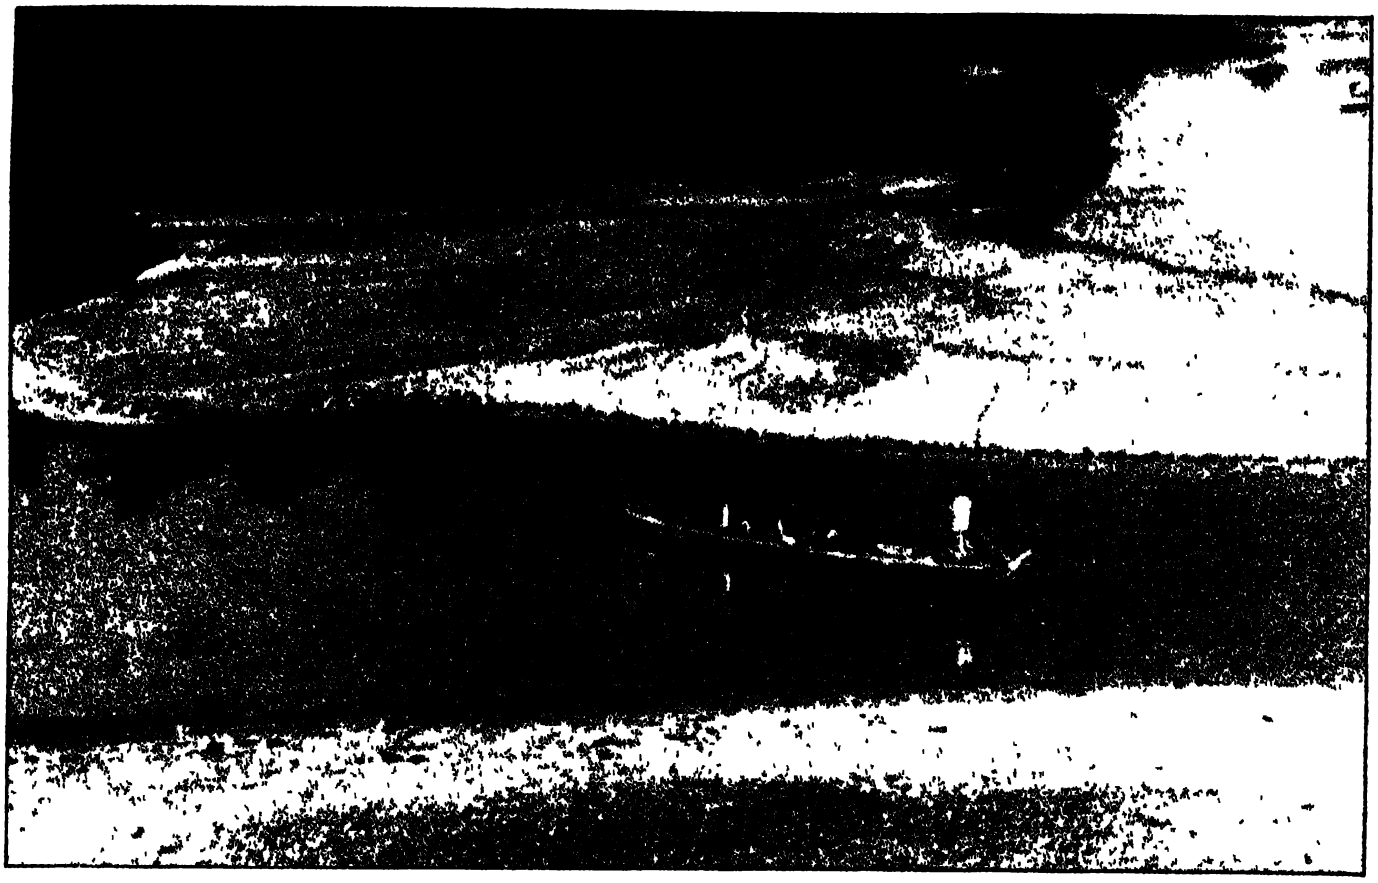
"When they are hypnotised, I create a magic mirror in their minds, where they can see their body as they want it to be. Then I ask them to feel it."



Says Kristen. "I grew up hanging around guys and fixing cars and motorcycles. I didn't want to lose them as friends, so I grew into a Peter Pan type with a boyish figure. When my breasts developed after hypnotherapy, it changed my life amazingly. I first noticed them when I went to the gym for a workout. When I was on the treadmill, I looked in the mirror and asked myself, 'What is that bouncing under my T-shirt? Oh, my God! I'll have to get a bra. I can't believe this.' Once I could not fit into the smallest size bra. In the store I looked like a boy trying to get into drag. Now I can wear really feminine tanktops. I have to get used to men staring at my breasts instead of my face when they're talking to me."

How much does it cost to look deep into Dr Holmes' eyes and get a brand new set of boobs?

She said, "I charge $180 for the first session and $80 for every one after that. Patients need at least six sessions."



For the Hollywood doctor, boobs are a developing business.

The Lantern is Feeling Unwell Today

The lantern is feeling unwell today,
It won't smile

The whole of last night
it sat by me,
prayed for my recovery,
today how can it be so detached, uncaring?

The chimney is engulfed from within with the smoke of fuel

The lantern is feeling unwell,
It won't emit light,
not to speak of bedecking itself

It will lie down without any fuss,
even a wink of sleep is far away,

My evening will be spent in the melancholic company of darkness

It will be tiring, very tiring, till the dawn will come
and come with a smile
And then all on a sudden,
I will discover a blaze of light

On the lap of the eastern sky

The Gourd Blossom

A rain drenched flute kept playing

One by one dreams kept falling like leaves

I am a small sailboat
the note of the flute makes me reach out to the banks
like a river
I would rather not spend this night alone
I am the lone first blossom
of the Flame of the Forest
With the spiralling smoke a glow worm came from the rain and said

Do you hear the drenched note of the flute
I had gone looking for that unknown player but the wind brought me here

You're not telling anyone that I've come the wind will keep it a secret
if the sky knows he will tell the stars

I'll spend this night with you
On my body the colour of the gourd-blossom
Put off the lamp

HEADTURNER!

As Dunedin's first Indian (and woman) mayor, the Ludhiana-born Sukhinder Turner dreams of putting Dunedin on the right course

A little over two decades ago, when Sukhinder Turner (nee Gill) first set foot in Dunedin, locals greeted her somewhat patronisingly. "Hellloo, hoow are youu?" Unsure just how proficient the delicate Sardarni was in English.

Today, Sukhi has become Dunedin's first-ever mayoress. Also, the first Indian to be elected to that office anywhere in New Zealand. And, as she drives around in the mayoral Mercedes, the proverbial last word has clearly been her's. By a long chalk, too.

Indeed, the past six weeks have dramatically re-cast the Ludhiana-born Sukhi's lifestyle. And all this while hubby Glenn has been touring India, often paying more attention to the wrestling tournaments than the Indian tourists.

Now, more so than ever, Sukhi is the Ludhiana wife of one of New Zealand's greatest sportsmen. Rather, she has an identity all her own and is determined not to be remembered as "just another mayor". The commitment to excellence delightfully rubs deep in the Turner household.

October 14 was when Sukhi scripted history, unseating Liberal Party Dicky Walls. Days later, she was her husband, on November 6, hosted a luncheon in Queen Elizabeth's honour.

And just how she planned what Her Royal Highness on meeting a lady mayor, The Telegraph Magazine queried. Sukhi's answer was, as usual, punctuated with laughter. "Am not sure... I suppose she's met a clutch of women in that post.

"But, yes, the Queen was very curious. Like when did I first meet Glenn (in Bombay, on New Zealand's 1969-70 India tour) and what encouraged me to take to politics. ."

Well, were her answers suitably blue-blooded? This time, Sukhi's laughter was more pronounced. "I explained I wanted to make the world a better place, that I wished Dunedin would go on the right course. Also, that I could now devote time (to politics) as our children had grown up."

Sukhi, by the way, expects Natasha (18) and Shaan (15) to now play a prominent role at home. Specially, with Glenn busy managing the New Zealand side. "I haven't had office hours before (8:30 am to 5:00 pm) and so, obviously, the children have to lend a much bigger helping hand."

Lokendra Pratap Sahi

And while Sukhi's parents are Chandigarh-based (her father is a retired Squadron Leader), the siblings are all in New Zealand. In fact, both brothers, Jagmohan and Sukhmohan, are in Dunedin itself, while younger sister Shaanti has settled in neighbouring Queenstown. And all are in the restaurant business. Even if she wanted to, Sukhi cannot feel homesick.

Sukhmohan has opened 'Little India' while Jagmohan has left for the US to set up a cafe-bar 'Crossroads'. As for Shaanti, she has introduced Queenstown to, yes you have guessed it, 'Little India'.

Incidentally, Sukhi ('Curry Queen' for many) is herself a fabulous cook and has, in the past, been a popular teacher of Indian cuisine. No wonder a Turner invitation is always lapped up.

Though quite tied down by the demands of her office, Sukhi is hoping to take some time off during the February-March World Cup. "With a bit of luck, I'll be in India."

The red carpet awaits her

Sharjah: Earth Sheikhing

■ Sharjah has just about everything to make it an exotic destination: bewitching beauties, modern architecture, exported artificial greenery, gold in abundance and the richie rich ('Petro City', October 8).

Unlike other desert emirates, Sharjah has a special glamour about it

■ The Magazine seemed to be a self-appointed promoter of Sharjah
Debabrata Mohanty, Balasore (Orissa)

because of its recent association with cricket. For, cricket was never the Sheikhs' sport (their only obsession being swanky cars and stylish beauties).

The dollar-rich sheikhs may have changed the skyline of Sharjah, but the sheikhdom is yet to give up its prejudices.
Manoj Kumar Jain, Shyamnagar (W.B.)

■ With money flowing in abundantly it is only natural that Sharjah will have the best. Lavish landmarks, shopping plazas and mosques. As long as you have money the emirate will be a paradise. Beyond that it is a forbidden city.
Arta Mishra, Cuttack

An enigma called Rekha

Meryl Makes Merry

■ If a Hollywood siren strips, it is news ('Streep Tease' October 29). If a Hollywood actress does not strip, it is also news.

What's so scandalous about Meryl Streep stripping in The Bridges of Madison County?
Devraj Singh Kalsi, Kanchrapara (W B)

True Lies

■ Some of the questions in First Person are impertinent, particularly the ones on lying and dying.
S.P. Mishra, Calcutta

■ At last Rekha's histrionics have been acknowledged ('Star Plus', September 10). Cast in commercial films where she has little scope to emote, Rekha was lying undiscovered all this while.
Prabal Guha, Patna

■ The cover story was bearable. But the Magazine is not a film glossy that it has to print full-page blowups of Rekha giving those come-hither looks.
Biswarup Ghosh, Calcutta

■ Hats off to Rekha! From an obese, third-rate film heroine, she had the intelligence to groom herself and emerge as Bollywood's most successful and beautiful woman.

The cliched tawaif and the pativrata bahu proved she could also excel in films like Khubsoorat (playing the mischievous sister) or Khoon Bhari Mang (the wronged wife).

COVER STORY

FALL FOR THIS!

Now that winter is here, see what our designer labels have in store for you
Samita Bhatia and Vaishali Honawar report from the fashion front*

WHILE THE CONTENTION OF FASHION PUNDITS HAS always been that you cannot dictate a colour to the season, the trends this fall indicate that it is going to be colour, colour and colour all the way to Spring '96

Affordability may be debatable, but the Fall-Winter Collections launched recently by a few top designers, have concentrated on the wearability of the garments; nd pirouetting on the ramp to present the enigmatic collections hot from the designer-studios were Manpreet Brar, the Revlon lady Mehar Bhasin, Pooja Batra, Shikha Swaroop and a galaxy of catwalk girls.

From Ritu Beri's Hommage a Lesage sequence

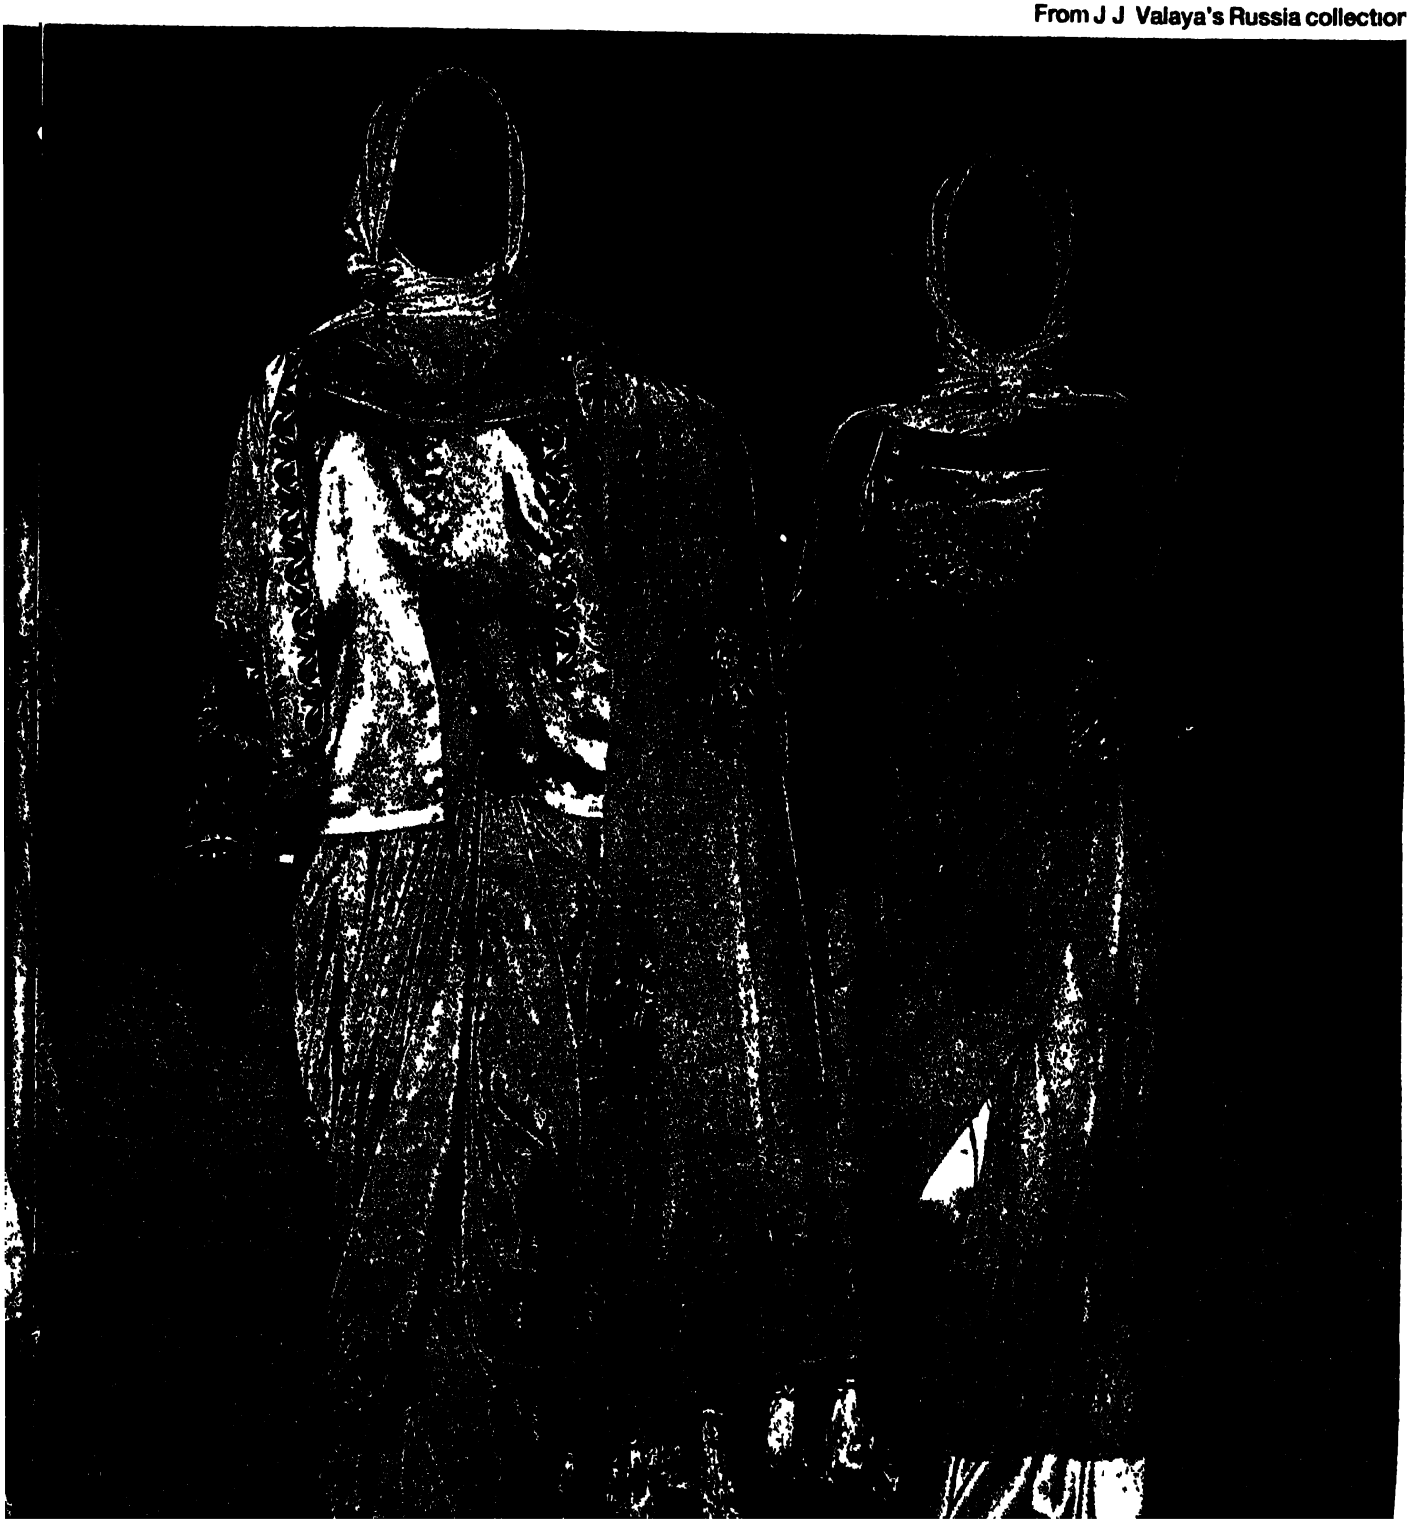
Designer Ritu Beri's do had alcohol served from a bar shaped like the Eiffel Tower. Gitanjali Kashyap planned to fly a "select few" (say, 120 people) to Samode Palace off Jaipur for a two-day extravaganza Except that a last-minute hitch prevented her from executing her designs. And the Ravi Bajaj line was introduced at a gala show sponsored by a new entrant on the Indian cosmetic scene, Revlon.

Kashyap's crinkled collection is a prediction that preempts the colour preferences and tones of the coming year the earth hues have gone, replaced by vivid new shades, muted tones of red, orange, blue, purple and burgundy



Simplicity is in It is evident in the lack of embellishments, the fall, the drape and the cut Ravi Bajaj's collection is marked by this simplicity which he feels in turn indicates that the quality of the product is as near perfect as possible The collection is versatile blending form and function with ideas that are progressive and provocative

"Basically people should wear what they are most comfortable in," feels Bajaj His silhouettes or colours are not restrictive Nor are his materials, ranging from crepe wool to cashmere and hand-woven tweed from Almora Cashmere became an international favourite this year after Imran Khan was seen draping a cashmere shawl to complement a traditional eastern attire And Bajaj selected cashmere for its luxurious feel, warmth and price tag!

Simplicity is also evident in Ritu Beri's collection, with the accent on classic straight lines and fluid elegance with a French influence The result a cool, wearable and feminine look

Innovative forms and new possibilities in embroidery are visible in Beri's collection Describing her collection, France Mes Amours, Beri says that hers is French fashion for the Indian women (with a dash of good humour) Divided into four sequences, her outfits reflect her time spent in one of the world's finest fashion capitals, Paris

A la Recherche des Legends, a hand-painted sequence, is inspired by French artists and their works, La France c'est Pres de Vous is simple and perfect with flowing fabrics of the chiffon and satin variety, Portrait d'Amour is an innovative portrayal of France with embroidery on wool and bold prints and bright colours, Hommage a Lesage, a tribute to the French designer Mon Francois Lesage with whom Ben had studied embroidery in Paris last year But watch the floor price Rs 8,000 that crawls up steadily to Rs 35,000!

For Kashyap, this season marks new beginnings as hers was a first solo extravaganza Though she says the layered look is on its way out the silhouettes for her block printed sequence were voluminous, layered "The colour palette for this sequence is shaded with the technique of ombre dyeing adding a cadence to the colour coding"

The colours interplay with the vibrant and the subdued through shading on tussar, gajji silk, crepe and organza The high point of her style is embroidery on net that comes with a cool price tag of Rs 45,000 Floor price Rs 8,000

For Bajaj this fall has been a search for the perfect woman's jacket His jackets come in silk and wool with the lengths varying from a very formal above-the-hip to mid-hip and the traditional blazer length His skirts come in sheaths and A-lines with the length varying from mini to knee to mid-calf to ballet He smiles, "In this economic environment, I am not sure whether to make the hemline rise or fall So I play it safe and feature them all"

The blouse, too, has been left simple because the fabric used for the blouse is printed silks and Bajaj would rather not disturb the effect

Colour being the leitmotif, most designers have experimented with a wide palette Internationally, bloom motifs, designs and colours are overpowering all other inspirational ideas in haute couture this fall

So, too, is Suneet Varma's collection which reflects the naturalist in him

"My fall collection is an ode to the flower that lives briefly, but leaves an impression that lasts a lifetime"

Varma has taken off creatively in every aspect from the flower "The pleated silk unfolds like the blooming bud and the drapes of the sarong — a new sari silhouette I have introduced this fall — reminds one of the manifold petals of a flower"

Varma has experimented and succeeded Screen-printed organza for easy elegance has been created in the Garden in Bloom, simple and ready-to-wear collection Another design breakthrough for the designer has been the cut velvet never used before in the textured technique that Varma applies for his dressy and embroidered collection

The latest to go public with his Fall-Winter Collection was the Swinging Sikh, J J Valaya The influences were varied and Valaya's imagination took flight into regions hitherto unexplored by him — Gaza, China, Russia, the world of the American Indians and so, too, a turning to the Indian Indian in the sequence 'Made in India'

'Gaza' was opulent in classic black, blue and rusts replete with a layered look that is so popular in the West JJ's "ardent fan" — none other than the sizzling Water Baby of the Seventies Nafisa Ali Sodhi says, "A large part of his designs are those that he creates to satisfy the artiste in him"

From Ensemble's Fall-Winter Collection

Ali Sodhi is effusive about JJ's designs "I love the maturity of his colour tones, the softness of the fabric which gives a distinct sense of style to his creations The sequence in his Fall-Winter Collection that I have found to be very appealing is 'How the West was Lost' The fabrics unfurl in a veritable riot of colours, and it reminded me a lot of nature," muses Ali Sodhi

Like her, the sequences that are the closest to the designer's heart are the American Indian and Gaza creations All the sequences are livened with tones that are new and anyone who felt that there was a similarity in colours to an earlier collection is told by JJ, "The story – as in shades — may be the same but the colours are nowhere close to last year's collection"

Besides an emphasis on crepes, chiffons and georgettes, a benchmark in the collection was the sequence inspired by the intricacy and detail of the 'Rusi Roomal'

More silk sand crepes crafted into half saris, skirts, long and short, swirling and straight, culottes and salwaar-kameezes, all worked upon with intricate embroidery The shades were peach, black and even red, and the ubiquitous 'blooms' of this year's Fall-Winter were there in all their glory The Chinese strains were just as colourful

And the Indian in Valaya sashayed the ramp in the 'Made in India' The models -- Marc Robinson and wife Colleen Khan, Rahul Dev, Mehar Bhasin, Anu Ahuja, Noyonika Chatterjee, Sonali Oberoi, Arjun Rampal — walked the catwalk in zardozi-crafted fabrics some studded with Swaroski crystals

Every designer seems to have something special in his closet with no single rule dictating the look except simplicity

The silhouette is long and clean or short and smart and the colours soft or earthy

Women's ethnic wear goes aggressively feminine with flowing dupattas and light fabrics like crepe, chiffon, lace and fine wool with lots of metallic embroidery thrown in

Western wear for both men and women makes a splash with bold colours and designs

Men's ethnic wear - kurtas, achkans and the like -- are embroidered and looser, but as designer Krishna Mehta says, "Cuts and styles for men's wear don't change much " What she herself has done, then, is to innovate with the embroidery using gold, silver and bronze thread on a silk fabric

Mehta started out with shirts, but has now included kurtas in her collection She has kept her shoulders for the season broader and looser and introduced more colours in burnt shades like ochre, gold, rust and olive green "Initially, men weren't too open to the idea of colours other than the usual shades but now they are getting used to it," says the designer

The material she uses is light, spun silk with a jacquard-like texture and a light weave "Men are usually very particular about the fabric being 'itchy' and the ones I have used are just right," she says

In women's wear, Mehta's accent is on fluidity and transparency The colours are soft pink, off-white and soft beige The embroidery, too, is lighter and treated in such a way as to give the clothes a softer look

Interestingly, Mehta uses gold cord pounded with a hammer for the embroidery, creating an unusual look

Pallavi Jaikishen makes a feminine statement with a Fondant lace and sequin collection and her peach Verona line with cord quilting

Tarun Tahiliani also uses Solstiss French lace in his collection for the season

Tahiliani's clothing, in the designer's own words, is heavily inspired by Indian classicism and his look for Fall-

Winter fashion from Ravi Bajaj

Winter is divided into five categories, some of them drawing from his earlier work

'Crepes, drapes and shapes,' the first in his series, is made up of fluid, single-colour garments while the Impressionist group is a collection of tailored and draped separates inspired by 'Monet's Years at Giverny.' The colours here are lilac, jade, red and orange

Texture, that one aspect which inspires most designers and wearers — for what feels better against the skin than a beautifully knit fabric — is given its due by Tahiliani in the textured group which has traditional silhouettes such as the lehnga, Koti, Mughal kurti, sarong and the saree blouse. The colours are iridiscent

For the 'Hakoba collection in silk', Tahiliani reaches into his Sindhi background. Tiny, handcut mirrors are embroidered on natural hakoba in beige, blush and tussar gold

In the 'Velvet Appliqued on Net' or Vain group, Tahiliani goes into the baroque era to capture in his clothes the vanity and flamboyant excess of those times. The colours are burgundy, buff, teal, aubergine and sun mustard while net and gauze are the textiles used to lend the clothes a sensuality

Monisha Jaisingh toes the simplicity line with close-fitted jackets and shirts. This designer specialises in Western wear for women and her look for the season is the "mod Sixties' look," as she calls it. Skirts are knee-length or above the knee, fitted at the top and slightly flared at the bottom. Trousers have a trim fit. Her fabrics are soft ones like georgette, wool crep and satin and she uses a lot of red wit some black and white

Also in Western wear, Lester Manuel's Safari line is all about shimmering gold tops and printed chiffon pants

LOUIS LINE

Just when it appeared to be curtains for the Pierre Cardin showroom in the Capital, the Louis Feraud Autumn/Winter Collection was unveiled in Delhi

Luxurious French chic now attempts a major comeback in the Indian market. A hand-picked selection from a choice of almost 300 styles from the painter/designer Louis Feraud's international collection will now be available in Delhi and soon in other metros.

According to Swati Singhania, managing director, J K L'Atelier, who brings the Louis Feraud designs to India, "The bottomline adhered to in the garments is what most designers have looked at closely this fall — wearability. The collection offers modern and racy options to the Indian woman for the first time."

So, the skirts are flippier, there are exciting youthful knits that could help create a practical and, to an extent, cost-effective wardrobe, while prints are exclusive, updated silhouettes and interchangeable options give you a vast range of couture to select from

For business dressing there are lively and dynamic options — chrome yellow, amethyst royale cyclamen, eclectic prints with tweed plaid boucles, in wool velour and crispy wool crepes.

You have multiple jacket options in claret moss and anthracite grey, tweeds designed for a sporty look in blue ribbon, cream pearl and brown. And for winter pearl white, oyster grey, charcoal and black have been crafted into fitted gentry jackets,

Louis Feraud collection

oversized anoraks and chic slim suits

. And added to the multiple options already presented in Feraud's collection for fall are soft, luxurious winter sweaters to wear as jackets or just to slip on for a soft, warm look

Optimum impact dressing for women come in red, orange flame and ebony in coats, capes and new skirt shapes. The sensual evening look offers a varied selection of swinging georgettes, short dance dresses, elegant satin tuxedo and graceful long gowns

"The selection for men includes suits and a line of racy jackets and trousers, when mixed and matched can be adapted for any occasion," says Singhania. The choice of colours for men this winter have moved away from the outlandish and focus on navies, blacks and whites with a strong presence of natural colours in the finest wools in engaging textures and classic checks. The shirts come in a wide array of Swiss cotton in basic blue, white and grey or pastels — green, yellow, peach. Everything seems to be in stripes, plains and checks

A quick glance at the men's line provides them with an apparel that is appropriate and works well both in the working environment and the cocktail that follows. The prices are steep with a Louis Feraud shirt tagged at Rs 3,000 and a 100 per cent wool jacket at Rs 7,000

"We want to educate people about fashion and, therefore, will make sure that we have our product, quality, pricing and marketing right. Naturally, a label can't survive if the total concept is not adhered to.'

And how relevant an issue is fashion? Vaishali Honawar and Samita Bhatia check out

Fashion house Glitterati presented the designs of top international houses such as Versace, Valentino and Ungaro at its Winter-Fall Collection. Their bold, psychedelic colours seemed to go down pretty well with the audiences and one cannot help but wonder if local designers of Western wear see any threat to their livelihood in the face of the competition.

"No," says Monisha Jaisingh. "More and more people in India are becoming aware of fashion and the entrance of international fashion houses gives them variety." Personally, she adds, she thinks the competition will be more beneficial than harmful.

But what about the growing feeling among some fashion critics that Indian designer wear is stuck in a groove, with designers recycling their old stuff or drawing too much from a single inspiration?

Indeed, some of the reviews of the Winter-Fall fashion shows harped on this point. "Well, there can be no drastic change in fashion at any point of time. The change is always gradual," says Jaisingh.

Tahiliani, however, has more to say on the matter. "It seems to me that since we are living through such turbulent times in terms of the media barrage or assault on the senses, the average attention span has become shorter than ever. 'New' seems to be the order of the day and hence sensationalism and gimmickry are preferred over solid form."

Fashion, too, he feels, is falling victim to this belief. "Those who go on about fashion being dead are either completely immune to subtlety and/or they simply do not understand the machinations of the industry.

"Fashion is not supposed to be a circus put on for the benefit of bored and overcritical viewers who are into the 'New' game. When I go to see a men's wear show, for example, I am excited by things I can relate to, to clothes that I can wear. Evolution happens by way of colour, textile, textures, attitude, a stance, styling. But these are subtle messages and you need fine-tuned antennae to pick them up."

Mehr Jesia, model and fashion show choreographer, agrees. Instead of being on a decline, she says, Indian fashion is picking up now. 'In fact, we're quite superior to the West in many ways, though in terms of fabrics, they are leaps and bounds ahead. Good stuff such as lycra and stretch is just not available here."

When she dresses, says Jesia, she does not go by what is in as "that would be ridiculous in a country like India where there is too little to choose from." She loves wearing Tahiliani's ethnic outfits - 'they make you feel amazing," while for Western wear, she picks out Raghavendra Rathore for the elegance and chic of his garments - "nobody can make a jacket like he does."

Even as some murmurs ran through Delhi's glitterati about the feasibility and wearability of a section of the garments, Nafisa was quick to defend the 'House of Valaya'. "A ramp showing is a culmination of all that the designer owes to his audience in terms of a dramatic unveiling of his collection. Each of the outfits will have to be heavily accessorised. But when someone buys the outfit, the ensemble will eventually be broken up and parts of it bought piecemeal. And each part of the whole is 'very' wearable," she insists.

So too, the price tags, she says. The garments can be picked off the shelf in an assorted range between Rs 8,000-10,000 at the lower end and Rs 50,000-60,000 at the higher end.

Certainly, fashion in India appears poised to go a long, long way. The need, as Tahiliani says, is to formulate our own dictates about fashion direction rather than follow what the Western market is going after.

As he asks, "After all, shirt lengths are not really a relevant issue, are they?" ■

SATYAJITER SANSAR

BY ASHIS NANDY

Extracted from the Savage Freud and Other Essays on Possible and Retrievable Selves by Ashis Nandy, Oxford University Press; Rs 325

The Bengali middle classes may respect the filmmaker Satyajit Ray but they love the popular fiction writer Ray. The writer Ray reminds them of his father, Bengal's most-loved humorist and writer of nonsense verse, and his grandfather, Bengal's most popular writer of fairy tales in this century.

In response to the respect and the love, Ray partitioned his self into two net compartments. Into one he fitted his 'classical' ventures — the feature films he had made over a period of three decades. Into the other he fitted his popular, low-brow ventures — his thrillers and tales of mystery, adventure, and violence.

The first category has a number of identifiable features. The most prominent of them is the centrality given to women and his use of women as windows to some of the core social problems of the society and his times. This place given to women's issues is not unique to Ray. From Rammohun Ray (1772-1833) who made the cause of women central to his platform of social reform in the first decades of the 19th century to Gandhi, who saw the role of women as vital to his movement for winning political freedom for India and for expanding the sector of freedom for all humanity, nearly all great thinkers and social reformers in India have viewed womanhood as the arena where the moral consciousness of the Indic civilisation has to be re-contextualised in response to the new social forces emerging on the Indian scene.

This is equally true of the creative writers who have influenced Bengali social life. From Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay (1838-1894) to Rabindranath Tagore and Sarat Chandra Chattopadhyay (1876-1938) the great Bengali writers have been consistently concerned with the problems of women and used them to mirror the crises of Indian society. (I deliberately avoid using here the examples of women reformers and writers, lest their attempts to make the problems of women central to the society look interest-based and sectoral.)

In Ray's case, however, both these strands of awareness have been further underscored by the experiences of his family. No wonder he saw himself as heir to the 19th century Bengali 'Renaissance' and, though some scholars now find the term inadequate and misleading in the context of Bengal, the term and its progressivist implications did not lose their shine for Ray. For he lived intellectually and morally in the pre-war world of Tagore. To Ray, the continuity between the problems of women and the crisis of the Indian society seemed obvious and inevitable. And women constitute a formidable maternal as well as conjugal presence in his important films. Even in those where there are few women characters — for instance Parash Pathar, Jalsaghar and Goopi Gyne Bagha Byne — the issues of gender and potency enter the scene indirectly and constitute a salient theme

In Ray's world, feminity is not merely an important principle, it is given added power by telescoping into all situations of conjugality a clear touch of maternity Here Ray is in the company of the great myth-makers of late 19th century and early 20th century Bengal, and also perhaps of the great Indian myth-makers of all times

The second major feature of Ray's movies is exclusion of the sentimental and dramatic Ray loved to tell a story in his films he does not provide a political or philosophical text He considered movies that do away with a proper story line self-indulgent On the other hand, he would take great ca e not to overload his films with events, to have too dense a plot, or to assume too partisan a tone One critic repeatedly speaks of Ray s parimitibodh, a sense of restraint, and considers this restraint part of Ray's personality Another has gone so far as to say

' Ray is not naturally drawn towards contradictions in mental make-up The grace in Ray's films often comes from the way he approaches confrontations, averts actions, decisions, events Where he tries to be direct, the result is often ineffective or jarring

Even Charulata and Ghare Baire, movies that stick closely to the novels on which they are based, de-dramatise their originals to some extent

The fear of being melodramatic or maudlin that dogs many contemporary creative writers in Bengal, is partly

A scene from Charulata Eroticised maternity

Swatilekha Chatterjee in Ghare Baire

a reaction to the somewhat maudlin world of Saratchandra Chattopadhyay, who dominated Indian middle-class consciousness in the inter-war years Ray is no Ernest Hemingway or Bertolt Brecht (two random examples of Western authors who made toughminded detachment their hallmark), but even when he deals with a subject as cataclysmic as the Bengal famine of the early Forties, he makes a special effort not to be emotionally too involved with his subject As a result, when Ashani Sanket was released, some of his critics accused him of producing a pretty picture postcard on a subject as grim as famine They interpreted his somewhat detached gaze as an indicator of inadequate social commitment

Partly, however, this parimitibodh and 'distance' come from the fact that Ray usually avoided dealing with subjects with which he was directly acquainted By underplaying the stress and anomie of urban India, by concentrating on rural India about which he knew little, Ray had paradoxically acquired a comprehensive, dispassionate view of the gamut of the macroscopic changes to which his family had been an important witness He saw it whole, Dasgupta (in The Cinema) says, because he saw it from a distance There were obvious deep, unresolved passions behind his restraint, however the demands made on him for direct, impassioned social commitment only cramped his style He was never able to match the creativity of his first decade as a director, when his cinematic voice was soft and his commitments understated

Third, despite his emphasis on feminity, Ray's films are characterised by a low-key, almost hesitant treatment of sex As a recent assessment puts it

"In nearly every film where a frank treatment might have been appropriate, a natural barrier to intimacy has existed In The Goddess it was Dovamovee's reluctance, in Charulata Amal's, in Kapurush Amitava's, in Days and Nights in the Forest Sanjoy's (although intercourse between Hari and the tribal girl is suggested), in The

Certainly in Ray's world sex enters stealthily and fearfully, whether he is dealing with conjugality directly or with eroticised maternity (as in Charulata). Similarly with violence. It enters Ray's world as something that is sinister by virtue of what it implies or what it can be, rather than by what it is

Sharmila Tagore in Apur Sansar

Chess Players Mirza's, and in Pikoo the mother's (though self-nakedness is shown because the film was being made for French television)

This avoidance of sexuality is matched by an avoidance of overt conflict

"In Charulata, intensity of love is expressed without the lovers even holding hands, there is a rather impulsive, rather brotherly, embrace but it contributes only a minor note in the tension created between the two The fascinating scene of the memory game in Aranyer Din Ratri, together with the walks, the interplay and repitition of themes, creates a musical statement in which the seduction scenes are only the fortissimos, not raucous even in violence"

Ashani Sanket*: Ray's distant view of the Forties' famine

Dasgupta recognises in the context of Apur Sansar that Ray's ambition, given his anti-hedonistic Brahmo heritage, is nothing less than to redress the over-emphasis on conjugality at the expense of maternity and to re-emphasis love in its all-embracing sense

"Apu and Aparna's love for each other is only another aspect of Sarvajaya's love for her children or theirs for their aunt or father — a comprehensive all-pervasive, non-sexual love which has seldon been celebrated in the cinema with such purity"

The first time Ray showed a couple kissing in his films was in Ghare Baire, made in the mid-Eighties, even when he made an avowedly adventure film such as Abhijan, he took care to avoid showing extreme violence Many have attributed this restraint to his Brahmo puritanic upbringing, others have seen in it a compromise with conventionality and an inability to 'let go' Ray himself is clear on the subject

"People do not seem to bother about what you say as long as you say it in a sufficiently oblique and unconventional manner — and the normal looking film is at a discount I don't imply that all the new European filmmakers are without talent, but I do seriously doubt if they could continue to make a living without the very liberal exploitation of sex that their code seems to permit"

Certainly in Ray's world sex enters stealthily and tearfully, whether he is dealing with conjugality directly or with eroticised maternity (as in Charulata) Similarly with violence It enters Ray's world as something that is sinister by virtue of what it implies or what it can be, rather than by what it is Often the violence is not physical but involves injuries to a person's or a group's dignity, self-definition, or way of life For instance, Abhijan, Pratidwandi and Seemabaddha, particularly the first two, offer ample scope for disturbing if not spectacular, violence The temptation is consciously avoided Even in the two movies Ray has made out of his own crime thrillers, overt violence is minimal

To begin with, this restraint may have been Ray's attempt to mark off his work from the Indian and Western commercial films and create a specific audience for his kind of cinema He pioneered art films in India, he did not have a ready audience at least for his early works Later, such restraint became part of his style ■

March 21 - April 20

Ganesha says your funk or insecurity will be over. You will have no time to complain. Action, hard work, immense energies well directed should yield pleasing and rich rewards. Prepare to travel and/or commute a great deal. Time to socialise on a massive scale. You will reach out to both people and places.

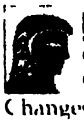
Taurus
April 21 —May 20

Buying/selling and investments lead to comforts and fulfilment for Taureans. Their contacts and influence should help them to get the gravy, as we say! Also it must be made absolutely clear that there is a danger of accidents and operations or at least ill-health. So be cautious during this phase.

Gemini
May 21 — June 20

The full moon of the seventh in your sign activates your interest in love, marriage and partnerships at all levels. A journey at short notice is possible. Funds, loans and joint finances will have a special significance for you. It would be best to take decisions in a calculating manner.

Cancer
June 21 — July 20



Your efforts will not go unappreciated. This is the right time to spend, travel and communicate with verve and vigour. A few physical discomforts may have to be taken in your stride. Now is the time to keep pets, hire/fire employees if the boss, prepare a blueprint for action.

Leo
July 21 — August 21

Despite innumerable pressures you will find the time for everybody who approaches you. Friends and well wishers will try to help but may not be able to do too much. So, try to accept it. Your love life could be stimulated a good deal in December. Travel chances are excellent, or visitors to come to you.

Virgo
August 22 -- September 22

The chances of your status and prestige taking a pole vault are immense. Changes in the homefront, office and shop, are very likely because Mercury conjuncts Jupiter. Birth of children, or the start of conception, the cultivation of hobbies, the taking of a study course are probable.

Libra
September 23 — October 22

A powerful Venus factor helps you to travel, contact those who count, correspond and publicise your wares, sign key documents and contracts. Journey and ceremony are fated, except to see a lot of people. Many Librans will give an inspired performance in whatever they choose to do.

Scorpio
October 23 - November 22

The use of public money and funds is a possibility. If angling for loans and funds you will secure it. Mars makes you rather dominating and assertive, so cool it. Money and you will be good friends. December is just right for augmenting income. Trips and the like are certainly foretold. Do take care of your health.

Sagittarius
November 23 - December 20

You will be lion hearted in combat, deadly as a python, but ready and overripe for marriage, alliances and liaison. It is a very peculiar situation to be in. It is also money time and so is January, 1996. You will have choices, so keep your options open. Keep a watch on your health.

Capricorn
December 21 — January 19

Expenses will be skyrocketing and you may be hard put to balance the budget, but balance it you will, because Mercury connects with money planet, Jupiter. Love and affairs of the heart give some excitement. You may travel or move. The snag is ill health. Trips, ties, and contracts are also foretold.

Aquarius
January 20 — February 18

Just the right week to take the initiative, use a little pressure and pull to get things done. If you like, you can throw a party or call a few friends over, because socialising and camaraderie will make you happy. You will in short have a lot of zest for life and love. Make the most of this energetic phase.

Pisces
February 19 — March 20

You have a chance to make good, despite being harried and irritated. Ganesha says the trick is to have confidence and hone up on skills and knowhow and develop contacts. This will pay you this month and more so in the beginning of the new year. There is therefore, no time to lose.

BIRTHDAYS

December 3: Moon-Mars trine helps you to organise your affairs to great advantage, says Ganesha. However, there will be some stress and strain.

December 4: Moon-Venus trine means comforts and luxuries, which as we all know, require money. Romance and cosy comfort await you.

December 5: Moon trines Neptune giving you inspiration and motivation, the two mighty steps to success. Travel is a distant possibility.

December 6: There is no strong aspect, so it will all depend on the choices you make. However, marriage and partnerships are possible.

December 7: The full moon makes you mentally alert physically active and quite lucky in relationships. Paradoxically enough, separations and sorrows are foretold. Adjustments are necessary.

December 8: Mercury-Jupiter fine conjunction gives a touch of class and magic to all that you do or say. Those in banking, teaching, writing and research do wonders.

December 9: Moon trine Saturn refers to good work and therefore luck will hold in matters of property, house, office and real estate.

RUSKIN BOND'S COLUMN

Merry Matrimony

No (said Arun as we waited for dinner to be prepared) I did not fall in love with my neighbour's wife It is not that kind of story Mind you, Leela was a most attractive woman She was not beautiful or pretty, but she was handsome

Her's was the firm, athletic body of a 16-year-old boy, free of any surplus flesh She bathed morning and evening, oiling herself well, so that her skin glowed a golden-brown in the winter sunshine Her lips were often coloured with paan juice, but her teeth were perfect

I was her junior by about five years, and she called me her "younger brother" Her husband, who was 40 to her 32, was an official in the customs and excise department an extrovert, a hard-drinking, backslapping man, who spent a great deal of time on tour Leela knew that he was not always faithful to her during these frequent absences, but she found solace in her own loyalty and in the well-being of her one child, a boy called Chandu

I did not care for the boy He had been well-spoilt, and took great delight in disturbing me whenever I was at work He entered my rooms uninvited, knocked my books about, and, if guests were present, made insulting remarks about them to their faces

Leela, during her lonely evenings, would often ask me to sit on her verandah and talk to her The day's work done, she would relax with a hookah It was a habit she had brought with her from her village near Agra, and it was a habit she refused to give up She liked to talk, and, as I was a good listener, she soon grew fond of me The fact that I was 26 years old and still a bachelor, never failed to astonish her

It was not long before she took upon herself the responsibility for getting me married I found it useless to protest She did not believe me when I told her that I could not afford to marry, that I preferred a bachelor's life A wife, she insisted, was an asset to any man A wife reduced expenses Where did I eat? At a hotel, of course That must cost me at least Rs 60 a month, even on a vegetarian diet But if I had a simple, homely wife to do the cooking, we could both eat well for less than that

Leela fingered my shirt, observing that a button was missing and that the collar was frayed She remarked on my pale face and general look of debility, and told me that I would fall victim to all kinds of diseases if I did not find someone to look after me What I needed, she declared between puffs at the hookah, was a woman, a young, healthy buxom woman, preferably from a village near Agra

"If I could find someone like you," I said slyly, "I would not mind getting married"

She appeared neither flattered nor offended by my remark

"Don't marry an older woman," she advised "Never take a wife who is more experienced in the ways of the world than you are You just leave it to me, I'll find a suitable bride for you"

To please Leela, I agreed to this arrangement, thinking she would not take it seriously But, two days later, when she suggested that I accompany her to a certain distinguished home for orphan girls, I became alarmed I refused to have anything to do with her project

"Don't you have confidence in me?" she asked "You said you would like a girl who resembled me I know one who looks just as I did 10 years ago"

"I like you as you are now," I said "Not as you were 10 years ago"

"Of course We shall arrange for you to see the girl first"

"You don't understand," I protested "It's not that I feel I have to be in love with someone before marrying her I know you would choose a fine girl, and I would really prefer someone who is homely and simple to an M A with Honours in Psychology, it's just that I'm not ready for it I want another year or two of freedom I don't want to be chained down To be frank, I don't want the responsibility

"A little responsibility will make a man of you," said Leela, but she did not insist of my accompanying her to the orphanage, and the matter was allowed to rest for a few days

I was beginning to hope that Leela had reconciled herself to allowing one man to remain single in the world full of husbands when, one morning, she accosted me on the verandah with an open newspaper, which she thrust in front of my nose

"There!" she said triumphantly "What do you think of that? I did it to surprise you "

She had certainly succeeded in surprising me Her henna-stained forefinger rested on an advertisement in the matrimonial columns

Bachelor journalist, age 25, seeks attractive young wife, well versed in household duties Caste religion no bar Dowry optional

I must admit that Leela had made a good job of it In a few days the replies began to come in, usually from the parents of the girls concerned Each applicant wanted to know how much money I was earning At the same time, they took the trouble to list their own connections and the high positions occupied by relatives Some parents enclosed their daughter s photographs They were really good photographs, though there had been a certain amount of touching-up

I studied the pictures with interest Perhaps marriage wasn't such a bad proposition, after all I selected the photographs of the three girls I most fancied and showed them all to Leela

To my surprise, she disapproved of all three One of the girls she said, had a face like a hermaphrodite, another obviously suffered from tuberculosis, and the third was undoubtedly an adventuress

Leela decided that the whole idea of the advertisement had been a mistake She was sorry she had inserted it the only replies we were likely to get would be from fortune-hunters And I had no fortune So we destroyed the letters I tried to keep some of the photographs, but Leela tore them up too

And, for sometime, there were no more attempts at getting me married

Leela and I met nearly every day, but we spoke of other things Sometimes, in the evenings, she would make me sit on the charpoy opposite her, and then she drew up her hookah and told stories about her village and her family I was getting used to the boy, too, and even growing rather fond of him

All this came to an end when Leela's husband went and got himself killed He was shot by a bootlegger who had decided to get rid of the excise man rather than pay him an exorbitant sum of money It meant that Leela had to give up her quarters and return to her village near Agra She waited until the boy's school term had finished, and then she packed their things and bought two tickets, third-class to Agra

Something, I could see, had been troubling her, and when I saw her off at the station I realised what it was She was having a fit of conscience about my continued bachelorhood

"In my village," she said confidently, leaning out from the carriage window, "there is a very comely young girl, a distant relative of mine, I shall speak to my parents "

And then I said something which I had not considered before which had never, until that moment, entered my head And I was no less surprised than Leela when the words came tumbling out of my mouth "Why don t you marry me now?"

Arun didn't have time to finish his story because, just at this interesting stage, the dinner arrived But the dinner brought with it the end of his story

It was served by his wife, a magnificent woman, strong and handsome, who could only have been Leela And a few minutes later, Chandu Arun s stepson, charged into the house, complaining that he was famished

Arun introduced me to his wife, and we exchanged the usual formalities

"But why hasn't your friend brought his family with him?" she asked

"Family? Because he s still a bachelor!"

And then as he watched his wife s expression change from a look of mild indifference to one of deep concern, he hurriedly changed the subject

Children at Work

The English find the concept of child labour revolting specially in industries like the Indian carpet industry I was therefore surprised that surveys suggest that 40 per cent of British children do paid work and three quarters of these do so illegally And that doesn't include those who work for nothing

It s pantomime time in Britain, when every city and sizeable town stages its own version of Cinderella, Aladdin or some such golden oldie with TV stars in drag as the wicked stepmother or the Widow Twankie, comedians playing the fool and actresses playing the principal boy, the hero of the tale This is tradition, as much as the Christmas lights which are already festooning the streets, or Christmas pudding and brandy butter

The banners and newspaper advertisements for pantomimes have already appeared, advance booking is open This is pure family entertainment to which you can take your children and, as when you pull crackers on Christmas day, forget you're grown up at all

Most pantomimes have a children's chorus and now the auditions are over and young school children have started rehearsals Ten-year old Ben Occhipinti is one of them Ben loves acting and dancing and has already decided this will be his vocation Apart from attending rehearsals, he will appear in 27 performances, most during term time This is a fully professional production in which all the adults will be paid Ben will get nothing

Nothing, except for four free tickets valid once for certain performances only If his parents and brother and sister want to see him on the first night, they will have to pay for the privilege

It is a strange system which allows children to work but which doesn't pay them As if that's all right because they want to join the entertainment business As if work you enjoy shouldn't be paid for

When children work for money they are paid very poorly, an obvious example of this being the paper boys who deliver papers over long distances often in foul weather every day before school It is not like India, where this is a job for adults But in Britain, this is not seen in terms of the offensive concept of child labour

When the government opted out of a European Community directive on children at work, it used words with a much softer connotation It was "safeguarding the jobs of paper boys and girls"

Ministers are now planning to scrap the law which prevents children working more than two hours on a Sunday, enabling children as young as 13 and 14 to work five hours on what was once a day of rest, and those of 15, eight hours This is at a time of their lives when they are still in full-time compulsory education

It can be argued that this is an unbalanced picture, that the children do go to school and that the government proposes to introduce a 'permitted list' of occupations for 13-year-olds to limit what they do It will also rule that children must have at least one week free from work during the summer holidays

Of course, one should

No balance is attempted in the European condemnation of Indian child labour, although the economic conditions there are vastly different

try to be balanced But no balance is attempted in the European condemnation of Indian child labour, although the economic and social conditions there are vastly different The legalisation of child labour is considered in itself a disgrace

The Indian carpet industry is a case in point, facing as it does a threat of international boycott which could destroy it The Western campaigners and media people who present an image of carpet workers as being entirely bonded child labourers chained to looms are not interested in a more balanced image

They will not see the carpet industry as one which has brought the market into villages over vast areas of eastern UP They will not see the comparative prosperity, and the migration to urban slums which has been forestalled They will not see the tens of thousands of adult workers They will not understand the problems of poverty, or the fact that many children work on family looms with adult members of their family They will not visit these areas independently to see for themselves, and in the past international fora have not even allowed leaders of the carpet industry who are trying to stop children working to put their case

There is no balance at least in part because Western media and society is profoundly unbalanced This disbalance is dangerous abroad and at home Here it is transforming Britain into a profoundly uncaring society where selfishness is what matters and where politicians can make whether or not to take a few pence off the rate of income tax more important than issues like children's welfare and education

The British education budget is, per head of the population, less than half that spent in France or Germany Academic performance is correspondingly poor No doubt pressure, sensibly applied, can help to improve things for Indian children But there is a need to acknowledge that pressure is badly needed to help the underprivileged at home in Britain too

GOAN PLACES!

Frederick Noronha profiles Indian designer Wendell Rodricks who struck the international fashion scene with the Igedo fashion fair in Germany, one of the world's leading fashion fairs*

His aim is to capture Paris, sell Indian ideas and clad the West And Wendell Rodricks is just back from the Igedo fashion fair in Germany, one of the world's leading fashion fairs And already well on his way to doing all that

This 35-year-old, Bombay-born designer of Goan origin is not really into winter wear But his work is very much linked to the European winter Or, at least, to those fleeing the northern cold Wendell's creations which drew wows at Dusseldorf, Germany, were part of a Resort Collection, reflecting b th his native Goa and the "soul of Modern India"

A Wendell Rodricks design

International model Anouk wears a Rodricks outfit

Top international model Helena Christensen wore his designs, and his collection won much appreciation from the European media and orders poured in. Wendell Rodricks had truly arrived on the international fashion scene

"I think the reason why Wendell's collections work so well is because his is the look of modern India," said fashion expert Meher Castelino "A lot of my clothes are Indian garments But when they are put together, they are Western-wearable, with an international appeal The clientele feels they can use it without feeling they are in a costume," adds Castelino.

Long kurtas which flow into a circular dupatta, dramatic minis in the softest cottons and pastel colours — all out in simple, fluid style that is very Wendell.

His buzz word is "practical" garments And garments which take ages to put on are out. So are those which cannot safely get into a washing machine. "Nothing too elaborate for the normal modern woman," says Rodricks. Garments should give the wearer a "perk" and he will even invert a garment so the wearer's skin feels the satiny smooth textures.

After his Dusseldorf success story, Rodricks is scaling new heights from his lovely country home in Goa

"This will sound terribly egoistic I want to get to Paris I want India — a whole bunch of Indian designers — to get there, and let the West wear our garments. Because our garments are the most comfortable, most wearable, most hygenic, perhaps "

Unless this happens, designers from abroad will come here to "rob our colours and combinations, styling and embroidery and claim it is theirs," says Rodricks

It is a tough task. For one, it takes a lot of money to get to fashion Meccas like Paris Should not the Indian industry play its role, he queries

Until recently, the US and Paris-trained Rodricks showcased his clothesline only in Bangalore's Ffolio and Bombay's Melange Orders from Germany, Holland, Switzerland and Australia will now put the Wendell Rodricks Couture Creations label upfront in the fashion world.

Says Rodricks, bowing low before Karma "I arrived at a moment when even the press was looking for young designers They knew it was going to take off We happened to have returned from abroad with foreign degrees and were toasted as a new breed "

Exuding confidence in his work and its originality, he pays tribute to Goa, his ancestral home "Goa gave me the freedom of a think tank," he says, seated in his large old-style Goan house in Colvale, one of the sleepiest villages around here Village life allowed his style to evolve and be "more simple, more fluid, more light and easy on the wearer "

The designer in his Goan home

Helena Christensen in a Rodricks creation

Rodricks entered the big league after his first collection from Goa, an ecology-based one, where he wove pineapple and banana fibre with silk in a 'Back to Nature' Collection

"I grew in mind and clothing much more after [shifting to] Goa A designer needs an atmosphere where he lives simply, in tune with nature and completely isolated [from the outside world] and other stylistic influences," says Rodricks

Now, he is talking about a creative design school, set in his ancestral village in Goa, for students from across the country which could bloom into an export house

What was the secret of his success? "They [Wendell Rodricks clothes] have little tricks of innovation Long circular dupattas which one can wear in one way or another For example, [actress] Rekha has this wonderful sense of wearing [any creations] in her own little way — even I didn't conceive it could be worn that way That's a big kick for the designer "

Much of his clientele likes "interesting clothes per se, rather than clothes for their own sake

"Indian garments are the garments for the next century And privately a lot of Westerners believe that," he says

Today is my birthday, idly I gaze at the outside a quaint light is fast asleep near a contemplating tree, its limp roots loosely spread around the withered shadow of a buried star

How many stars he buried there! I wonder as I grow up a year older from today
the leaves rustle and cry, their silent tears
stain my life's torn pages, their sighs blow over my fluttering words and leave a deep smudge
How many of my poor joys are buried there!

Remembrance

In jest
I threw a stone
At the moon
A piece of it Came unstuck,
And falling to the ground, Shattered.
I picked up a shard
Of it, quickly,
Keeping it
For remembrance
The rest curled itself
Into a hammock
And rocking gently,
Cried itself to sleep.

Devil in a Blue Dress· A sensational story of murder and lust starring Denzel Washington as the cool and sensual Easy Rawlins

Set in the decadent Los Angeles of the Forties, the film is based on Walter Mosley's highly successful novel, the first in a series about Rawlins

Easy, a Black veteran with medals and ribbons to testify to his military feats, has been sacked from his job as an aeroplane mechanic by a racist White boss and is now in danger of losing his home that symbolised his faith in the American Dream

It explains why he takes the money and does not make good his escape when an underworld psychopath puts him on his payroll His first assignment is to find Daphne Monet, a siren with a notoriety for blackmail

Director Carl Franklin manages to conclude the movie on a peaceful note despite the turbulent plot of the thriller

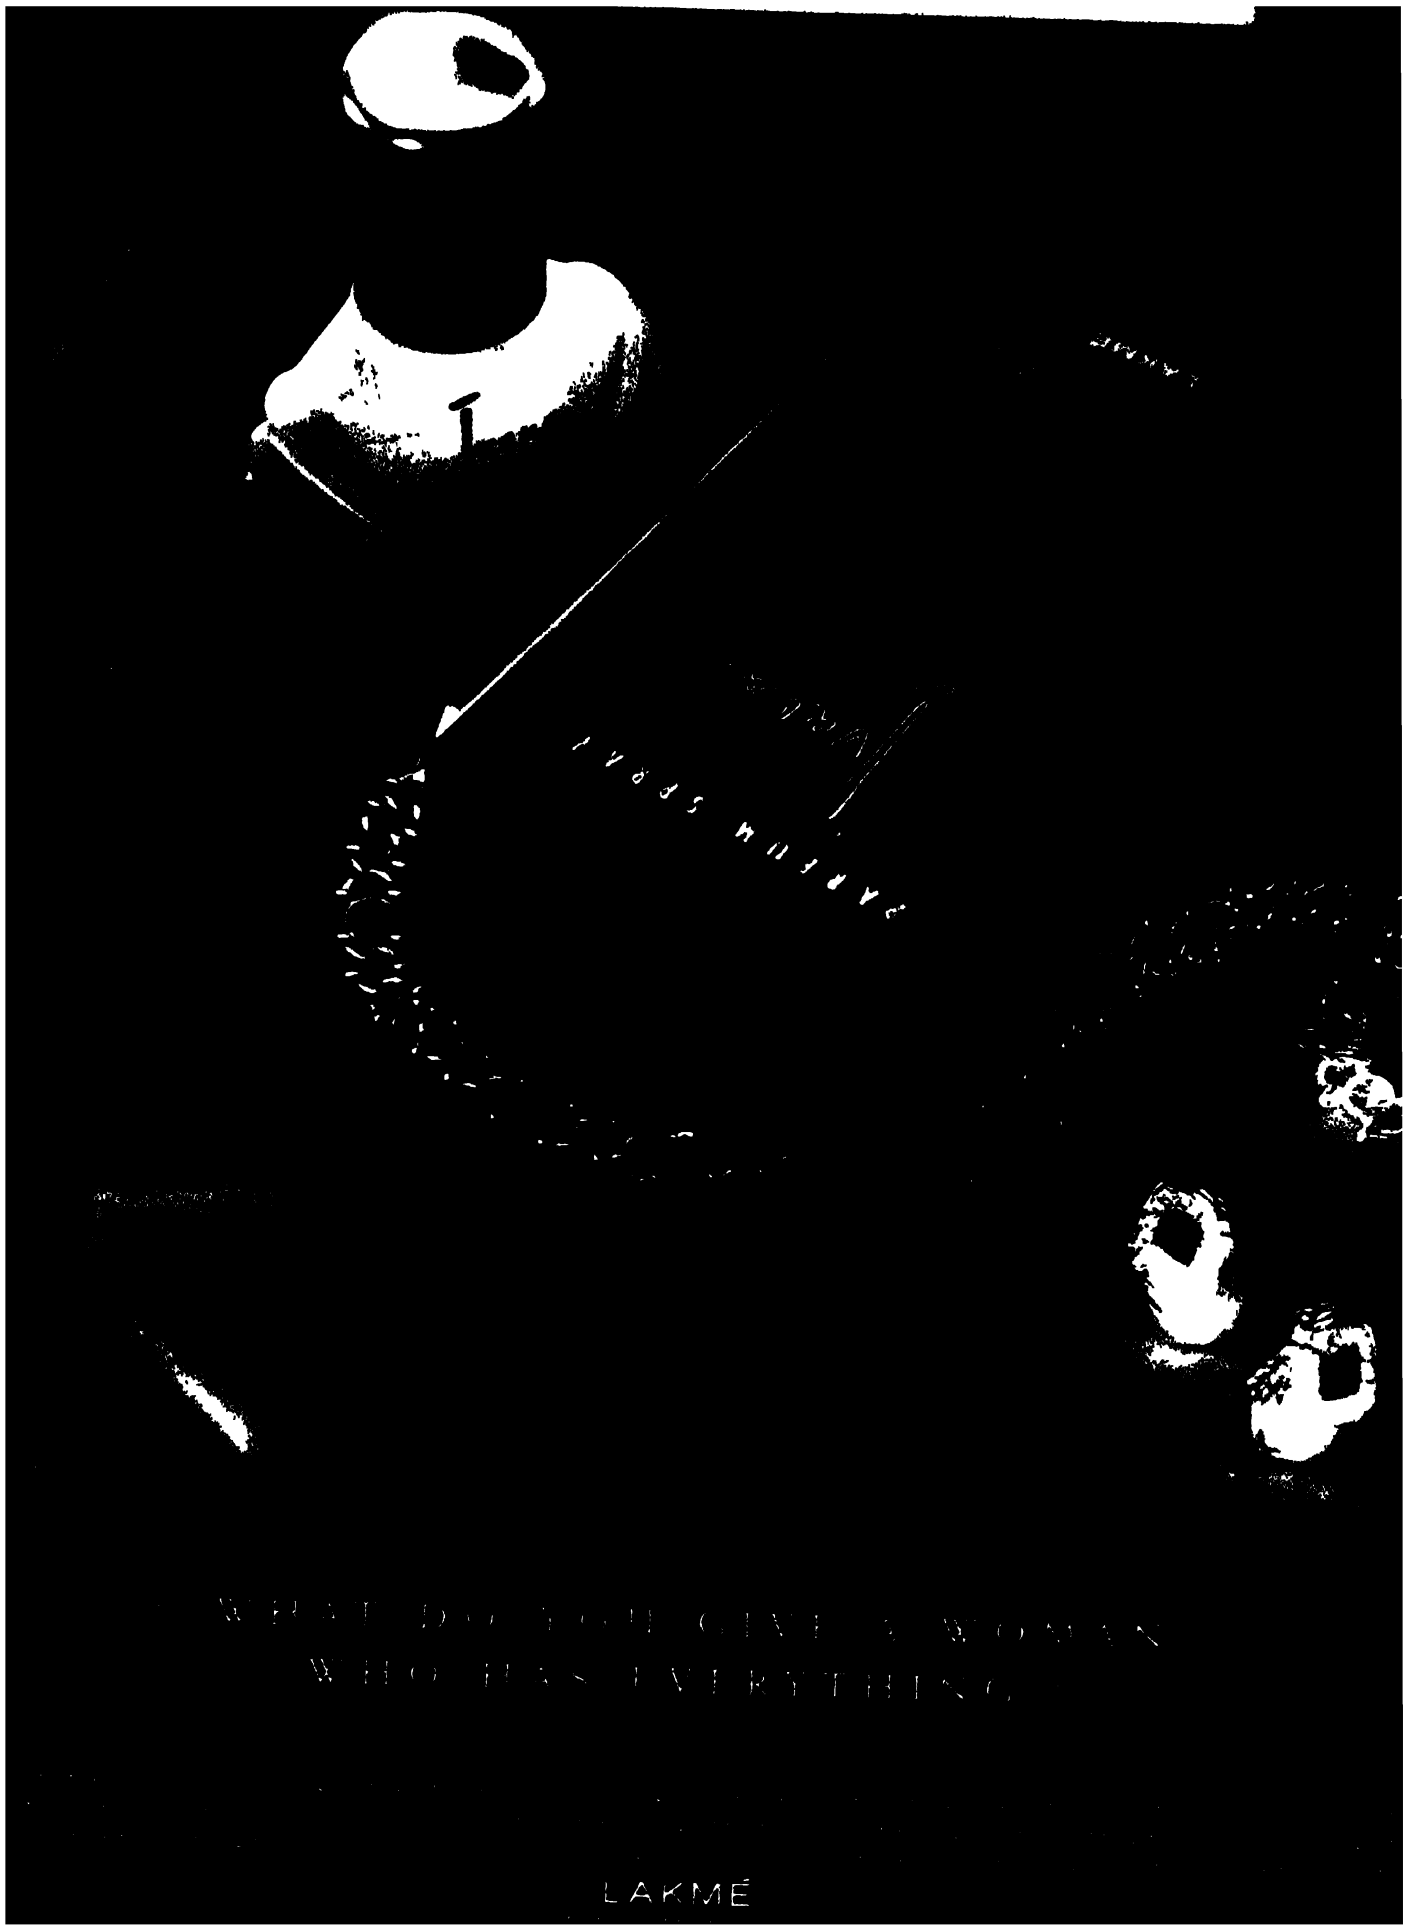
What is your idea of perfect happiness?
An ideal work atmosphere of true grit, perseverance and dedication. If it ever happens, there cannot be anything like it
What is your greatest fear?
When I am made to answer questionnaires like this. It makes me feel as if I am sitting for an examination
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
All my family members, specially my father And, of course, my teacher and mentor, 'Sir' [Kumar Roy]
What do you dislike most in others?
When people indulge in idle gossip while at work It diminishes one's sense of discipline as well as creativity.



What do you dislike most in yourself?
That I do not have enough time to read and study more about my work
What is your most precious possession?
My beliefs
What objects do you always carry?
Usually a photograph of my wife Also my sneakers which enable me to dash to the playground whenever I have time to spare and join the boys at play
What makes you most depressed?
I used to organise cultural activities in my locality along with other friends We used to sing, dance, recite and perform plays After 10 years or so, the group dispersed Now, I feel very depressed when I see those bright men and women sitting idle and whiling away their time
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
I need not look like those well endowed heroes of the silver screen
What is your favourite word?
Ishe, ki ekta — a throwback on my East Bengal roots
What is your favourite journey?
A lake in Orissa I don't remember the name A large dam, a beautiful lake with a dense jungle on the other side of the bank and a crocodile sanctuary nearby I swam up and down the lake and just escaped an attack by one such creature
What is your favourite dream?
To work hard and work well The result, if there is one, for instance, the Onida Pinnacle Award, is always like an accident
What is your nightmare?
Betrayal of trust
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
My wife Also good food, football and acting
What is your source of sustenance?
My self-confidence
On what occasions do you lie?
Never to hurt anyone
What is your greatest regret?
Nothing I have learnt something from all of them
What has been your happiest moment?
While performing on stage, we all try to capture the right nuance, the state of perfect simulation It is a rare, fleeting moment — almost ephemeral But suddenly if I am able to reach that peak of perfection, I feel very happy
What brings tears to your eyes?
Watching the poor shivering in the cold, calling out in hunger, or when they are too emotionally spent to even respond to the death of near ones

How do you relax?
Work is relaxation for me Also sleeping
What do you envy most in others?
Nothing
How would you like to be remembered?
By my work
How would you like to die?
While on stage after my last act

What do you dislike most in others?

When people indulge in idle gossip while at work. It diminishes one's sense of discipline as well as creativity

Tallying Well

■ The tête-a-tête between Shobha De and Mark Tully was very enjoyable and entertaining ('The Heart of Tully', October 15)

I would have loved the cover story more had there been some really caustic questions from De which would have provoked some equally raunchy rejoinders from Tully.
Debabrata Mohanty,
Balasore (Orissa)

■ It was a collector's item. When someone like De interviews someone like Tully the result is a heady brew.

As usual, De was not only very direct and bold, but also provocative. She targeted her questions well and Tully received them in the right spirit.
Debasish Sen,
Calcutta

■ The manner in which De distinguished the broadcaster Tully from the novelist Tully was praiseworthy.
Partha Pratim Modak,
Howrah

■ It was a sensational interview: De touched on almost every subject. The chatty style was delectable.
Nirmalendu Chakraborty,
Cooch Behar (W.B.)

Mark Tully: in love with India

■ Tully, as BBC correspondent and broadcaster living in New Delhi now for over a decade, has obviously developed a great love for this country and respect for the people.
B.N. Bose,
Calcutta

■ Could not anyone else have interviewed the irresistible Tully?
Subrata Ghosh,
Calcutta

The Other Side of Sharjah

■ Had it no association with cricket, Sharjah would have remained another petro-rich emirate attracting hordes of holidaymakers and shoppers from abroad ('Petro City', October 8).

It is amazing how the far-sightedness of one man could catapult this complacent desert city to a thriving cricketing centre.

And cricket in Sharjah means fiesta time: film-stars from India flying in, foreign tourists coming for the tournament and cricketer wives joining their husbands and adding to the glamour.

But there is the other side of Sharjah, too. Although the cricket organising committee boasts of maintaining a neutral stand, it has been observed that in any match between the two arch rivals, India and Pakistan, at the time of crucial decision making, it is the latter which is favoured.
Dipankar Koley,
Jhikra (Howrah)

Rekha: Online with Amitabh

■ Rekha would not be Rekha without her umpteen scandalous affairs and marriages ('Star Plus', September 10).

She owes a lot to Amitabh Bachchan for being what she is today. It was during her period of steamy romance with the Big B that she actually emerged as a mature individual and actress

COVER STORY

GETTING HOOKED

Is the world shrinking further with Internet becoming an obsession? Arthur J. Pais talks to Indians abroad to find out just how much it is JUST THE OTHER DAY, SUPROTIM BOSE, A CINEMA student in a small university town near Carbondale, was suddenly bugged by nostalgia — a desire to listen to the haunting songs composed by Hemant Kumar for movies like Majhli Didi and Khamoshi.

His Indian friends could not help him; they had heard Hemant Kumar songs from such films as Solva Saal and Baat Ek Raat Ki. But no luck with Majhli Didi or Khamoshi.

Bose thought of writing to his friends in India, but just for the kick of it, he posted a message on Internet

"And could you believe it," he says with a chuckle. "Within two weeks, I heard from more than 20 people who loved everything about Hemant*da*, and two of them had with them cassettes of practically every song Hemant*da* had composed "

A few days ago, he got into an argument with a friend over who had directed Sahib Bibi Aur Ghulam The friend insisted that Guru Dutt produced and directed the film, apart from acting in it But Bose thought that the actual screen credit had gone to someone else The $50 bet was settled through Internet when a movie buff in Flori-

Miheer Mafatlal: His hobby is cyber da said he had articles about the movie in which writer Abrar Alvi was identified as the director

In another small American city in the South, a 28-year-old engineer from Hyderabad posted a message on Internet saying that he is looking for an Indian bride who was raised in America "I somehow did not feel like advertising in the Indian publications here" Within a week, he got about 12 responses, three from women with Master's degrees in engineering

And in Stockdale, a medium-sized city in California, K Haridas has been wondering for a long time how best to get his two teenage children interested in Indian religions They were bored with the local Hindu temples "The priests cannot answer any of my questions" said one of his daughters

But when Haridas read in a local Indian publication that an engineering student in upstate New York city had set up a Shri Balajee temple on Internet, he encouraged his daughters to trace the engineering student.

After an hour of Internet surfing, the family got hooked to the Balajee temple "We could get a lot of interesting information about Tirupati and the meaning of so many rituals that we take for granted," he said "The Internet temple is being very helpful"

Haridas wonders why Hindu temple trustees encourage more Internet temples "There are so many Christian churches across America which have established Internet outlets to encourage the young — and in some cases the old to find out more about Christian faith"

"Hinduism, too, should make a solid effort to be in the 21st century, with the help of Internet," Haridas says His thoughts are echoed by Balamurali Krishna Ambati, the 17-year-old whizkid doctor "The faster the temple authorities get some young people to propagate Hinduism through Internet, the better it is for our community Otherwise, in a few years, we will find hardly any young people in our temples They have been thoroughly alienated because their parents cannot discuss Hinduism and had begun to feel that Hinduism does not really matter in a predominantly Christian country"

For thousands of Indians, particularly those who are in their twenties, and who live in small American cities where no Indian stores exist or opportunities to socialise with young Indians are remote, the Internet provides big help

"To place an announcement on the Internet bulletin board costs nothing," says Radhika Shankar, a writer for Th

Houston Chronicle "But you will have to pay for the time when you begin screening the response That may work out to be $3-$4 for about 10 minutes."

But, chatlines could cost $25 for an hour "It is amazing to get into one of the chatlines involving Indians in American," says Vijay Rao A few weeks ago he got into a chatline that discussed the musical legacy of R.D Burman "I got out after an hour, and poorer by about $30," he says "But there were some hardcore fans who were prepared to go on for hours They had just begun to discuss who was a better composer, father S D Burman or the son"

On a more serious level, about 20 Indian students started India Net about a year ago, to write letters to newspaper editors, state and national legislators, and fellow Indians, and correct what the students felt was the distorted news American media are unwittingly supplying

Last month, about 60 students and their elderly wellwishers met in Chicago to map the next steps for India Net

"The cyberspace technology can be used to our advantage a lot," remarked Venkat Krishnan, one of the founders of India Net "With hardly any investment except our time, we have been able to send letters to Congressmen telling them about what is happening in Kashmir, for instance And a lot of Congressmen have written to us"

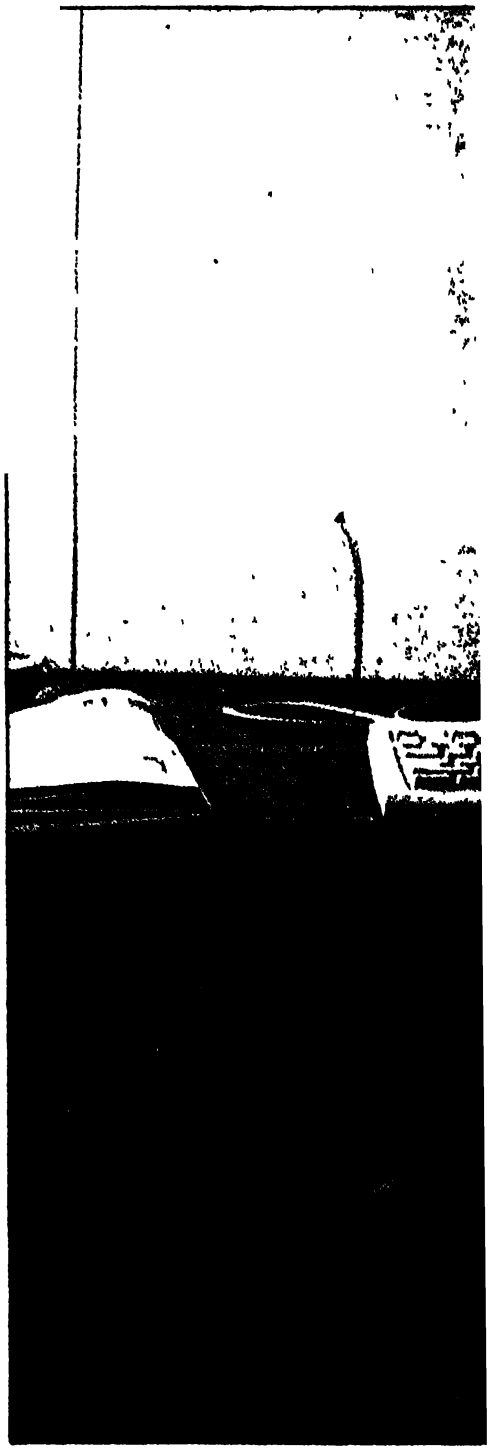
India Net plans to recruit more than 500 volunteers across America in the next three years

Meanwhile, thousands of Indian-American high school students are getting hooked to Internet—and concerned parents wring their hands helplessly at community conferences while discussing the Internet craze among the teenagers

Some parents are worried about the rising costs of Internet chatlines set up by their teen children One New York doctor, who makes about $200,000 a year, was upset that his daughter blew up $200 in Internet chats "Just because I am making a lot of money does not mean my child should blow it up," he said

Another doctor said that his daughter had been using Internet chatline to complain to other teenagers that she had not been allowed to date

"I understand some people are using Internet to set up sex dialogue and there is a lot of pornography aimed at teenagers," said one father



But chatlines can be therapeutic, too Several teenagers told this writer that baring their souls and minds over Internet helps them ease a lot of pain resulting from their bi-cultural homes

"We are often confused about identity," says a teenager "We are eternally worried about our parents' attitudes about dating, marriage, and letting us decide our own careers"

She adds "Discussing these issues over the Internet often get us good results and suggestions Of course, we have to deal with some crank or irresponsible people" Though certain etiquette is to be followed while using the chatlines, it does not mean that a crank cannot get your address—and start writing abusive letters A teenager got a letter through her e-mail which said, "Dotheads Cow-lovers go back to India"

Said a teenager "Certainly some redhead or member of a hate group wrote that letter But such responses are rare

"On the whole, Internet costs far less than going to a shrink"

Vijay Mukhi: Cyber guru

Yahoo was the famous yell of Shammi Kapoor some 30 years ago. Today it is his cyber search engine Shameem Akthar spoke to him and other cybercelebs about what lesser mortals are missing

Gizmo devotee Shammi Kapoor is making waves In cyberspace Since he went public over his unusual and, by his own admission, unexpected interest, in surfing the Internet his phone line is jammed by requests for interviews

These days he tries, rather weakly, to sidestep media petitions by handing out printouts on all that he could possibly say on the subject But we managed to buttonhole this recently-appointed chairman of Internet Users Club of India in his cubbyhole, surrounded by his beloved gadgets.

He submitted, rather morosely, to be subjected to another photo-interview session The stern facade crumbles when he begins to talk about his new addiction Gone, he smiles triumphantly, are the days when he whiled away his afternoon nursing a drink, two or more No longer does he puff his afternoons away over unhealthy cigarettes.

Today he is happy when his grandchildren clamber on to his knee, eager to snatch the electronic mouse from his hand to zip through the exotic world of Japanese landscapes Or art-scapes that reveal the zany creativity of painter Vincent Van Gogh He is discovering worlds that his many film-shooting trips abroad never exposed him to

"It's as if a whole new world has opened up for me Every minute I am discovering something Things one never knew existed," says the Kapoor, rolling his magnetic green-screen eyes

'It's as if a whole new world has opened up for me. Every minute I am discovering something. Things one never knew existed,' says Shammi Kapoor, rolling his magnetic green-screen eyes that mesmerised our mothers, in astonishment

India's first CyberCafe at The Leela Kempinski

Gaurav Petkar

Pritish Nandy, creator of CyberCafe

that mesmerised our mothers, in astonishment And no, he is not faking this for a shoot This look of enchanted surprise is for real He is still reeling at this assault of unending discoveries

His interest in gadgets has been no secret He has, he laughs, always been pottering around nuts and bolts, trying to patch together his TVs and phones through make-it-yourself kits He stumbled into the charmed world of 'eWorld' when he window shopped at London's Macintosh showrooms His niece, Ritu Kapoor's easy felicity with a Mac Plus stirred his curiosity, too He discovered that losing his way, even blundering around by trial and error, in the vast, wide cyberspace was not a frightening experience after all He knows just how that wide-eyed child exploring the Never-Never land felt

And does the man spout computer jargon? In compuspeak, he entered Internet through a ramp on an online service provided by eWorld If these words leave you cold, it is time you learnt what they meant, advises Kapoor Unless you want to be left behind times by a world whizzing through cyberspace

His one regret is that there is no one in filmdom to share his cerebral hobby Shah Rukh Khan may surf the net only when shooting schedules permit, while in the related world of theatre personalities Alyque Padamsee might display his dexterity on cyberpathway by participating on Internet panels But as a lone showbiz surfer Shammi Kapoor has to endure the flashlights now, if only to promote the cause

The cause, at the moment, is to popularise the concept of Internet so that the intimidated novice learns to click on to cyberspace without the usual anxiety of a beginner And thereby to increase the demands by net-users And thus coax the Videsh Sanchar Nigam Limited, which connects most Indian Internets now, into providing world-class service that will finally

We, too, will soon be there, predicts Vijay Mukhi, the man behind the Internet scene in Bombay. With a formidable list of 71 books on computers credited to his authorship, this cybercitizen is busy promoting Internet's cause

propel India into that century that Rajiv Gandhi only dreamt of

Also in the pipeline (sorry, cyberline) are plans to introduce Internet booths that will allow access to anybody who wants to log in for any information he wants from anywhere in the world

Kapoor is no corporate boss bustling over his financial empire or a heart-in-hand broker watching the scrip movement online He shuffles beatifically along on his search engine, Yahoo, following his fancy He no longer yodels (as in those filmi days of his), but excitement does grip him when he stumbles into celebrity chatlines while on Yahoo

Who does he bump into cyberspace but American President Bill Clinton? "I know Michael Jackson and Sandra Bullock have their chat sites Because of the time differences I never wake up early enough for these encounters" But this surfer has had a surfeit of celebrities He is rediscovering the world of ordinary people "I have made friends with people from around the world and some just down the lane We discuss everything," he smiles, humming hit songs from his films as he hunches before the colourful screen

Some sites are free, while Kapoor's pay site, Yahoo, has been created by two bored American college boys who wanted to while their summer away online A hobby that has transformed them into millionaires today

His 10-month tryst with cyberworld has redefined the entire concept of life for this 65-year-old actor His only regret lies in not having sufficient textbook knowledge of the computer world But the Yahoo man believes in the better-late-than-never code for life and has stockpiled his lair with manuals and books on the new screen in his life — MacWorld, MacUsers and Macromedia Animation Studio are some of the titles that have replaced the Irving Wallaces, Tennessee Williams, John O'Haras on his bookshelf

"Each stage in a man's life has its own phase, its own interests I used to be a voracious reader But each generation has a taste for only some brand of authors None of the authors from this generation interests me — the last author I picked up was John Grisham His books, The Firm and The Rainmaker were written in the style I loved But there are no others like him, so this current interest has filled the gap left

"Shikar I have left behind And golf is no longer the game of the old It has become competitive This hobby of mine makes me feel like a kid with a new toy Everything excites me I feel as if I am walking down the Louvre A whole new world has opened up," says this star of yesteryear whose favourite laurel today is the one delivered by VSNL chief B K. Syngal, who publicly appreciated Kapoor's net involvement

Now he can create movies and put them online — which he does He has linked his tinbox-sized Sony television, which glints with the typical arrogance of latest models, from where he can download his family movies or the channel programmes that grip his movie-driven interest He also feeds in scanned portraits of his beloved wife Geeta Bali But all this bending over the keyboard (he also has a laptop that accompanies him on trips) has given him the RSI syndrome

That peculiar throb on the knuckles that chronic computer-users get

But industrialist Miheer Mafatlal, another computer fiend, has learnt to work around this by taking constant breaks between cyberchats He rotates his arms to bring back circulation, walks around for a while

Not many industrialists have his in-depth knowledge of computers He amalgamates business with pleasure And his involvement with the Internet club is, he acknowledges, definitely linked to business opportunism "Where the colour of money is concerned it is all the same to me whether it is the dollar or the rupee For me it is also professional interest We plan to go into Internet in a big way, and are thinking of strategic alliances with international groups because that is the cheaper way of doing business But India is the market that we are targeting and my hobby-cum-profession gives me a certain edge"

His affair with computers started a quarter decade ago and he dates his wide area networking to his stint in the US Internet for this cyberwalker is too slow He prefers skidding breathlessly through eWorld Only a fraction of his electronic time is spent on online chats He browses on the World Wide Web where he has started hosting his own room called Cyber Spice Cafe He is also a regular 'visitor' to chatrooms of Digital Justice and the Digital Bill of Rights His lay interest in legal issues is stoked by the cerebral chats where people from across the world pitch in with their side of the arguments

On the Digital Bill of Rights chatroom cybertalkers have chucked the existing American Bill of Rights right out of the computer screen and have rewritten it to suit the rights of cyberusers At stake is the freedom of online users who, it is feared, may be denied permission to log-in where they will

It is not only the question of cyberporn sites which, moral-keepers on the net fear will wreck young, impressionable voyeurs who sit glued before 'blue' messages For a cybercitizen boundaries have become passe, asserts Mafatlal

It is not only the question of cyberporn sites which, moral-keepers on the net fear will wreck young, impressionable voyeurs who sit glued before 'blue' messages. For a cybercitizen boundaries have become passe

With promoters like him Internet users in India might just catch up with the rest of the world next year At least, that is what Mafatlal predicts And then, there will be no looking back Already we have a lot of catching up to do This month's Boston conference on the subject was held to toast the manner in which the new world of Internet has left the old world of computers behind

And how netkid Marc Anderessen, whose Netscape browser (an Internet software) has left whizkid Bill Gates and his Microsoft Windows '95 straggling behind

We, too, will soon be there, predicts Vijay Mukhi, the man behind the Internet scene in Bombay With a formidable list of 71 books on computers credited to his authorship, this cybercitizen is busy promoting Internet's cause Apart from innumerable panel discussions on his pet topic

Mukhi also initiates faltering, wide-eyed novices into the World Wide Web by offering them free access and online training

His involvement in his dream project, of propelling India for its place beside the rest of the world on the electronic frontier, is more than a mere addiction He observes quietly, "I wonder how I could have lived without all this all my life. Soon surfing on the cyberspace will become an integral part of everyone's life as essential as electricity One just cannot do without it"

His only message to the uninitiated is "Hook on You don't know what you are missing."

And this net joke is just to drive home his point. It goes What is O.J Simpson's password on the net? Slash, Slash Escape

No laughs? Then it is time one seriously got down to working on one's cyberdictionary

Samita Bhatia surfs this new source of information technology to find out why it is addictive

A fond and indulgent smile spread slowly across Ankur Bhatia's face The 23-year-old director of Amadeus India, the first Computerised Reservation System (CRS) to enter the country, had received a letter over the Internet from his brother in London "He is asking about our dog and is enquiring if he is well," he explained, a trifle amused

Meanwhile, Aniruddha (11) and Pradyumna (7), sat with their father Jairam Ramesh scanning the Net for Enid Blyton titles When they met with little success, Ramesh, former advisor to the Prime Minister and now TV personality and columnist, decided to log-in to literature on neem "We were working on a story for Business Breakfast on the neem controversy and Internet helped with instant access to information on the status of patents on neem," says Ramesh who finds the Net very handy in accessing technical literature

He scans the Net whenever he can for new World Bank publications and is looking forward to the time when Indian companies can be logged-in to for financial data and market shares

Perhaps, the most interesting site that Nakul Anand, vice president and general manager of Delhi's Welcomgroup Maurya Sheraton, has surfed is taking a guided tour of the White House, the official residence of the President of the United States! Anand, the motivating factor behind the Rs 1 5 crore Cyber Club at the hotel, says, "It was fascinating to hear the voice of the most powerful man in the world guide you through his residence One really surfs the Internet in quite an unstructured manner When you are seeking something special, all you have to do is zoom into it The information seems unlimited, and it's more out of curiosity that I go into areas like preview Hollywood films"

There are other hip Internauts who simply love to learn every strange (and, perhaps, useless wart) of the Internet and even enjoy memorising unpronounceable commands and options These keyboard-happy Internauts simply revel in the fact that technology's giant leap has made computers interactive and more useful to ordinary mortals

Bhatia says of surfers like himself, "They love to surf all the cool things that one can achieve on the Internet"

Internauts are discovering everyday, that opposed to a popular misconception that you had to be a geek to dabble in computers, the Internet is extremely user-friendly and interactive Besides, it heralds an era where the world will — and has already to an extent — shrunk to the size of a room

"You can even read a book on the Internet!" says Anand He has browsed through a gamut of texts on the Net, ranging from the works of William Shakespeare to those of Bill Gates Says a fascinated Anand, "Some files, I believe, are voluminous such as the entire Moby Dick"

Anand finds the Net fascinating "Now I have access to so much ready information which was simply not possible earlier" Anand looks at the Internet for information, entertainment and communications "For a hotelier these three aspects are critical Our houseguests are surfing the Net for special information"

These computer buffs talk at length about the vistas that the Internet opens up to them Want to comment on anything about the American government that you approve of? Or disapprove of? (For, it is too soon to attack the Indian government yet) Just drop a line to the President of the US And while you are at it you could also drop in a note to the US Vice President The address is simple enough — President White House Government and Vice President White House Government

Some like Hans Brown who was caught surfing at Cyber Club, described the Net tongue-in-cheek as the world's best resource for "work avoidance" He added, "The fundamental principle that rules the Internet says that when you really, really have to get a report out this afternoon, first you must play Tetris!"

For those with a very ticklish funny bone the Internet is ideal when you want to hear some pithy jokes, for everyone needs a new joke now and then The Internet has long had a newsgroup called 'rec humour' in which people post what they consider to be their funniest joke

Ankur Bhatia Scanning the Net

Indeed, much of what is there consists of complaints that a joke is not funny, and then more complaints that the complaint was not funny!

Because the Internet spans the world, many languages other than English are spoken on it So if you are interested you could try French or German and pick up the vocabulary

Back to serious issues that professionals log in to Surfing the Net is not just addictive, but also a leisurely pursuit Professionals like K K Venugopal, senior constitutional lawyer and president of the SAARC Lawyers Association, essentially logs-in to his VSNL connection for specific information

Venugopal's interest in the Net dates back two years and the onus of getting him hooked goes to his sons "My sons — one of whom is a computer software engineer in San Francisco and the other who is doing his doctorate in Harvard - - made me realise how communication has been simplified through the Net

"On the Internet we can very easily access US Supreme Court judgments as they are dictated in the court which some World Wide Web (WWW) servers are loaded with Hitherto, we had access to edited versions only," says Venugopal "Now lawyers can actually communicate with law schools internationally, or even with groups of lawyers who share similar interests

Amadeus' Bhatia, on the other hand, suggests a site for surfers where they can fast-forward into the past, as it were He explains that a wealth of historical documents and resources await the user on the Internet "Though I haven't been surfing it, the University of Kansas has an interactive service for historians, and that is really something great "

Over to the Cyber Club

Bhatia who is working on establishing a stronghold of Amadeus in the Indian market, targeting over 600 member agents by January, takes time out to surf the Net Worldwide weather information, clips of the latest blockbusters and latest pictures of Hollywood actresses are available You can even see a man landing on the moon, he reveals "Essentially, I use the Net for communication, specially since most people abroad are on the Internet It takes all of 10 seconds to transmit messages worldwide Next I'd like to get a site on the Net where we can put out our services "

Spending an average of four hours a week surfing the Net, Anand updates himself on international company profiles, specially when the hotel has some important guests due to check-in, international conferences and seminars held at the hotel also require Anand to keep himself abreast of information on the participating companies To the Cyber Club it is then

But the world can shrink to the size of your computer screen only if the system works Most subscribers of the Net on the VSNL, complain bitterly about poor connections Jairam Ramesh agrees with the other users "Connectivity is a serious problem It's easy to get a connection at the time I'm sleeping and it's very difficult and even next to impossible when I'm active! I also find that the graphics that we get are really not very good Something obviously needs to be done "

Venugopal's office, on the other hand, makes innumerable calls to the VSNL offices after hours of laborious trying for connections fail him

But even as VSNL gets its act together, log-in Internauts suggest for a bit of gossip, if nothing else As gossip is one of the most ancient human activities, the Internet does not ignore it

The Internet, because it is largely populated by humans, is as gossipy a place as any For small gossip, use the talk command, which enables you to type back and forth to another person on the Net But for serious gossip, online gossip network — Internet Relay Chat (IRC) enables people from all over the world to gossip 24 hours a day about nothing in particular

There are other hip Internauts who simply love to learn every strange (and, perhaps, useless wart) of the Internet and even enjoy memorising unpronounceable commands and options

And Pritish Nandy, this time of India's first cybercafe fame, has the last word (the first, actually)..

Wherever I go these days, it is cyber, cyber, cyber Everyone is talking cyber, trying out cyber, dreaming cyber Cyber is the latest fad on the world media scene and some of the clever newspapers — among them, The Telegraph, a newspaper always prescient, always ahead of its time — have already started carrying cybercolumns, cybersections and cybersupplements, apart from carrying regular stories about Internet and the new kid on the block Netscape, whose stocks have set Wall Street on fire and whose 22-year-old owner is giving sleepless nights to an already outdated, out of breath Bill Gates

So much so that the usually cautious Gates has already announced that Microsoft will now concentrate, for the next 365 days, only on Internet and developing Internet-based products To hell with everything else! Sony, too, has abandoned its obsession with television and audio to announce that early 1996 will see the launch of Sony computers that will try to reap the worldwide move towards cyber

Cybermedia, cyberentertainment, cybereducation, cybershopping and cyberlifestyle

The CyberCafe — India's first — which two of my Internet-savvy colleagues, Vijay Mukhi and Kanakasabapathy Pandyan, and I opened at The Leela Kempinkski on the first of this month, is overcrowded with visitors till two in the morning and Captain Krishnan Nair, chairman of the Leela Group, and an ardent media-watcher, who shared in the excitement of our creating it, can scarcely believe the huge media attention it's drawing

Celebrities roll in at all times of the day and night and the pretty hostesses who give them a guided tour of cyberspace are already clued on to some of the most exciting information hotspots

Darbari Seth wants to know the latest moves on the New York stock exchange Kanakasabapathy Pandyan helps him along Dom Moraes wants to find out more about an 18th century English poet called Thomas Chatterton Vijay Mukhi delves into the world of literary history with him Rameshwar Broota and Manu Parekh want to see what's on at the Tate Art Gallery next season Rajni Nair assists them Anupam Kher wants to know the precise difference between an AK-47 and an AK-56 Internet whiz Miheer Mafatlal shows him where to locate the expertise

Secret archives open up The Fort Knox of research is unlocked The latest information reaches you long before TV and the press report it Friends are made in chat rooms in cyberspace, where barriers of age, sex, caste, religion, nationality cease to exist and only ideas matter Ideas, images, facts And the sheer delight of accusing them, sharing them, blowing huge, gaping holes into them It is a challenge like none other The challenge of frontier media

What will Internet achieve? What can it achieve? These are the two questions I hear all the time Particularly, from curious journalists and young people who are the most anxious to know its potential

Newspapers and magazines look like heavy plodders in today's frenzied world and the very idea of cutting down huge, beautiful forests to feed newsprint factories revolts most young people who are environment-savvy TV, on the other hand, looks like an option for morons, with the lowest common denominator dictating public taste No wonder, there is a frenzied search on for the intelligent media option One that Rupert Murdoch cannot subvert One that the government cannot control under some pretext or the other

And that, right now, is cyber

No wonder, everyone swears by it No wonder, everyone wants to find out how to access it, corporatise it, control it But can they? Is it possible to do so? Can ESPN and Prime Sports battle it out in Cyberspace? Can Sony and Zee ever hope to reach millions of intelligent homes through an interactive cyber/cable system that can do your homework for you, shop, play, gamble and make money through securitised transactions? Can ABCL spot your talent on your homepage and make a star out of you?

Can HMV and Tips, Venus and

Time assess your musical skills through cybersampling and put you on their bestselling repertoire? Will Jonathan Cape read your poems and send you a book contract for half a million dollars? Can you consult with the world's best doctors about your grandaunt's gout? Can you compare the astrological predictions of Linda Goodman and Sushil Chaturvedi? Can you play bridge with Omar Sharief across continents, date Claudia Schiffer and see Isi Miyake's fall collection before newspapers publish one boring black-and-white picture and a 30-word reportage on page 19?

Can this column, read by only 5 million Indians reach 300 million, in different languages? Can you fix a date in cyberspace? Can you get married to someome thousands of miles away?

The answer in each case is, Yes

If you don't believe it, come to the cyberCafe when any one of us are around and we will show you how

Yes, virtually anything is possible That is the magic of cyber What you dream can be easily realised — as long as you know how to translate your idea into cyberreality It's a young, ambitious, ruthlessly driven medium — desperate to meet every challenge, every opportunity ahead That is why, sited at the cutting edge of technology, it can be your (and my) route to freedom

No more jute barons, jhoot barons No more editors, managing editors, executive editors, senior editors, associate editors, joint editors, news editors views editors Nor more producers, executive producers, channel producers, directors, creative directors, temperamental cinematographers No more megalomaniac media maaliks In cyberspace, we are all equals

Write what you want to Draw what you want to Capture on celluloid or magnetic tape or CD-Rom what you want to And log it in If what you have to offer is clever, challenging and innovative, there will be millions of takers But if you are just plain stupid, that too will show up No one will come back to your site again

When you are in an e-world chat room, no one knows who you are You could be a lovelorn Princess Di or a sex worker from Kamathipura You could be a six-year-old schoolboy with a devastating sense of humour or Dan Quayle with dyslexia. You can be David Hockney or Abu Nidal, Amartya Sen or the Happy Hooker, Stephen Hawking or just another anonymous nerd from MIT Who gives a damn! As long as you have something to offer, there are people ready to listen, and join you, may be help you along

What we need is interactive knowledge so that the pace of change can quicken. Information can lend power to everyone, big and small. The idea has become the crux of all enterprise. Nothing else matters. Not capital. Not factories

But if you are just another feckless yukkie roaming around in cyberspace and hoping to be entertained — as mindlessly as you have been entertained by, say, television — you will be as friendless at the end of it all as you were at the very beginning That's the fun of it all You are. Therefore you exist As Descartes would say

If you find me confusing, let me confess that I am Logical thinking is now boring and out What the new media is looking for is whacky, lateral moves Ideas that can change the world over night Factories are getting obsolete quicker Capital is earning less and less returns Technology is being so swiftly rewritten that the textbooks have shorter and shorter print runs What we need is interactive knowledge so that the pace of change can quicken Information can lend power to everyone, big and small

The idea has become the crux of all enterprise

Nothing else matters Not capital Not factories Certainly not labour These are all as obsolete as Baba Marx

Knowledge has replaced Money It has emerged as the new capital for societies like ours that are breaking out of old-fashioned and predictable, slow growth patterns

If cyber continues to grow at its current pace, the thin dividing line between TVs and computers will swiftly vanish, as will the print medium Everyone will talk to each other freely, openly, interactively The mouse will be your bus, your car, your train, your plane, your phone, your friendly neighbourhood genie Your computer will be your newspaper, your magazine, your movie theatre, your interactive bookshop where you can browse through the latest arrivals, your neighbourhood supermarket from where you can buy any goods, any services at any time of the day, in any currency that you find convenient

No MNC can price its medicines, soaps and toiletries differently in different markets without being instantly caught out No government can commit human rights violations without the news reaching everyone everywhere There will be no unreported in-custody deaths No Nellies No Bofors No Enrons Every misdemeanour will be instantly out

No editor, no media maalik can kill any story No politician can hide his misdemeanours any more One man and one machine can take on the might of the entire Establishment and win

Yes, information is crucial It makes all the difference between winning and losing in the marketplace as well as on the stock exchanges And, now, with the coming of cyber, more and more people can send out, receive, process information without being harassed by power elites That is why we need more and more people on the Internet, why a government like ours should encourage more and more gateways to open up so that the hiatus between the North and the South is breached and knowledge moves to where people can use it more effectively, more politically

And, above all, more sensibly and equitably

That is why, within the next few months, you will see us moving at a phenomenal pace All over India The CyberCafe is only a beginning It is just an information hotspot, a cafeteria A declaration of intent Many more things will happen that will make TV look about as interesting as last night's dinner leftovers As the world of cyber opens With new sites, new concepts that seem almost magical, reaching out and grabbing the potential of media in a manner that would have seemed unimaginable till now Just wait Wait for six months No more

Remember I predicted this

Just as I had predicted the TV boom exactly a year before it actually happened ■

Standards of IMAGE

Beneath the logo and beyond the letterhead lie the creation of the corporate personality, the company character the institutional reputation What does it take to establish corporate culture or build a corporate identity programme? Corporate identity is not just a matter of intuition, but is something that is carefully contrived and developed

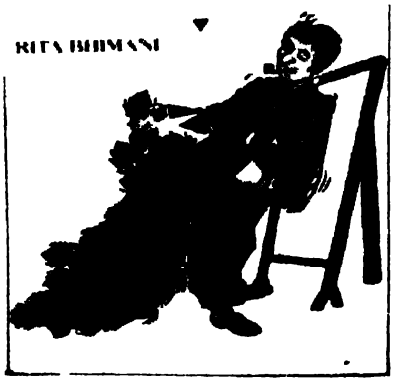
Mostly About Image

A flag, or a pennant, is a country's most conspicuous cue Most of us Indians have seen the evolution of the national flag from the time it had a chakra in the middle to its current form and it has always been dinned into us that the colours stand for various qualities that we ought to be emulating

But beyond that, a flag, whether it is the tricolour, or the stars and stripes or the red circle on a white background, is something that does not strike the average person as being a work of painstaking research How can the student of history forget, for instance, the searing effects of the blood red swastika on the flag of Hitler's Germany, which Albert Speer, Hitler's chief architect, described as being more effective than any flag "divided into three stripes of colour"

But for even these stripes of visual effect and nationalistic drama, there is a large chunk of expenditure on the conceptualisation and execution

The most recent instance of redesigning a flag has come out of the developments in South Africa The process is not simply one that concerns a flag for the new post-aparthied South Africa, but is part of a total search to possibly strike a new chord amongst a populace seeking to get international approval in the same measure as they are trying to bring about amicable multi-party rule



Vexilologists had to contend with 700 proposed designs for a South African flag, some of which were outright rejects like Bart Simpson at the beach, or a banana and an assault rifle substituting for the hammer and sickle Reporting on this, the Los Angeles Times-Washington Post News Service said that when the Commission of National Symbols recommended a new national motto, coat of arms and national flag, it was the national anthem that proved to be the most difficult to choose There were 119 songs submitted in 11 of the country's major languages So the Commission proposed that the south Africans sing two national anthems until a new government is elected The latest development is to retain The Voice, the existing anthem and add the Black nationalist hymn, God Bless Africa, as a co-anthem

Finding a consensus for the flag has not been easy, either Commission chairman Elize Botha said "It's clear that a flag is a national symbol is an extremely emotional issue We began to regard our work as an inquiry, very wide-ranging inquiry, into the hearts and minds of the people of South Africa"

The new 'Flag of Transition' that has emerged was ripped to shreds by khaki-clad demonstrators, while the average man on the street was not at all impressed by it Replacing the orange, white and blue tricolour which has been around since 1928, the new one has six colours Green and gold and black and red and white and blue, the graphic impact is of a 'Y' lying on its side It is not an easy process to effect visual change

But quite apart from the hallowed institution of the national flag, it is the international airlines which are probably playing a much larger role in carving out an identity for their country of origin than ever before Whether it be their colour combinations, their logos, or the whole face they present through massive advertising in all media, airlines have made a fine art of image creation

However, with the large number of airlines competing not just for air space, or for media space, but for nicking out a little niche in customer consciousness, the problem no longer is one of blitzkrieg advertising, but of establishing a personality It is an identity that has the two-fold job of not only projecting an international airline in all its efficiency and epicurean claims, but also in maintaining the special flavour and character of the country of origin

This is where even something as basic as a symbol can be a crucial identity factor Look what happened to Air-India when, a few years ago, it went into a multi-million dollar exercise to change over to supposed contemporaniety The maharajah long established, and an endearing figure who could be made to do or say what no sterile symbol would ever do was suddenly dethroned and a costly and non-passionate sun made its appearance in his stead, draining all warmth and wit from the airline's identity Thankfully, the maharajah is back bestriding the advertising cocking a snook at all those who believed that they could susbstitute today's formless images with yesterday's timeless personality

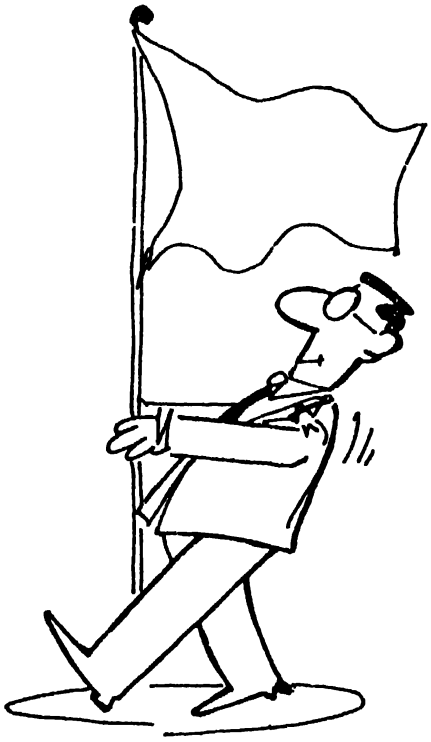
Identity is Ingrained Image

The creation of identity through a logo is just one pulchritudinous part of corporate personality The most visible part But relating identity to logo is like referring to a person's name without alluding to his other characteristics Companies all too often do a one-time expenditure on the creation of a new logo with its itinerant advertising back-up But once done, there is never a thought for how that company should continue to be embedded in the public mind



The reason why we are embarking on the finer semantic interpretations of corporate image, identity, culture and even soul, is because today's corporations are competing in an environment when, with the numerous brands on offer and the multifaceted operations that a single company is going into, there is a need to assert a distinct personality for each corporation

Sometimes, it is easy enough with the founders, or strong chief executives steering the way in which companies behave, react, interact and even retort when pushed to the wall in times of wrongdoing Most Indians will always be quick to cite the examples of the Air-India maharajaah as giving the airline its special character and even the links with its creator and with JRD are easily recalled and established Sometimes, a brand overrides its company of origin

Speaking on this subject to the Public Relations Society of India some years ago, Subhas Ghosal, a top calibre advertising professional and philosopher of that calling, talked about the fact that when an organisation has a complex mass of business or brands, or both, the creation of the value system, and, therefore, the emergence of the corporate personality is much more complicated

It is easy enough for an agency to be given a brief to project a strong image of a company before a share issue, for instance Our business magazines and newspapers have seen thousands of attractive advertisments which emerge in a series to air the competences

and the charcter of a corporation In many cases, it may be possible to make an immediate impact, in most instances, consumer recall can be poor and the fundamental point about a company missed unless solid research has gone into the projection, and management themselves have thought about how they wish to be seen and known

Without citing any specific names, there is an instance we have culled where a corporation used to like being seen as a diversified one as it was in four distinct businesses Following a detailed analysis, though, it transpired that the strengths of this particular company lay, not in its multifarious activities, but in its competence as a distribution company, which is how it had garnered its profits in the first place

We find instances every day around us Banks that want to project their Indian-ness rather than their transnationalism, steel companies which have focused so much on their humanitarianism that they cockily proclaim that they also make steel, cigarette giants that now have One Hope, One Vision, the fertiliser company that sticks to the basics of saying Our Roots are Strong, the glass bottle manufacturer which Makes Technology Pay

But there are several companies which continue to indulge in platitudes, often using phrases that not only do not fit in their product, but which are obviously done for impact There is the paper and cement company which talks about taking giant steps across (with poor Bata limping in its slipstream no doubt!) the capacitor manufacturer who dreams of Turning Confidence into Success (putting tutorial colleges in the shade), or the credit card company which Makes It Easy (as does that well-known toy manufacturer), or the very well known line of that diversified company crows The Best Means of Growth Come from Within (all pregnant women beware you have competition!) And with a large number of companies in hot pursuit of excellence, you wonder that our industrial growth does not outstrip that of many developed nations

Germane to the discussion is how corporate personality or identity cannot be flung on like a shawl, but needs deeper contemplation Otherwise, a corporate mission becomes mere lip service, in the same manner as corporate intentions can misfire, if there were well-thought-out intentions at all

There are many consultancies today which have been formed just to deal with corporate image and identity — a vast and fascinating subject which holds challenges in equal measure for designer and strategy sifter alike -- quite apart from the recipient, the corporation, which can get the full benefit of professional personality build-up That is, if it has the will, the heart to spend on a good identity programme and the innate oomph to actually make it stand apart ■

Ferns in Foliage

At the bottom of the hill there is a small rippling stream, its water almost hidden by the bright green, tangled growth along its course It is only by its sound as it chatters over the pebbles, that we become aware of it Here we came across many plants that delight to grow in such places water-mint, wild strawberries, wood sorrel, orchids, violets and dandelions, and a forest of ferns

The first thing one notices is a beautiful group of ferns growing almost to the water This is the Lady Fern, whose broad fronds must be quite four to five feet high, a delicate plant, frail and almost transparent in the fineness of its foliage, and looking so tender that you would think the sun and wind would almost scorch or shrivel it up But the abundant supply of flowing water keeps these ferns cool and fresh

When the frosts of winter come, the fronds will crumple up into a heap of brown fragments But their strength has by that time returned into the thick clump of roots to be stored and used for a still finer group of fronds next year

In the moist parts of any forest there are sure to be several other kinds of ferns such as the Male Fern, with its strong, upright fronds looking like a large green shuttlecock three feet high One of the commonest of Indian ferns is the maidenhair which grows along the west coast and in the Himalayan foothills During the monsoon, it can be found on almost every wall and rock a delicate, tender fern, easily torn by the wind

On the stump of a fallen tree grow the Prickly-toothed Buckler fern and the Broad Buckler fern, whose rootlets penetrate the soft, rotting wood to obtain their moisture They are hardy, often remaining green all through the winter The handsome Bracken fern often grows to a height of six or seven feet Then there is the lovely Hart's tongue fern, great clumps of which grow beside the forest paths It has broad, green crinkled fronds and is quite unlike other ferns

The history of ferns goes back to the mists of antiquity. There was a time when ferns and plants like them filled the earth. It was a wet and dripping time. Flowers would have been of no use at all but spores could carry on their lives in the prevailing dampness

If you look at the back of the fronds you will see that from the little heaps of rust-coloured spore cases, that this is indeed a fern, all ferns grow their seeds in this way

There are several hundred varieties of ferns They are easily pressed and preserved They may also be grown indoors in pots But they are loveliest in the open, in cool, damp places, in the depths of the forest or by the side of a mountain stream

The history of ferns goes back to the mists of antiquity There was a time when ferns and plants like them filled the earth It was a wet and dripping time Flowers would have been of no use at all but spores could carry on their lives in the prevailing dampness Some ferns grew as large as trees

The falling stems of these mighty tree ferns were floated together by mighty streams, carried away to the sea and buried under sand and mud The remains of these plants being thus shut off from the air, could not rot but were slowly changed into coal The impressions of leaves and stems of these ferns can be distinguished even now, in many pieces of coal

As the earth became drier, ferns retired to the damp, shady spots in which we now find them They are a declining family but let us hope they will remain with us for some time for a forest stream without ferns would be like a maiden whose loveliest tresses have been shorn

Riders to the Sea

For all the modern inconveniences of the cities, my heart lies in the wild and green places of the world So I leapt at the chance to cross the sea to the Irish county of Donegal whose craggy coast faces the northern Atlantic

The ferry we chose crossed from Stranraer on the Scottish coast to Larne in Northern Island To catch it we drove north through England, up a motorway clogged by roadworks as motorways often are to the small town of Congleton Here we B&Bed (Bed nd Breakfasted) in a farm belonging to the Hollinsheads who took in guests to supplement their income from home cured bacon and beekeeping

Mr Hollinshead was proud of his bees He fed us honey and told us that every year he imported queen bees from New Zealand and mail-ordered them all over England

England is longer than it looks and so we set off early the next morning, passing the Lake District to our left and crossing the Scottish border close to Gretna to where, in former days, young English lovers eloped to wed We were well in time for the ferry and had plenty of opportunity to complain about the exorbitant fares Stena Sealink, a privatised arm of British Rail, was asking The gulls followed the ferry out to sea and I tossed sausages to them for the pleasure of seeing them hovering over us to catch them

We landed at Larne and drove off It was early evening but this was summer and it wouldn't get dark until well into what should be night What made Northern Island different was that suddenly there were no B&B signs No one came here for a holiday

The town of Dungiven in particular testified to the damage caused by the many years of "troubles" between Catholic republicans and Protestant unionists The police station was designed to withstand militant attacks It consisited of walls of yellow armour-plating, with a look-out post whose windows were covered with thick metal bar

One in every three shops in the high street had windows broken and doors boarded up A group of skinheaded youths idled on a pavement We drove on past lampposts painted in the colours of the Irish Republic's tricolour and signposts to the town of Londonerry where the 'London' had been obliterated by black paint

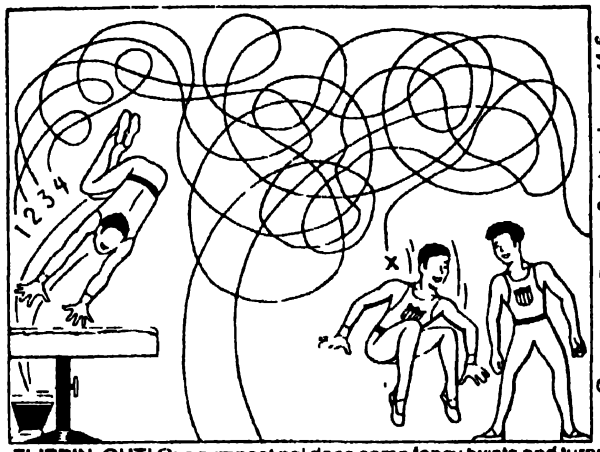
It was getting late Beyond the city of Londonerry, we passed an unmanned, electronically-monitored border crossing and were in another country where B&Bs miraculously reappeared

The next morning we arrived in the tiny village of Downings, on a narrow peninsula jutting into the Atlantic There is no green more deeply brilliant than that of the rolling hills of Ireland Innumerable purple orchids dot the bogs The fragrant sheep-grazed pastures are full of uncounted tiny flowers and the hedgerows of wild roses, honeysuckle and deep red fuschia The tall crags above the shore are deep grey, and the sea gin-clear and intensely blue The wind is so strong that you can lean into it and not fall, and so cold that in our little modern cottage we kept a peat fire burning

There is no green more deeply brilliant than that of the rolling hills of Ireland. Innumerable purple orchids dot the bogs. The fragrant sheep-grazed pastures are full of uncounted tiny flowers and the hedgerows of wild roses, honeysuckle and deep red fuschia

The centre of social life is the pub, because alcoholic beverage, particularly the Guinness stout, is not abhorred but revelled in We based ourselves in the Downings bar, whose walls were decorated with portraits of the great Irish literary men like Wilde, Yeats and Joyce, and of sepia photographs of the villages in the days of sail when women salted herrings and packed them tight into wooden barrels

In one corner, sat the older people, who spoke mainly in the Gaelic language By half past nine, the place would fill up with younger locals and tourists, many of them Catholics from Ulster, and every night there was a regular party going on, with young children running all over the place At about 11 the live music started, and we could never stay awake long enough to see closing time



There I met a school teacher from Newry in Northern Island, who told me how if they wanted the children to play soccer, considered an English and therefore hated game, they had to do so in secret Only Gaelic games were allowed in school But he also said how much more relaxed life had been since the peace process started and, although he suspected that both Sinn Fein and the Unionists were looking for the opportunity to appear martyrs, the common man wanted peace

He rose to get in another round Wrapped in the comfortable pub atmosphere in a land where people love to lie abed until late in the morning, the enmities between Irishmen seemed distant But even in idyllic Donegal they were not, as was shown by the posters stuck to wayside trees and reading 'Peace through British Withdrawal'

RUCHI RICH

She's just been soaking up titles and awards lately. Samita Bhatia met supermodel Ruchi Malhotra, who did India proud at the Miss Asia Pacific Quest

Would she opt for conflict or change? "A bit of both," said Ruchitra Malhotra, "for without conflict there can be no growth, just stagnation." That's what clinched her the second runner-up title at the Miss India contest earlier in the year

Then she headed for Manila for the Miss Asia Pacific Quest having bypassed the Miss International contest held in Tokyo This year the destination was Baguio City, 60 kms off Manila for the coveted Miss Asia Pacific title That's where this leggy lady went on to dazzle the judges breaking a record of sorts by bagging three titles and US $15,000 in cash and prizes.

The svelte Delhi model was adjudged Miss Talent when she swirled to a Rajasthani folk song from the Sridevi blockbuster Lamhe And as she sashayed down the stage in a long gown crafted by designer Ritu Kumar, she walked off with the Miss Best Gown accolade. Hailing from a services background, the penultimate question posed to her was dealt with a natural poise and led up to her being selected among the five finalists

How does it feel to belong to a family of soldiers, the anchor person quizzed Ruchi. "There are a lot of weapons, but there is a universal weapon throughout the world — love. And that's the feeling that makes the world go round."

But the clincher was a stereotyped question that deserved an equally hackneyed answer. What were her views on marriage? Cliches came pouring forth — "love, trust, faith" and the usual spiel. The other four finalists were asked questions that could have helped them tot up high scores, and I expected to be declared the fourth runner-up "

Yet, much to her surprise, she was home and dry and not very disappointed at having missed the crown by a mere one point.

"I'm not less beautiful or less intelligent by having lost the crown by one point. It's all a matter of luck really, and one mark doesn't make any difference," — or does it?

Ruchi is now the official spokesperson for the Miss Asia Pacific for the next one year and will be invited to Manila for any official 'do' along with Miss Korea who had bagged the title

Ruchi adds as an aside, "Miss Korea had three interpreters each of whom were more conscious than Miss Korea herself The judges couldn't take away her marks just because she couldn't speak the language. A majority of the judges came up to me and actually apologised, for they were certain that I was going to win."

Ruchi returned home to an ecstatic welcome. The Malhotra bungalow was adorned with marigold buds and her proud parents, Satish and Ritu Malhotra. They are convinced that after the Miss India contest she would do very well at the pageant."

Her parents weren't the only ones who were convinced even before Manila that Ruchi would emerge with flying colours Designer Ritu Kumar who put her wardrobe together was surprised that she didn't win the crown And designing for Ruchi was no different from designing for Miss Universe or Miss World contestants

"In designing a wardrobe, just one philosophy operates — draw from your own cultural strengths and don't ape the West Five departments worked together actively to put together the wardrobe," Ritu states, "most of which was more updated than creations currently selling in the West." No wonder that Ruchi's casuals, the national costume and evening gown got rave reviews from an international audience.

Her parents on the other hand have more reason to preen. They are proud of the fact that their Liril Girl is to be 'aired' on a 104-episode serial for Zee TV from December 2. In the multi-starrer, Tanaav, Ruchi plays a young, gregarious model-aspiring-to-be-an-actress who pulls the family together in time when things begin to fall apart And if this Deepti Naval, Parikshat Sahni starrer fares well, Ruchi may just land herself a role in films "If the offer is good no reason why I shouldn't take it on," she confirms

Sumiko Mangal Narain

While there is jubilation in the Malhotra household today, the parents hadn't exactly been over the moon a couple of years ago when their daughter had decided to take up modelling as a career A "pucca" Delhiite, Ruchi passed out from Holy Child Convent School and followed it up with a BA Pass course through correspondence It was in the second year of her graduation that she decided to take to the catwalk As it normally happens, the pretty 20-year-old got into the profession "quite by chance" with her model friends egging her on in the direction. Boyfriend Rajiv Makhani included

"Believe it or not, I had opted for the science stream in school, so when I decided to take up modelling my parents were dead against it Since I was only in the 12th standard, my parents' objection amounted to a near ultimatum It was almost like saying either you stay in this house or go out and fend for yourself. But there was no way I wasn't going to model."

Ruchi bided her time and after her board exams she had her portfolio made — again, much against the wishes of her mother

To keep peace at home, Ruchi decided to settle on something more concrete and did a course in interior designing Her hopes for studying architecture were "dashed" when she didn't make it to any school for architecture But I guess I was destined to model and do well at it as well "

Parents come around — as they did even for former Miss Universe Sushmita Sen — specially when they saw the hard work that went behind each shoot and each ramp show So did Ruchi's who found that modelling had become a very professional field

Having got the green signal Ruchi moved from campaign to campaign Dubai, Kuwait, Hong Kong, Mauritius, Nepal and Kuala Lumpur beckoned. Today the Liril Girl has prestigious campaigns like Lux International, Walls Icecream, Thumbs Up, Kelvinator refrigerator, Aristocrat Whisky, Woodland Shoes and Lakme to her credit

With Indian girls on the international ramps, the spotlight at pageants is increasingly being turned on Indian participants Ruchi is convinced that this is essentially because the girls themselves have become aware of their own potential. Adds Ritu, "To make it work, the girls have also to have a conviction in their Indian identity "

What of the future? While issues related to the environment and children are very significant, Ruchi has her sights set elsewhere. "As we are living in a world built by the older generation, it's a gross injustice to discard them when they become aged I want to create homes and clubs for them where they can come and relax I'm going to be charting out plans with Sandhya Homes for concretising these ideas "■

You

It's not that you would come across my poem, Whenever I might contribute one

You love special kind of leaves, flowers and fragrance

Today if you have interest in travelogue, Tomorrow it may be short stories only.

You live in the neighbourhood,
But you have your own rules to follow.

So it's an unending
search for me,

To know whether you enjoy travel in a given time,

Or love to look at the fishes in the aquarium, Cosy and comfortable in your room.

It's pretty easy for you to move from one mystery
To another depth

While I keep on guessing which flower is your favourite now
Or whether a pair of ear-rings would suit
you best next week

You would have moved to another city, by then

A Pattern, A Poem

A sky is born
In my mind
an enchanted forest grows,
I am now
an ecstatic pattern of being.

My sky is an endless poem
of beating wings and the songs of birds
my forest blossoms,
leaves swirl,
the rain finds its feet,
its hushed feet

In the southern skies a cascade of lights breathe

Soft words grow into stories.

I grew up in a field of light
the blue ocean was my companion

that living blue today shines in your eyes
A new poem is at work here

The promise of a shy rainbow,
a breathless silence,
and over the dark trees
the coming of an opal moon

Evening Reverie

The crane has stretched its wings,
Holding the sun in its back
It shall glide through the tepid evening air

There, high up in the dumb sky
The clouds have put on a saffron attire

And here the trees stand still

They have doffed their green hats
And worn a scarf of pale orange gloss.

The tomb of fresh blueness
Is sacrificed to the parting sun.

Its eloquence is lost in the cold greyness.

How far are you?

The darkness of an inert world
Creeps into my lonely heart

And stifles the glowing light of love

THIS, PLUS THAT!

Film directors under the Plus banner

As the satellite channel war rages on, Plus Channel took a step ahead to become India's largest entertainment conglomerate. Plus has more to offer besides TV entertainment — Plus Films, Plus Music and Plus Events. Well, that's Amit Khanna Plus.

These new divisions were launched at an exclusive party (invited: 1,500; attended. 4,000) on the lawns of the Juhu Flying Club, Bombay. The party was a gala affair which began with cocktails (even the waiters were tipsy) and dinner, and ended with champagne breakfast to watch the "rise of the new sun of entertainment".

Amit Khanna of Plus Channel

Anybody who was anybody in the film and TV industry was there

"You can say we are now a complete entertainment company," says Amit Khanna, managing director, Plus Channel The Group plans to invest Rs 600 million in a huge studio complex at Andheri. Another studio facility is to be completed at NOIDA by early 1996.

Plus Films division already has 12 feature films in various stages of production. They are being directed by wellknown directors like Mrinal Sen, Shyam Benegal, N. Chandra, Balu Mahendra, Sudhir Mishra, Basu Chatterjee, Mahesh Bhatt and Sai Paranjpe, Mrinal Sen, Goutam Ghosh, Mahesh Bhatt, Lekh Tandon and K. Vishwanath.

Plus Music plans to offer popular musical hits of the day as well as audio books like Tarkash, an anthology of poems written and recited by Javed Akhtar and The Messenger by R.K. Narayan, recited by Rahul Bose

Plus Events plans to organise musical extravaganzas, corporate events, stage-sports shows and live-concerts by both Indian and international performers

People say there's more to ABCL and Plus than the names Amitabh and Amit ■

BREAKING BARRIERS

It's fun to surf through Net and get wired to cybermusic or digital symphonies But it's more fun to return to good ol' college, mingle with the young, bright faces and be part of a truly musical experience

St Xavier's College is all set to provide a rare fusion of Eastern and Western music today. In celebration of the golden jubilee year of the B Com. department, the Alumni Association presents the event at the college ground

Called Beyond Barriers, the programme presents maestros like Pandit Hariprasad Chaurasia in duet with Louis Banks on piano and keyboards. There will be Shivamani on drums and percussions and Ustad Sabir Khan on the tabla along with bass guitarist Karl Peters

Beyond Barriers, claiming to be the musical coup of the year, will donate the proceeds from the concert to various charitable and philanthropic causes. The organisers also plan to take up a project to beautify Park Street

FIRST PERSON

RUCHI MALHOTRA, the Liril girl with the winsome smile, had her face splashed on the front pages recently as the first runner-up at the Miss Asia Pacific contest held on an island off Manila. Stilettoed, she towers close to six feet and encased in Ritu Kumar creations she made waves in Baguio City as the first contestant ever to walk away with three awards — Miss Talent, Miss Best Gown and the runner-up title. A qualified interior designer, when Ruchi walks off the ramp for good it will be work for the aged of the country for which the ball has already been set rolling.

What is your idea of perfect happiness?

A blissful feeling that is inside you And you can't experience it until you do something nice for others

What is your greatest fear?

Losing my self-respect and the love of my near and dear ones

Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?

I believe that there's a man behind every woman's success My strongest influences have been my father and late grandfather

What do you dislike most in others?

Punctuality and professionalism are important to me and thus I dislike unprofessionalism and those who don't respect other people's time

What do you dislike most in yourself?

I'm very selfish, very impatient and very impulsive These, I believe, are the true traits of an Aries woman Otherwise, I'm pretty okay

What is your most precious possession?

My confidence and my faith in God, my parents and friends

What objects do you always carry?

My confidence which is my lucky charm and my Sai Baba in my wallet

What makes you most depressed?

Seeing people sitting idle without doing anything concrete You live only once and if God's given you a brain, use it, or you may have missed a chance Next time round, you might be born a dog

What do you dislike most on your appearance?

Nothing I love myself

What is your favourite word?

Love

What is your favourite journey?

Anything that can be accomplished in a minute I hate travelling My ears pop during a flight, I hate train loos, and car rides give me a backache

What is your favourite dream?

I have lots of dreams But the favourite is getting married and having as many babies as I possibly can have

What is your nightmare?

I am petrified of lizards The worst nightmare I had was being surrounded by lizards of all sizes Also, my greatest fear is also my nightmare

What or who is the greatest love of your life?

Someone very special A very dear friend of mine whom I'm not going to name anymore

What is your source of sustenance?

My hard work and being a woman

On what occasions do you lie?

I only tell white lies — that, too, when it's imperative I'm honest to myself and also to others

What is your greatest regret?

I never regret anything

What has been your happiest moment?

It's yet to come It has to be something more permanent unlike this ephemeral title that'll last just for a year

What brings tears to your eyes?

My friends tell me I'm very strong as I rarely cry However, I can't answer this one It's going to be very upsetting

How do you relax?

By working out

What do you envy most in others?

Those who never ever give up hope in life.

How would you like to be remembered?

Just as a normal human being who tried to a make a difference

How would you like to die?

Do you mind! I'm only 22 years old! Peacefully, in my sleep, I guess.

What do you dislike most in others?

Punctuality and professionalism are important to me and thus I dislike unprofessionalism and those who don't time

■ 'The Greening of Tourism' (September 22) showed the Magazine was concerned about serious issues also (used as we are to seeing only pictures of luscious models and stars splashed across the pages)

Like any industry, tourism also has its positive and negative sides the fat foreign exchange and the socio-cultural environmental degradation Both have to be accepted

As far as the negative aspect is concerned it would need a little careful planning on the part of the government and hoteliers and keeping an alert eye on the environment

■ When thinking of promoting tourism in India, it would be wrong to keep only foreign visitors in mind Agreed, they bring in mega-bucks but domestic tourism cannot be neglected

How many of the diehard Indian traveller can afford five-star accommodation? It is this class which needs to be taken care of by providing good hotels in different locales

Kingshuk Bose,

■ We are more concerned about foreigners coming to India when actually the emphasis should be on local tourism

West Bengal, for instance, despite having excellent toursim potential — sea beaches, hills and forests — badly neglects this sector

First of all, the roads are not maintained well, the luxury coaches of the department are so poorly maintained that one thinks twice before boarding a bus. Information is not readily available and there is no concerted effort to 'sell' holiday packages

PLAY ON...

Amjad Ali Khan, the Sarod Samrat who turned 50 a couple of months ago, is still in search of a larger awareness It is as a seeker that he lives Raghava R. Menon narrates his story

Amjad, one of the most recorded musicians of his generation, in a recording studio

HINDUSTANI CLASSICAL MUSICIANS USED TO DISDAin the music recording business They believed that any recorded piece of music, whether brief or long, was a priori false This was among the primary reasons why several great musicians of the early part of this century were never recorded on disc or tape There is something in the nature of raga which makes it true only at the time of singing or playing. "Sung and recorded and played again, it is no longer music," thought Thakur Jaidev Singh, "but a deposition It was good only for a court of

Divine inspiration

Lost in an infinite world of ragas

law where the raga's technical features, its obedience to its rules and prescriptions can be evaluated and judgment passed As music it was dead "

The raga's life gushes out at the moment of making, a minute later it is all reminiscence and recall Ustad Hafiz Ali Khan, who resisted recording his music all his life, had one additional objection Besides the curious immediacy of the art which recording destroys, he believed that ragas were part of the spiritual life of man and possessed a life which can be dishonoured only at one's peril Recording the raga disinvested the raga of its spiritual potency It became merely a good facsimile

In this context, there is an implicit paradox in the fact that Amjad is among the most recorded musicians of his generation, both within India and outside Accounts of his life and art on film and video abound Beginning with the James Beveridge film, documentaries on Amjad have appeared with a certain frequency every few years The Films Division documentary, directed by Gulzar, is among the many sensitive portraits of Amjad and his time There is another called Divya Drishti or Divine Insight, and another account was shown as part of the serial on Indian music called Sadhana In addition there is a Japanese JVC Production

Despite the fact that Amjad's musical tradition is among the oldest in his instrument, Amjad's musical culture does not betray the slightest trace of that defensiveness, either in its evaluation of itself or in respect of art itself, that Indian musicians often manifest He rarely, if ever, argues that classical music is divine or spiritual, or that he himself has any access to this spirituality Spirituality, he has known from his father, is something lived, and the best proof of any belief in your life is the life you live The listeners know what Amjad's art is all about He does not have to say much Among the younger musicians Amjad has contributed the largest number of new ragas to Hindustani classical music These new ragas form a whole corpus of musical material whose implications to the infinite world of ragas can only be determined in future years A very large number of the 20 or so new ragas of Amjad's fashioning have been discovered through personal emotion, of one kind or another, and not made as though in cold blood from the stuff of scales They have a certain emotional immediacy in them rather than a statement of vadi and samvadi, or the strict grammar of the up and down passage of swaras in a pre-stated order Looking for a pakad at this early stage of the life of the raga is like trying to find out if a child has a liver, as it lies kicking and laughing in its crib The peculiar aura of those ragas not having been constructed exclusively out of scales, but from feeling, often affronts the musical grammarian, who, before he hears the whole raga, anguishes over the seeming absence of the precious rules of raga-making It is often forgotten that all the ragas of our tradition which seem as natural and proper today as sky or air, have been born from feeling The laws of ragas are organic and their true test is an awareness of this larger truth, which is the proof of the law it obeys There is little use of a vadi and samvadi, and aroha and an avaroha

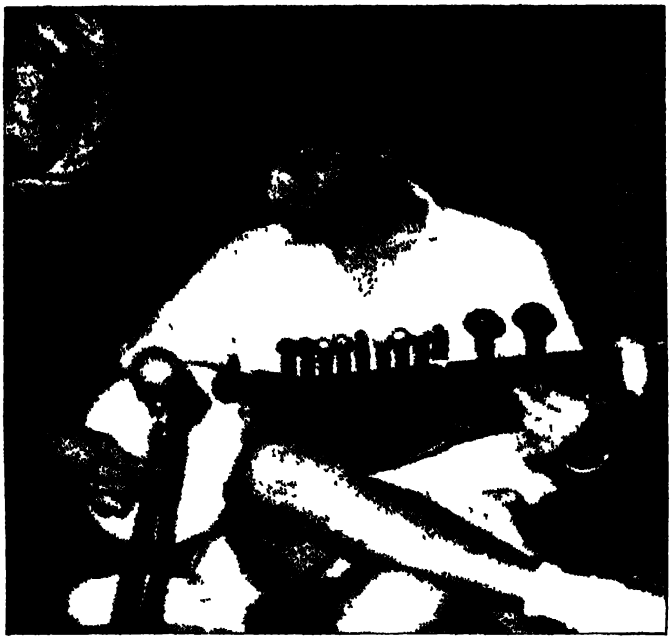
and an indubitable pakad, if the result of all this construction gives you a raga which you would hardly care to hear again

You feel sure that Amjad's new ragas have not been concocted from scales but from the power of immediate feeling For example, listen to raga Priyadarshini and you will wonder at its despair, more than at the grief of the event of Indira Gandhi's passing from which the raga was born As you hear it, you recognise that the event demanded something more That is why the raga expressed a despair in the fate of the nation, rather than the loss of a great and immortal woman There is Kamal Shree for another and a more recent assassination, that of Rajiv Gandhi There are other subjects too Raga Subhalakshmi, which was named after Amjad's wife, was born in celebration of the power and the strength of sacrifice of Indian womanhood There is the raga Sabari Malai born from Amjad's pilgrimage to the temple of Sabari Malai high up in the Western Ghats in Kerala There are several others of varying feeling and sensibility There are Shyam Shree, Haripriya Kanada and Ganesh Kalyan All these have the authority of genuine response to one or the other of life's compelling predicaments This perhaps is the only assurance that they would outlast him and his time

It is in the making of a shishya that a master is tested As a shishya himself Amjad had lived a life that had the right direction, and his inclination towards his father and guru brought to life a formidable commitment which increasingly sculpted the landscape of his mind and his art with the gravity and grace that distinguishes his art today



Obviously, only one who himself has lived the life of a true shishya can know what the physical and psychological characteristics of a student who has the makings of becoming a shishya are and only such a person is qualified to decipher the tell-tale signs of and clues that foreshadow the possiblity of a true finding in the art

Amjad continues to be, psychologically, the shishya of his absent father by carrying with him in his life the resonance of his father's musical essence and genius This circumstance surfaces in many small and delicate ways Like his father, he is just a croon away from song The same bard-like intonation sings in his sarod There are also the many new ragas which

Amjad discovers with a curious apperception of the fleeting quality of life's most tragic moments He is able to introduce the ragas that relate to monumental tragedies — the passing of Indira Gandhi and of Rajiv Gandhi consumed by holocausts of fire and brimstone — with a linear narrative drive and the undertow of despair and hope that these historical events contained

The Bapu Kauns which Amjad had recently dedicated to the Father of the Nation on the memorial of Gandhiji's 125th birth anniversary is a case in point This raga was played in the conventional manner through an alaap, jor and jhala followed with a tintal gat The opening sequences of the alaap was played in a phoenix-farm style, with tentative groping movements that gathered musical values as the alaap grew, gaining a distinctive configuration that ripened into the magical geometries that seemed to have returned to the Indian subcontinent, with shape and a direction that were no longer searching but were introduced through short, terse phrases

The young Amjad performing in school

Amjad with Hemant Sen, the oldest living maker of sarods, in Calcutta

By the time the jor began, the style had developed sharp contours and you thought of chaun-chaona and the sudden retraction of the national movement which was part of the Himalyan blunder of the time The playing started to grow outwards, through its rippling boundaries that expanded like the tide at noon, going out and returning in continuous repetitions, before the stepping in and out of three notes in the middle register with the sudden mid-phrase pause of imprisonment

The jhala seemed like the planned chaos of the Partition riots, and the long meends opened promising vistas of freedom The fading out on a long gandhar seemed like a prolonged Hey Ram This was the way the great Ustad Hafiz Ali Khan saw ragas not as little bits of science, or, indeed, of art but as organic, living beings passing relentlessly through time

This is the consequence of a temperament and can be bequeathed either through skill or as a part of nature In his students, Amjad has lit tapers that are difficult to put out, and in his sons, there is the additional dimension of a blood line, an environment that is like the silence between two chords

Amjad's formation of the annual Ustad Hafiz Ali Khan Award honours every year a musical stalwart whether of the North or the South

This is a public avowal of a matured shishya in Amjad, an Ustad after a life-long apprenticeship, and a continuing affirmation of his psychological and spiritual sources which is the only real anchor a man can ever truly possess

Attachments and emotional links vie for top priority, with hard work and headway causing a certain tension, but for that very reason, making the week mighty exciting There is also a danger of separation or a parting, so play your cards adroitly Pets and colleagues play an unusual role

BIRTHDAYS

December 17: Moon-sun sextile, Ganesha says, offers avenues of work and play, communication and contacts. Those in media outshine others.

December 18: Jupiter sun-conjunction gives you dramatic flair, a fondness for living it up, and more importantly, the means to do so. It is this factor which makes you charismatic.

December 19: Moon sextile Mercury gives you the innate ability to draw crowds, so please do away with shyness and inhibition.

December 20: Moon-Neptune conjunction suggests victory after opposition. It would be best to chip away at obstacles rather than meet them head-on.

December 21: Moon-conjunction Jupiter is a sure-fire indication of success. Matters about children, education, journey and work, specially in governmental circles love and engagement are favoured.

December 22: The new moon indicates that expert advice must be taken in during long term decisions. I don't want you to agonise over it. Expenses are heavy.

December 23: The Mercury-Mars conjunction gives you a chance to start afresh and this time you will do [illegible]. The trick and ticket is to build a strong base.

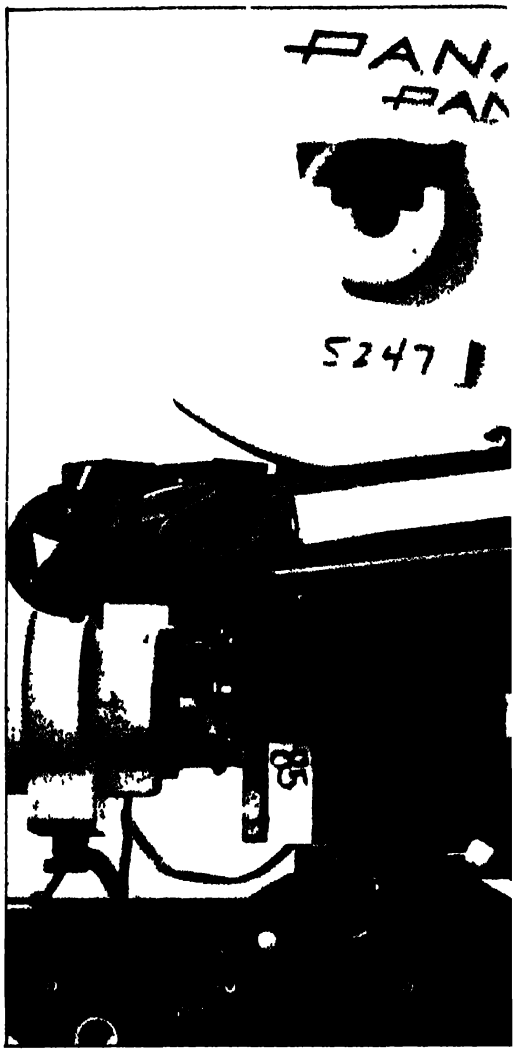
BIG DEAL

Hollywood wonder, Steven Spielberg, record mogul, David Geffen, and former Disney film impresario, Jeffrey Katzenberg, announced the creation of DreamWorks recently Mark Tran reports on Hollywood's new flame which has never burned brighter

DreamWorks has all the exuberance and idealism of a new venture Visitors descend in droves to the recently unveiled Hollywood studio, the phones ring incessantly and what was once the games room is now the scene of intense business lunches Although everyone wears short sleeves and jeans, the atmosphere is far from laidback at the adobe-style offices of Steven Spielberg that serve as its temporary headquarters

Just over a year ago, Spielberg, Hollywood's most successful director, record mogul David Geffen and former Disney film impresario Jeffrey Katzenberg, announced the creation of DreamWorks at a press event that generated more excitement than any Oscar ceremony Not since the formation of United Artists in 1919 has Hollywood seen such a high-powered cast go into business for itself

Expectations are high, although quite a few people are waiting for the mighty threesome to fall flat on their faces Actor Tom Hanks summed up the sentiment on Wall Street and Hollywood when he said "I guarantee that, when their first film premieres, everyone will say, 'This is it? This is what these three geniuses have come up with?' Unless it immediately enters the pantheon as one of the three highest grossing films of all time, everybody will ask, what's the big deal?"



Still, the three friends chose a propitious moment to form DreamWorks Hollywood's flame has never burned brighter More than ever, America excels in the manufacture of fantasy and its entertainment giants have become an economic sector as important as computers or cars

As Jack Valenti, head of the Motion Picture Association of America, boasted "We have a $4 billion surplus in our balance of trade, and I don't know of many other industries that can make that claim " With American entertainment companies dominating global mass culture, DreamWorks stands to join this elite group and make its founders even more successful and wealthy

Hollywood's reach should become more widespread still as delivery systems proliferate and converge at the same time, with cable, computer, telephone line, satellite and television jostling to deliver its products to all parts of the globe Grand claims have been made for DreamWorks already

One friend and supporter, Bob Zemeckis, director of Forrest Gump, believes that, if it succeeds, DreamWorks will transform the way Hollywood does business The company plans to be a leaner alternative to its big competitors at Time Warner-Turner Broadcasting and Disney-Capital Cities/ABC

As a new company, DreamWorks does enjoy the advantage of being small and nimble "When you meet these film people at parties, you think 'terrific', but after a while you realise that a lot of these studio executives are mid-range development people and they are basically bureaucrats from some 19th-century Russian novel, ' said one aspiring screenwriter in Los Angeles "These studios are so large and have such an overblown base, they are not cost-efficient "

Steven Spielberg Will this dream work?

Barbra Streisand and Paul Newman: Manning a studio proved tough

In keeping with the notion that DreamWorks should be a writer-friendly company (although all studios say this) a career writer has been put in charge of the day-to-day running of the DreamWorks film company There are eight executives in the film team, ridiculously few by Hollywood standards None of them holds a formal title

DreamWorks is parting with traditional Hollywood practice in other ways Equity will be split with all employees, including secretaries Writers and animators will get a share of gross movie revenue And, in an ambitious move, DreamWorks plans to distribute its films in the north American market, rather than handing that task and a hefty slice of any profits to one of the major studios Having raised some $2 billion in funding, DreamWorks has now begun making deals and appointing personnel

Getting the money was easy Investors from Samsung, the South Korean conglomerate, to Calpers, the California state employees' pension fund, beat a path to the company's door although, as it happens, neither put money into the venture Among those that did were Paul Allen, co-founder of computer software company Microsoft, who put in $500 million, and Microsoft itself, which invested $50 million The rest came effortlessly the three friends put in $33 3 million each and structured the company so that they get 67 per cent of the firm's profits They hold 100 per cent of the voting stock

DreamWorks intends to be a full fledged entertainment company, involved in live-action features, animated films, television production, music and multimedia Geffen will run the DreamWorks music company Spielberg, who is folding his Amblin Films into DreamWorks, will be in overall charge of the live-action film unit and Katzenberg will be responsible for animation as well as for television The core of the multimedia effort comes from the alliance with Microsoft

In multimedia, DreamWorks has moved quickly, unlike its sister studios, to embrace Silicon Valley Its partnership with Microsoft will focus on developing interactive entertainment, particularly adventure-based games and children's stories The joint venture will exploit any device the next decade produces, from computers to video game machines to new electronic networks to interactive television

The first fruits of the alliance — probably computer games — should be on the market for Christmas 1996 Notwithstanding all the talk of its being a streamlined company, DreamWorks has allowed itself one extravagance Spielberg is overseeing the construction, at a cost of $200 million, of a state-of-the-art studio near Playa del Rey His partners would have preferred to avoid such a big outlay upfront, but Spielberg has his heart set on a fully digital studio where everyone is linked together to a computer network

The team assembling the studio says it will feel comfortable and friendly, designed for the creative community, not the technical community The picture would not be complete without any number of deals a studio has to make DreamWorks has lined up several These include a 10-year arrangement with the Home Box Office cable network, a unit of Time Warner, giving HBO exclusive movie rights to DreamWorks titles The price of each movie will depend on its success at the box office

While the pieces are beginning to fall into place, scepticism abounds Barbra Streisand, Sidney Poitier and Paul Newman created First Artists Production in 1969 It has vanished Director Francis Ford Coppola almost went bankrupt with his American Zoetrope studio in the Eighties Orion Pictures enjoyed initial success until a string of bad movies drove it into bankruptcy Savoy Pictures, the most recent entry is still establishing itself

True, none had the combination of talent of DreamWorks and the three partners have enjoyed enormous success But these days it takes more than successful films to make a studio profitable For Disney, box-office revenue for The Lion King will be dwarfed by profits from other sources — music, consumer merchandise and video games Other studio heads are, however, worried Robert Daly, co-chairman of the durable Warner Bros studio, said "They're starting from scratch So this won't be something you'll see tomorrow But they are a major competitor Absolutely"

ESSAY

CHANNEL VISION

Chandal Swami is the latest to go in for the electronic medium.
Ramendra Kumar checks out on the godman's celestial channels*

Chandal Swami, the sanyasi emeritus of Bharat was sitting in his room with his man 'Monday to Sunday' Mamaji. Chandal was a very unhappy man. Thanks to the likes of Rakesh Pellet and Badan Mal Khurana his life had become one long ordeal The CB Eye, the Pain Commission and the Media were all hounding him He could not leave the country, he could not even feign illness and he just could not avoid the paparazzi with their embarrassing questions Even the electricity supply to his tiny 70-room ashram had been severed and the Dilli Administration was threatening to demolish it

Earlier, his car used to go unchecked, straight to the front door of the present PM Pee Wee's house But now, Pee Wee avoided him like the Surat plague Last night, when he had telephoned Pee Wee on his hotline he had been told by his secretary that the PM was away while in the background he could clearly hear the PM humming a Telugu rap song Chandal was really hurt Pee Wee and he had known each other since the time when Pee Wee was a mere President of the AP Congress Unit and Chandal was a struggler Since then both had risen, achieving the pinnacle in their respective careers And all along they had always maintained contact with each other When Chandal was roaming the Himalayas in search of Tantrik Nirvana, he would regularly send Pee Wee Picture Postcards

Pee Wee, on his part, in between taking split second decisions, would drop a line or send a verbal pout or two Later, when both had settled down in Dilli they would meet on weekends and discuss the latest in Mantras, Vibhutis and Nakshatras as well as the Arjuns, Tiwaris and Sonias Chandal had helped Pee Wee in winning many a political battle, fixing many a nefarious deal and handling many a slimy rival And now, the ungrateful Pee Wee was even refusing to acknowledge his existence Chandal felt like picking up the phone and singing Dost dost na raha in the PM's turncoat ears

The same was the case with his other political friends Arf Arf Kaan, Chandal Shaker and many others who had sought and received his benediction and benevolence were acting as if he was nothing more than a mere acquaintance they had chanced to meet at the Kumbh Mela or the neighbourhood Som Yajna It was really disgusting

Had he been an admirer of Guru Butt he would have sung Yeh duniya agar mil bhi jaaye to kya hai But being a Gromda fan he began fantasising and mumbling to himself,

Pellet mila mujhe raste mein,
Maare char joote maine saste mein,
Pee Wee ki maine taang todi
Mein sach kehta hoon Pamela ki kasam,
Main piya nahin whisky, beer ya Som

After an hour of fantasising, Chandal looked at Mamajee and said, "Mama, I have to do something drastic or these jokers will finish me"

"Gurujee, why don't you ask Barood Ibrahim to smuggle you to Dubai?"

"I had thought of that but you know Mama, in Dubai I will have nothing to do The people of Dubai are not as gullible as Indians I cannot fool them all the time I'll be rendered absolutely jobless and I'll get thoroughly bored I can't leave Bharat I'll have to resurrect myself here itself But the question is how?"

"Why don't you try your usual methods? Take a non-repayable loan from the Sultan of Brunei and bribe the C B Eye and Shri Pain"

"Mama, I think you are getting senile Do you think if I could bribe I wouldn't have tried it But there is no use The public opinion is against me and no one is going to let me off easily My one-point programme should be to change the public opinion Unless I become the darling of the masses, my goose will be cooked rare and tender"

"But how will you achieve that? Act as the hero in Madan Fix-it's latest blockbuster Nana meri Naani Diwani?

"No, stupid, nothing as silly as that And now stop your prattle and let me concentrate"

Chandal got up and started pacing the floor, his face a picture of concentration Suddenly he stopped, turned around quickly and walked to where Mama was sitting and staring into space He slapped him on the back an declared, "Mama, I have got divine inspiration I know exactly how to become the most adorable person in Bharat"

"How?" Mama asked sullenly, rubbing his back

"I am going to start my own satellite channel As you know TV today is the ultimate persuader It has the maximum reach and the greatest impact It is even more potent and powerful than Tantra Vidya With my own channel– Chamatkari Chandal Television or CCTV I can create real magic"

"But that needs a lot of money Where will you get the funds from? Most of your funds have been exhausted in hiring sadhus and arranging false medical certificates?"

"Shh! Stupid If CB Eye hears this they will issue a non-bailable warrant I'll get the money from my dear friend Sultan of Brunei"

"And what will you show on CCTV?

"I'll start with three channels The first will be a music channel called Chandal Oye It will telecast music videos round the clock"

"But that is being done by many other channels?"

"There will be one essential difference All the songs telecast on this channel—rap, bhangra, rock pop, geet, ghazal, bhajan, etc will be entirely devoted to my life and times I will commission the top singers in each genre to compose in my honour"

"The second channel will be an educative one It will be called CC I ducation and will feature the state of the art educational programmes I will invite my dear friend Barood to present specially designed training programmes on 'The art and science of bomb blasting' This can include a special session by Sunju Tada Baba who can elaborate on the art of buying AK-56 rifles, hiding and melting them and subsequently pleading innocence My friend Adha Nan Kashoggi will enlighten the viewers on the various nuances of dealing in arms

"The channel will also feature a special programme called RDX Top Ten It will focus on the creative uses of RDX and will be a mind-blowing experience for the viewers Once my channel becomes popular, citizens of Bharat will attain such expertise that people from all over the world will flock here to learn the basics Instead of foreign exchange going out, money will start pouring in Wherever there is a blast people say, 'By jove! That was a terrific blast Must be an Indian mind behind it' Every brutal assassination will have people swearing, 'Ooh, la, la! What a neat job It's got to be an Indian No one else can do it with such finesse'

"So what if we have not been able to achieve anything in the field of sports or science or literature At least in the area of death and destruction, murder and mayhem we will become numero uno I will also invite the second most infamous inmate in Swamidom, Asathya Pie Baba, to take classes"

"What will he teach? The nuances of Afro Hairstyling?"

"No, dammit He will teach people tricks — 'How to make vibhuti fall from a self portrait, etc etc My dear friend Osho Randy will be a special guest?"

"O Osho, but he is dead"

"Godmen don't die They must move from moksha to nirvana

"But will these godmen come to your rescue?"

"Of course, they will, I will tell them — 'Swamis of the world unite You have nothing to lose but your stains'"

Chandal paused to take a breath and continued, "The third channel will be devoted to Chat Shows Shamela Bored, my sweetiepie, will indulge in an intimate tete a tete with all the celebrities she has slept with The list is pretty long and the show can go on for months In each episode, Shamela will reveal some intimate details of the celebrity like his pet passion and his favourite position"

"Will a lot of celebrities be interviewed?"

"No, no, all that is too mundane In any show the celebrities will interview me Each day a new celebrity will be invited to seek my advice and blessings" ■

Reaching for the Sky

There was but one tree in the street known as Gali Ram Nath an ancient banyan that had grown through the cracks of an abandoned mosque and little Ali's kite had caught in its branches The boy, barefoot and clad only in a torn shirt, ran along the cobbled stones of the narrow street to where his grandfather sat nodding dreamily in the sunshine of their back courtyard

"Grandfather," shouted the boy "My kite has gone!"

The old man woke from his daydream with a start, and raising his head, displayed a beard that would have been white, had it not been dyed red with mehndi leaves

"Did the twine break?" he asked "I know that kite twine is not what it used t be"

"No, grandfather, the kite is stuck in the banyan tree"

The old man chuckled "You have yet to learn how to fly a kite properly, my child And I am too old to teach you, that's the pity of it But you shall have another"

He had just finished making a new kite from bamboo paper and thin silk, and it lay in the sun, firming up It was a pale pink kite, with a small green tail The old man handed it to Ali, and the boy raised himself on his toes and kissed his grandfather's hollowed-out cheek

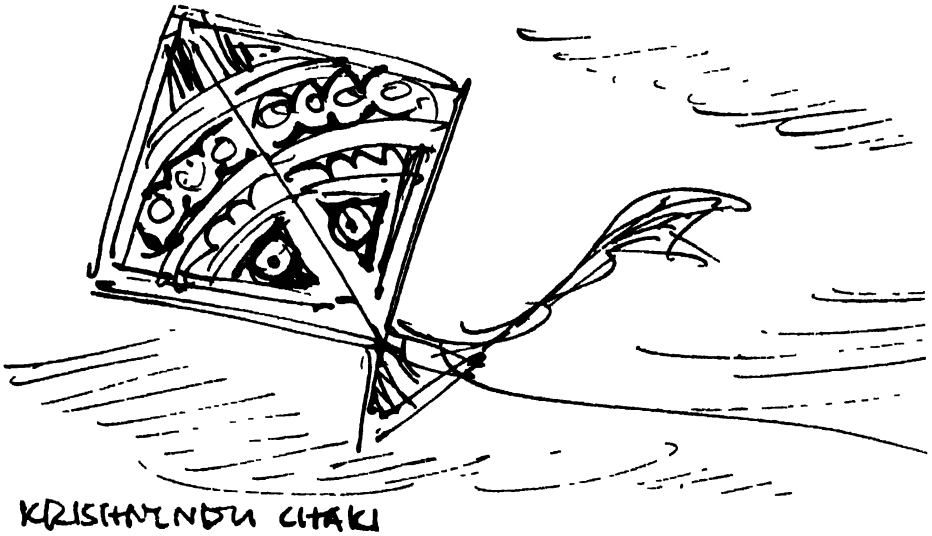
"I will not lose this one," he said "This kite will fly like a bird" And he turned on his heels and skipped out of the courtyard

The old man remained dreaming in the sun His kite shop was gone, the premises long since sold to a junk dealer, but he still made kites, for his own amusement and for the benefit of his grandson, Ali Not many people bought kites these days Adults disdained them, and children preferred to spend their money at the cinema Moreover, there were not many open spaces left for the flying of kites The city had swallowed up the open grassland that had stretched from the old fort's walls to the river bank

But the old man remembered a time when grown men flew kites, and great battles were fought, the kites swerving and swooping in the sky, tangling with each other until the string of one was severed Then the defeated but liberated kite would float away into the blue unknown There was a good deal of betting, and money frequently changed hands

Kite-flying was then the sport of the kings, and the old man remembered how the Nawab himself would come down to the riverside with his retinue to participate in this noble pastime There was time, then, to spend an idle hour with a gay, dancing strip of paper Now everyone hurried hurried in a heat of hope, and delicate things like kites and daydreams were trampled underfoot

He, Mehmood the kite-maker, had in the prime of his life been well-known throughout the city Some of his more elaborate kites once sold for as much as three or four rupees each



At the request of the Nawab he had once made a very special kind of kite, unlike any that had been seen in the district It consisted of a series of small, very light disks, trailing on a thin bamboo frame To the end of each disk he fixed a sprig of grass, forming a balance on both sides

The surface of the foremost disk was slightly convex, and a fantastic face was painted on it, having two eyes made of small mirrors The disks, decreasing in size from head to tail, assumed an undulatory form, and gave the kite the appearance of a crawling serpent It required great skill to raise this cumbersome device from the ground, and only Mehmood could manage it

Everyone had heard of the 'Dragon Kite' that Mehmood had built, and word went round that it possessed supernatural powers A large crowd assembled in the open to watch its first public launching in the presence of the Nawab

At the first attempt it refused to leave the ground

The disk made a plaintive, protesting sound, and the sun was trapped in the little mirrors, and made of the kite a living, complaining creature And then the winds came from the right direction, and the Dragon Kite soared into the sky, wriggling its way higher and higher, with the sun still glinting in its devil-eyes And when it went very high, it pulled fiercely on the twine, and Mehmood's young son had to help him with the reel, but still the kite pulled, determined to be free, to break loose, to live a life of its own And eventually it did so

The twine snapped, the kite leaped away toward the sun, sailed on heavenward until it was lost to view It was never found again, and Mehmood wondered afterwards if he had made too vivid, too living a thing of the great kite He did not make another like it, and instead he presented to the Nawab a musical kite, one that made a sound like a violin when it rose in the air

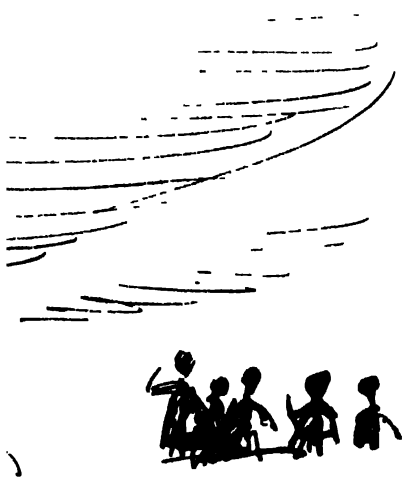
Those were more leisurely, more spacious days But the Nawab had died years ago, and his descendants were almost as poor as Mehmood himself Kite-makers like poets, once had their patrons, but no one knew Mehmood, simply because there were too many people in the Gali, and they could not be bothered with their neighbours

When Mehmood was younger and had fallen sick, everyone in the neighbourhood had come to ask after his health, but now, when his days were drawing to a close, no one visited him True, most of his old friends are dead and his sons had grown up one was working in a local garage the other had been in Pakistan at the time of Partition and had not been able to rejoin his relatives

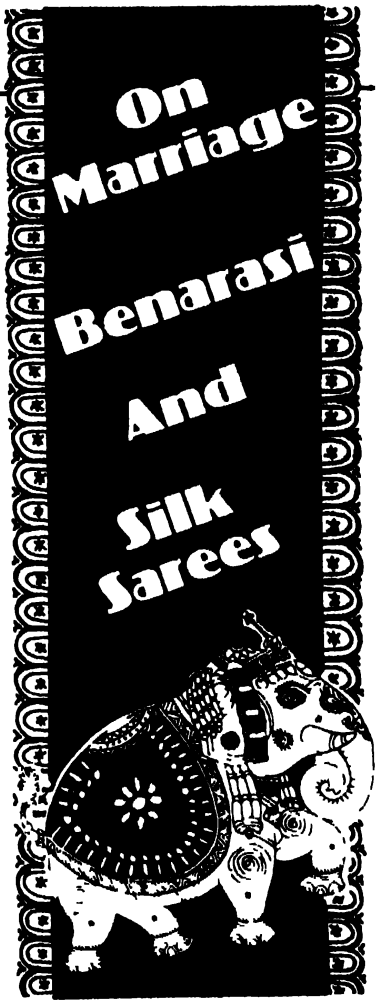
The children who had bought kites from him 10 years ago were now grown men, struggling for a living, they did not have time for the old man and his memories They had grown up in a swiftly changing and competitive world, and they looked at the old kite-maker and the banyan tree with the same indifference

Both were taken for granted, permanent fixtures that were of no concern to the raucous, sweating mass of humanity that surround them No longer did people gather under the banyan tree to discuss their problems and their plans only in the summer months did a few seek shelter from the fierce sun

But there was the boy, his grandson, it was good that Mehmood's son worked close by, for it gladdened the old man's heart to watch the small boy at play in the winter sunshine, growing under his eyes like a young and well-nourished sapling putting forth new leaves each day There is a great affinity between trees and men We grow at much the same pace, if we are not hurt or starved or cut down In our youth we are resplendent creatures, and in our declining years we stoop a little, we remember, we stretch our brittle limbs in the sun, and then, with a sigh, we shed our last leaves



Mehmood was like banyan, his hands gnarled and twisted like the roots of the ancient tree Ali was like the young mimosa planted at the end of the courtyard In two years both he and the tree would acquire the strength and confidence of their early youth



The voices in the street grew fainter, and Mehmood wondered if he was going to fall asleep and dream, as he so often did of a kite so beautiful and powerful that it would resemble the great white bird of the Hindus, Garuda, God Vishnu's famous steed He would like to make a wonderful new kite for little Ali He had nothing else to leave the boy

He heard Ali's voice in the distance, but did not realise that the boy was calling him The voice seemed to come from very far away

Ali was at the courtyard door, asking if his mother had as yet returned from the bazaar When Mehmood did not answer, the boy came forward repeating his question The sunlight rested on his flowing beard and flew to the mimosa tree, and a sudden gust of wind caught the torn kite and lifted it into the air, carrying it far above the struggling city into the blue sky

Letter From Wales

And do you remember which railway station has the longest name? Yes, of course, it's on the tip of your tongue It is indeed Llanfairowllgwyngyllgogerychwryndroowllllantysiliogofofoch

This charming station whose name means St Mary's Church in the hollow of white hazel near a rapid whirlpool and the church of Saint Tysilio near the red cave, lies in North Wales on the main line to Holyhead and is the oldest station on the Isle of Anglesey. You may think that time hangs heavy with the Welsh that they can afford to spend so much time just pronouncing a place name but that is not the case The name was invented by a local humorist and is generally abbreviated to Llanfairowllgwyngyll

It lies in very Welsh Wales, where street signs are in Welsh, where Welsh is the first language and where even unruly children laughing and joking on the branchline back home after school speak in Welsh among themselves

Despite the tide of English culture, schools are still converting to Welsh as the medium of instruction The local radio station is in Welsh and the Welsh TV channel rejoices in typically Welsh occasions I spent one evening watching a harp contest where groups of girls strummed melodies on the national instrument In the villages of North Wales, English is the natural language of the walkers, trekkers, and tourists on which the economy of the mountainous Snowdonia National Park depends

But village society, which helps to maintain a proud sense of Welsh identity is still a potent force This was clear in the small village of Betwys-y-Coed which stands in the valley of the Conway river, on the hill railway line which runs through the most splendid countryside from the northcoast south to the old slate mining town of Blaenau Ffestiniog

Betwys-y-Coed boasts a small railway museum Here, it was that I learnt that many modern words are not much different in Welsh Train is, well, tren But the words for railway rheifford and station gorsaf have a more genuinely Celtic sound

Across the road from the station building is a large village green and a thickly forested hillside, at the foot of which nestles the square grey stone tower of St Mary's Church The church is an important centre of surviving village communities

I was in Betwys-y-Coed on Remembrance Sunday when, at 11 am, a two-minute silence is still widely kept in remembrance of those who gave their lives in two World Wars The morning service at St Mary's was put forward to incorporate the two-minute silence and was also unusual as it was conducted in English A few minutes into his sermon, the vicar began to read from a letter which, he told us, only 10 people in the world had ever seen The congregation leaned forward to listen better It was a letter written by a 19-year-old Welsh soldier in the trenches in World War I to be handed to his parents in the event of his death

Despite the tide of English culture, schools are still converting to Welsh as the medium of instruction. The local radio station is in Welsh and the Welsh TV channel rejoices in typically Welsh occasions

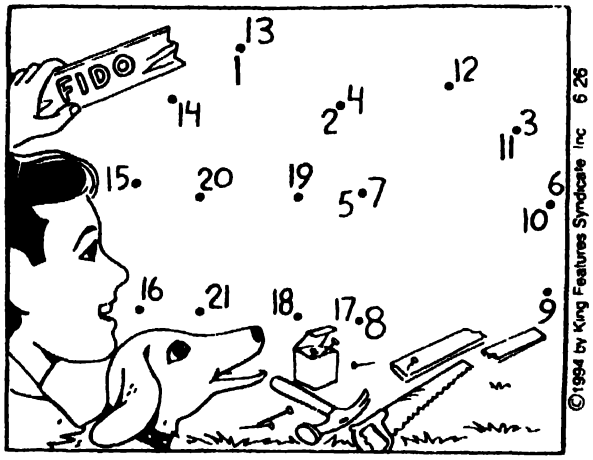
In the letter he thanked his family for their love, for their scrimping and saving so that he could have a university education He told them that their effort had not been wasted, and that he had valued the opportunities they had given him, and the faith in God he had learnt from them and which had never deserted him Some of the concepts of this voice from the beginning of the century seemed old fashioned to us at the end of it, when anything more than duty to personal self interest is liable to be derided But the young man's voice still came through clearly and sincerely The letter ended with words of comfort to his family The vicar looked down on us "The letter," he said, "was delivered I never met my Uncle John, but I feel that I did know him"

The vicar, then, had shared with us the personal grief of his family Tears came to many eyes in the congregation but the difference that had struck me between values then and now must also have occurred to the vicar Among the hymns sung were the lines, Quench our fevered thirst for pleasure, shame our selfish greed for gain, and shame our wanton selfish gladness, rich in things and poor in soul

At the conclusion of the service, both the Welsh and the English national anthems were sung, and the Welshness of the occasion was again very evident



That evening, in one of the hostelries which line the main street, a member of the regular congregation recognised me from church "I must apologise for the singing of the national anthem in English," he said, "but it's not sung much around here"

I told him it didn't matter After all, I came to Wales not just for the mountains and forests and salmon leaping, but also because it was still Welsh

IN GOD'S LAB

Should new parents Robert De Niro and Kim Basinger take experts' advice, they would soon end up having geniuses on their hands Emily Smith probes the fascinating phenomenon of deciding the babies' future from the womb

Like most doting dads, Robert De Niro, whose former girlfriend Toukie Smith used a surrogate mother to carry their twin boys to full term, wants a wonderful future for his children

But what can parents like De Niro, Michelle Pfeiffer, Kim Basinger and Alec Baldwin do to ensure that they give their kids the best start in life?

One expert believes that a child's future begins on the night of conception

He says that babies born in the summer months will shine in their academic careers, leaving cold comfort for the seasonally disadvantaged

If he is right, heavily pregnant Jane Seymour — soon expecting the arrival of twins — must resign herself to living without a pair of pint-sized professors

The study analysed the birth dates of 2,525 top-scoring medical graduates at the University of Tokyo over the last quarter century, and found most of these gifted students were born in the summer

But British professor Steve Jones, winner of the Science Book Prize, says that he wants "a retrial" "I demand a large research grant to do my own study"

Professor Jones was born in March — as were Albert Einstein and John Major

Sometimes, parents cannot guide their baby's future from the womb Michael J Fox, Michelle Pfeiffer, Nicole Kidman and Tom Cruise, Isabella Rossellini, Kirstie Alley, Jamie Lee Curtis and Mia Farrow adopted some or all of their children

But even if their child's chances were blighted by a winter birth, there's hope for happiness ahead

Adoptive parents could even end up with a mini-Mozart — if the child begins musical studies before the age of 13

Edward Taub of the University of Alabama, says that up to the age of 13, children have a chance to excel in music After then, it's too late

"There is an abrupt change between ages 12 and 13 that appears to be quite dramatic," says Taub, who has studied magnetic images of the brains of children who play stringed instruments

He says the images demonstrate that larger and more complex neuron circuits form in violinists who started their training early in life than others who began later

Languages, too, are better learned in childhood After the age of 10, it is unlikely that a person can learn to speak a foreign language without an accent

But why do children need such early stimulation to achieve academic and artistic excellence? And why do so many neglected children develop into unhappy underachievers?

Studies show that the human brain is physically affected by early experiences, with connections between nerves being established during mental and physical stimulation

Dr Michael Meaney, a psychiatrist at McGill University in Montreal, also points out that a control point for the release of stress hormones is developed early on in infancy

People who experience high stress levels when young develop a highly reactive system, Meaney explains, while those raised in a calm environment have more placid systems

This means that every parent has the chance to improve their child's future

There is evidence that vital development of the brain begins in the womb Says Dr Carla Shatz, president of the Society for Neuroscience, "The nervous system isn't waiting for birth to flip a switch and get going"

And scientists agree that the human brain continues to develop after birth

For example, the frontal cortex — which may be involved in early and cognitive development — increases in metabolic activity at six to 24 months.

And according to experts, the specific areas of agitation are significant

Dr Geraldine Dawson, from the University of Seattle, links the reduced activity in an infant's left frontal lobe, and a corresponding agitation in the right lobe, with a severely depressed mother

This, she says, is because the left frontal lobe is activated when a person feels happiness or interest — the right lobe is stimulated by negative emotions

Says Dr Dawson "Our hunch is that there may be a critical period for emotional development between ages eight and 18 months

"This is when kids learn to regulate emotions It is when attachment forms"

Something as simple as touch can be vital in affecting the child's future

New York psychiatrist Dr Myron Hofer found that by licking their young, mother rats influenced their pup's heart rate, growth, immune system and temperature

Other researchers have discovered that baby rats over two weeks old develop fewer hormone receptors in their brains, and fail to grow normally, if they are deprived of this licking

Dr Hofer explains that human mothers, by holding, rocking, feeding and even looking at their babies, are helping to develop the child's brain

"The infant is laying down a mental representation of its relationship with its mother," says Dr Hofer of the first six months of life

"These interactions regulate the infant's neural mechanisms for behaviours and for feelings that are just beginning to develop"

So how does all this happen?

Dr Harry Chugani of the University of Michigan explains that when children are born, they have fewer synapses — connections between nerve cells — than adults

By the age of two, the child's synapses have reached adult levels and continue to increase from four to 10 years

Then, says Dr Chugani, they begin to drop until, by the age of 16, the child's synapses have stabilised at a typical adult level

From a genetic base, the brain has now been 'shaped' by experience — for better or worse

Dr Daniel Alkon, chief of the Neural Systems Laboratory at the National Institutes of Health in Maryland, says "We know that a child learns trust and self worth in the first two years When a parent neglects a baby on a daily basis, the child is conditioned to expect isolation A recipe for depression has been acquired from experience, handed down from one generation to another"

One special study of 45 neglected orphans, later adopted into loving families, demonstrates the legacy of suffering caused by maternal depravation

The Romanian orphans, victims of an oppressive political regime, were housed in poorly staffed institutions Unloved and understimulated, they were fed with cold bottles propped over their bodies

The children bore physical marks of their emotional suffering, some, aged 10, were closer to three-year-olds in appearance than their well-cared for counterparts

After adoption, the children's general health, weight, powers of communication and ability to function socially improved

The children still react poorly under stress, and weak emotional ties make them more likely to wander off with strangers than others of their age

But scientists hope that with tender love and care, the rescued Romanian orphans will have happy futures

Explains Dr Mary Carlson of Harvard University, "I think that if you believe in critical periods [of development], you can find ways to take advantage of that plasticity"

Dr Megan Gunner of the University of Minnesota agrees "The one thing we have learned is that children need to feel safe and protected That alone leads to appropriate biological growth"

Separate Lives

We all lead our separate lives entombed in our separate quiet ambiguities
And when sometimes our eyes meet
over a cup of coffee maybe we shudder with light from the departures shrill in our caught in an eyelid's reflection

Ourselves
amalgamate thoughts redress our dreams
under sweaters meet in lobby
We all lead our separate live

HUMOUR

MAID TO ORDER

Bikram Vohra on how to get yourself hired by domestics*

A friend of ours fell apart because the maid upped and left

"We are going crazy," he moaned over the phone, "How could she do this to us?"

She could She did And that is the way it is So many of us cannot take it, we have become far too dependent on help in the house Pretty soon, the roles will be totally reversed and employers will be interviewed

I can see it now, an ad in the classifieds section calling all prospective employers to line up for interviews between 10 am and noon at the Domestic Help agency and to please bring their testimonials with them

A room full of candidates waiting nervously to be called in by the maid and her tribunal It is your turn to be summoned

"Do sit down"

"Thank you"

"So, you want a maid"

"Yes, please"

"Why can't you do your own dirty work?"

"We have three children and my wife works so we find it very difficult"

"What sort of people are you?"

"I beg your pardon"

What sort of people are you, tell us about yourself, we can't just have our maids and houseboys working for anyone who came off road"

"No, of course not, you are right, one has to be careful these days"

"You can't imagine the kind of people we get looking for household help, things are so bad we can't trust anyone"

"Trust, trust is at a premium but we are a nice family, no really, we are caring and understanding and we don't mess up the place and we always leave some prawns for the maid or the cook"

"Hmmm, why have you changed domestics three times this year, it says here in your CV that one houseboy lasted only three weeks, would you like to explain?"

"You see, he was rude to me, he was rude to my wife, he was rude to the children and he made 10 cups of tea a day"

"You resent domestics having tea?"

"No I don't"

"It sounds as though you do, what sort of person are you who keeps count of how much tea is consumed"

"Sorry, I did not mean it that way, they are welcome to the tea, I'll stop counting, have all the tea they want, hahaha"

"It is not funny, human dignity is not a laughing matter, do you have any references from your last four domestics?"

"Well, I have one from my old gardener, he wrote saying he misses us"

"Show me please it says nothing about missing you, he says he misses the place and he also says you haven't kept your promise to get his son a job, are you the sort of person who makes promises he has no intentions of keeping just because pople are poor is no reason to exploit them"

"I am sorry, I did my best, I'll try again"

"What is your living accommodation like, does the maid get a separate room and what about TV rights?"

"We have a small set she can have"

"Colour?"

"No"

The interview board looks horrified One member laughs mirthlessly "Do you know this is 1995," he says

You cringe and promise to give your 31-inch set, "Just clear us a maid"

"It isn't that simple, we have to check you out and you have to fill in this form and bring us the addresses of two people whom know you, a salary certificate and a letter of recommendation from the last two domestics who worked for you"

"I don't know where they are," you say, accepting an eight-page comprehensive form

The questions pertain to working hours, rest hours, day off, overtime, workload parameters, extra duties, food preferences, termination benefits, recreation and medical responsibilities

Halfway into filling the form you throw your ball point pen into the air, fling aside the papers and say, "I don't want a maid or a houseboy"

"Whyever not?"

Because I want to sign up for being one, this is life, this is security, this is great ■

What is your idea of perfect happiness?
Peace, peace and more peace
What is your greatest fear?
That I'll wake up one day and find all my fears have come true
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?
My mother
What do you dislike most in others?
Hypocrisy
What do you dislike most in yourself?
My hypersensitivity
What is your most precious possession?
My mind, I never want to lose it
What objects do you always carry?
My Walkman, a book and some money
What makes you most depressed?
I can get that way for no reason at all
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
I'm okay, I guess
What is your favourite word?

University Blues

■ India still has a long way to go in streamlining its education system that will not only yield good results and produce bright students, but also weed out politics and other nefarious activities that pollute our campus ('One University, 8 Nobel Winners ', October 29)

We wonder at America producing the largest number of Nobel laureates The American system of education is so fashioned that it produces such scholars.

The biggest handicap for a student is funds and when that is available the student can give his/her best

The urgency to earn a degree is so strong here (to get employment at any cost) that students have very little option to explore their areas of interest

Paritosh Sanyal,
Calcutta

■ Till we get rid of politics in the campus we can never have a clean system of education in India Unionism, political rivalry and quotas are some of the banes of this system

No other country has witnessed students immolating themselves on the streets to protest a government decision to allow reservations

East-West Fusion

■ Whenever one thinks of fusion of Eastern and Western tunes in Indian music, two names immediately come to mind Salil Chowdhury and R D. Burman

I fully appreciate Gautam Bose's complaint (Post Mortem, November 12) that the Magazine has not done justice to RD by not publishing a cover story on him

Panchamda's compositions for films like Padosan, Amar Prem, Kati Patang, Aandhi, Masoom and Parichay will forever remain embedded in memory And whenever RD and Gulzar paired the result was sheer magic.

On his second death anniversary in January, the Magazine should pay homage to this great musical talent

COVER STORY

The sincerity of most activists to The Cause may be unquestioned, but the consequent pressures often take their toll even on other family members. Often, it has resulted in a broken marriage or a neglected child Seema Paul and Shameem Akthar spoke to some of the activists and their kin and discovered that in their frenetic dedication to the cause of society at large, they forgot to tie the shoelace of the little kid at home

The CAUSE and EFFECT

THE KHADI-CLAD, JHOLA-CARRYING ACTIVIST IS AN ECCEntric in the best of times. He goes about reforming society —rather an aspect of it—with such zest that all else seems trivial to him In the bargain, he not only forgets his own needs, sometimes he even rides roughshod over the feelings of those who immediately surround him: his own children or parents

Achieving a balance between his home life and his passion for societal reform seems well nigh impossible to him. Rather, he justifies the lack of it, saying that life cannot be compartmentalised. At times, he may end up forcing his worldview down the throats of young, impressionable children. And when he does not exactly do that, it may be that his children grow up so differently from him or her that all the preaching appears to be only for the public

Isn't it a hard life for the poor activist. always being judged by outsiders? Always having the dice loaded against himself in such public evaluations. But then his singleminded, tangential passion for social reform makes him or her all too vulnerable to such public nitpicking —even when his sincerity to the Big Cause may be beyond challenge!

Look at Medha Patkar: Pursuing the cause of the tribals of Narmada Valley with such zeal that nothing else seems to matter to her. Having given up her home, her city (Bombay) and a plush job with a foreign-funded, corporate style NGO that fetched her a good salary (and an Ambassador car to boot,) she now lives in the Valley like one of the tribals.

She even walked out of her marriage several years ago because she could not compromise on her societal responsibilities beyond a point.

Of course, there were temperamental differences as well which made them highly mismatched, according to Patkar, but activism was definitely a reason for the break-up.

Her ultimate goal in life now is to stop the mighty Sardar Sarovar dam. If that involves going on a hunger strike or plunging herself into the waters of the beautiful Narmada (calling it 'jal samadhi'), so what, she says. What her ageing parents and an architect brother living in Bombay feel about her decision, obviously does not matter enough to take her away from her mission

"After all," she reasons, "decisions such as these are taken by a democratic process within the Narmada Bachao Andolan and the family can have no role in it!"

This reply so put off her architect brother some years ago when he came down to Ferku-

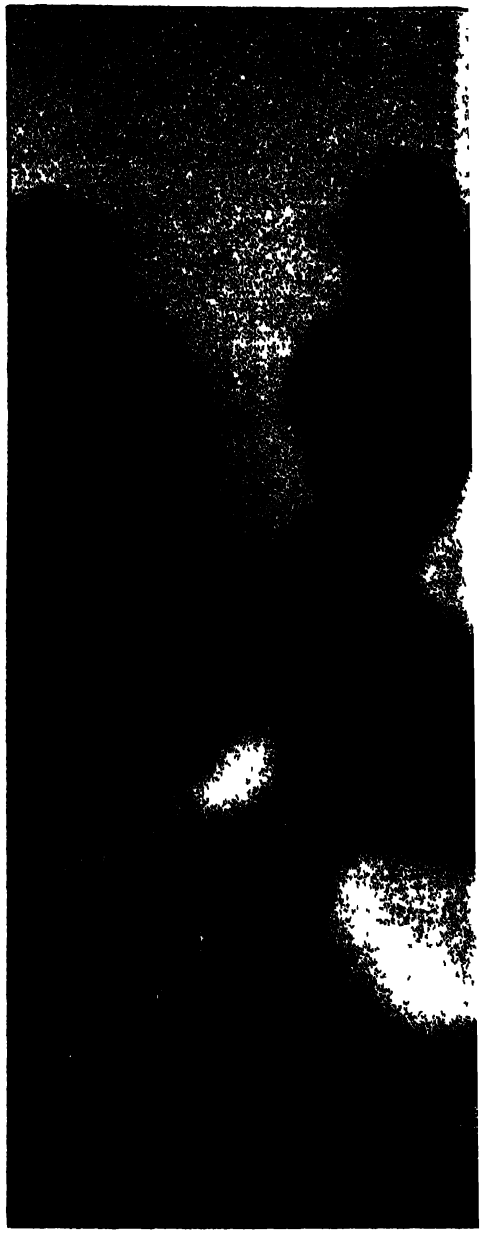
Vandana Shiva with her son. 'I never impose my views on my family'

'Someone,' reasons Indu Tai, 'has to work for the rural poor also. And some families must make sacrifices. If we have to be one of them, so be it!'

va to persuade her to give up her hunger strike, that he has since maintained a stony silence on her subsequent strikes Nor do her activist parents, Vasant and Indu Khanwilkar, on the other hand, dare to meddle with her affairs

Indu Tai, as her mother is lovingly addressed by those who know her, initially used to travel down to the Valley to sit by her side and quietly watch her daughter wither during the course of her fasts But she was always too afraid to tell her what to do

Over the years, however, she has resigned herself to the situation and does not tax her ageing body by undertaking harsh journeys But her concern for her daughter Medha's safety and security remains strong and she is forever trying to obtain information about her wellbeing on phone or through the NBA offices in Bombay



As for her father, he has even less courage to wean her away from her mission In her younger days when Medha worked in the slums, he would taunt her that she did not dare to go beyond the urban confines into the real India — the rural India — that desperately needed her Now he must put up with it "Someone, ' reasons Indu Tai, "has to work for the rural poor also And some families must make sacrifices If we have to be one of them, so be it!"

The other green activist, though of the globe-trotting variety, Vandana Shiva, also has a broken marriage behind her Shiva admits today that she married Jayanta Bandopadhyay, a scholar, for the wrong reasons

Their common passion for the Garhwal Himalayas and green activism brought them together, but these were obviously not sufficient ingredients for a successful marriage So it ended in an equally distasteful and acrimonious parting, which has even changed their once common worldview

Today Bandopadhyay has a very different interpretation, for example, of the Chipko movement and the long-standing dispute over the leadership claims of Sunderlal Bahuguna and Chandi Prashad Bhatt While Shiva continues to solidly back Bahuguna today even while giving the overall credit for the movement to the Garhwali women, Bandopadhyay has gone back from their common stance in favour of Bahuguna aired in an article in the Seminar magazine

Obviously, for this academic-activist couple it was a case of either agreeing on everything or nothing

Medha Patkar: Uncompromising

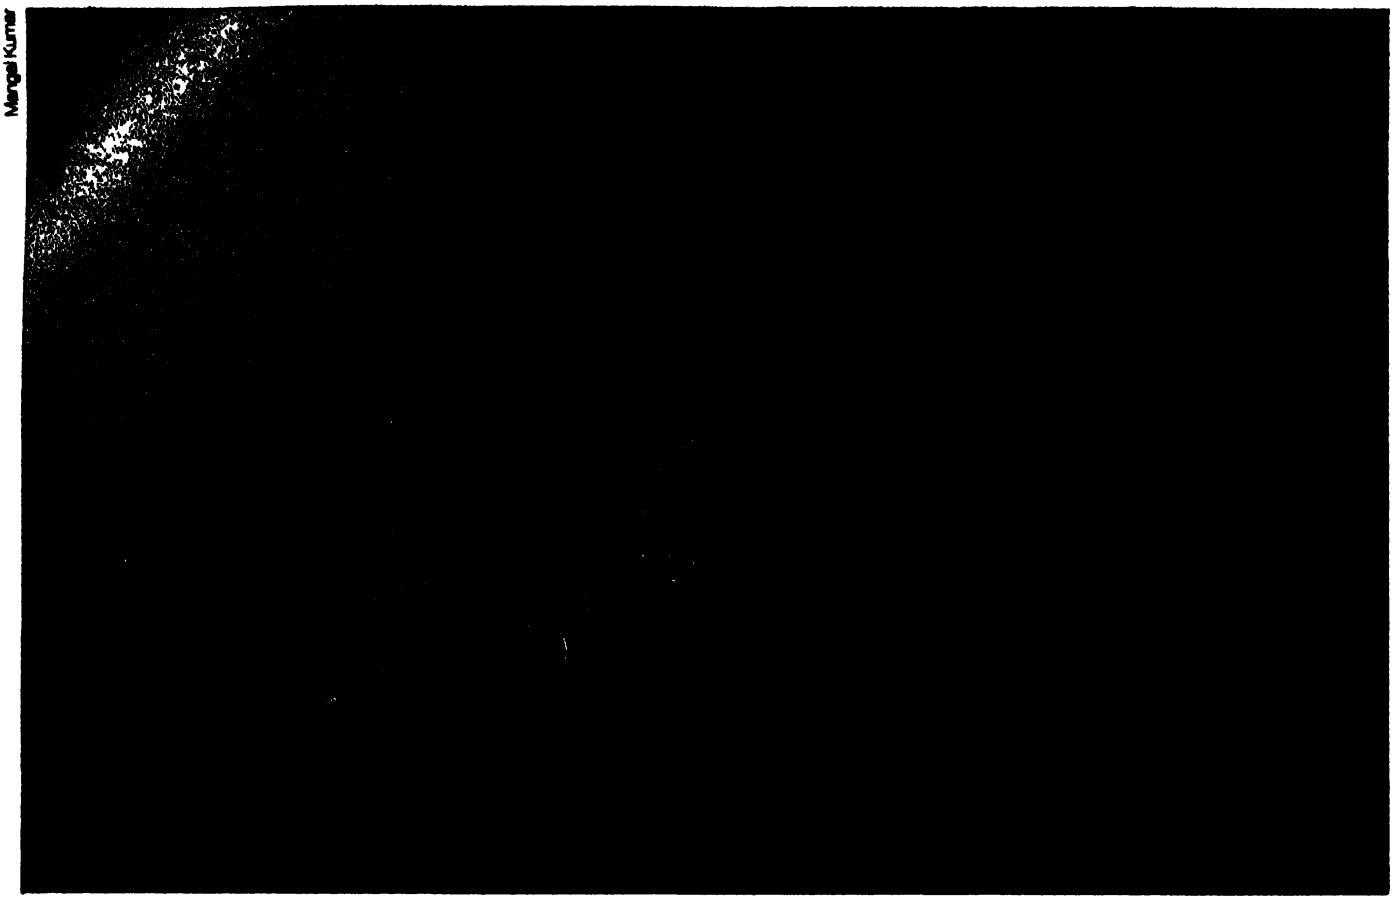
The custody of their only child, Kartike, was also a matter of dispute for a long time, until Shiva won the case She, however, seems to have spared the little boy from her environmental terrorism and given him the freedom to arrive at his own worldview

So much so that Kartike today seems to love all things that his mother is publicly opposing He likes Reebok shoes, Mercedez Benz cars and Hollywood movies! The only exception is the Kentucky Fried Chicken food which his mother is publicly opposing and he, too, does not like "I ate it once abroad," he says, "and I did not like its taste I prefer the Indian version served by Nirula's outlets in Delhi "

Inder Mohun with daughter: Doting on her father

Not that Kartike is totally unfamiliar with what his mother stands for He knows, for example, that Shiva is opposing multinational corporations because "they take away our markets" But, at the same time, he is drawn to some of the MNC products and consequently experiences conflicts which he cannot still resolve So he ends up saying, "I like Reebok shoes, but not the company We don't need the company, but we can take their shoes!"

An obviously embarrassed Shiva comments, "One cannot have a totally reductionist worldview Besides, I never impose my views on my family"



To her credit, however, Shiva has compromised heavily on her activism to look after her child Until, he was four years old, for example, she did not once leave him to attend a conference and even now, whenever possible, she takes him along Kartike, too, loves to travel, but his major complaint against his mother is that "she is too serious . She does not know how to have fun"

He obviously wants Shiva to take time off from her seminars to accompany him on sightseeing tours when they are abroad, but she hardly ever does that Another of his complaints is that she does not join him in the swim-

So he [Kartike Shiva] ends up saying, 'I like Reebok shoes, but not the company. We don't need the company, but we can take their shoes!'

Mangal Kumar

ming pool But Shiva feels this is his indirect way of telling her that she better make herself a more pleasant size to fit into a swimsuit!

Kartike's schoolmate, Varun Feroze Gandhi, probably harbours no such complaints against his mother But then we have no way of knowing because Maneka Gandhi will not allow him to be interviewed, no sir, and that's final Not, at any rate, until he is 17, she insists

But one thing is sure Unlike Shiva, Maneka Gandhi makes sure her son shares her beliefs

The grapevine has it that Varun is so starved for non-vegetarian food that he secretly asks his mother's friends for it But Maneka brushes that aside, saying people may say what they like but ' my son is a total veggie" And we'd better believe it

As for his attitude towards animals, Maneka claims, "It's 100 per cent correct He has a beautiful relationship with animals because he has literally grown up with them And he's known no other way of treating them than giving them love and affection " Those who have met Varun say he is forever telling his classmates what is right and what is wrong — very much like his mom! At this stage, he seems like a replica of Maneka

If the passions of the green activists are thus running deeper into their families, it is hardly different for those pursuing other brands of activism Take the case of the pioneering woman activist, Veena Mazumdar, who was the member of the first group that wrote the 'Status of Women' report in India Long before she turned into a feminist, she had met and married Shankar Mazumdar, an aspiring professional singer and changed the 'J' in her surname to a 'Z'

They produced a brood of four — three daughters and a son — but Veena Mazumdar has made sure that each of her children, specially the daughters, have inherited her strong activist streak The eldest daughter, Shaswati has been involved in teachers' politics at Delhi University for a long time and is currently the general-secretary of the elected teachers association there

Indrani, the second daughter, is a wholetimer with the C PI(M), the third one, Ranjini, makes documentaries on — no prizes for guessing — women's issues and the son was active in student politics at the Jawaharlal Nehru University until he took up a teaching assignment at the Delhi University!

Not surprisingly, in the Mazumdar household the only one who stands out for being different is the father An artiste by temperament and uninvolved with activism, he is able to take an objective view of what he calls are the "lost causes" being pursued by the

Having lived and worked with psychoanalysts in France, she [Meenakshi Mohun] ... candidly confesses that her initial years were lonely and tearful rest of his family

"I am always telling my children and my wife," he says, "that there is no point in frittering away energy as activists The issues may be serious, but they produce no results After all, they are all working in small, diffused pockets which cannot achieve anything concrete unless a big change takes place!"

Undoubtedly, Mazumdar shares his family's leftist ideology, but has refused to get into their activist mould And one reason for that could be that he wished to retain his own identity in the midst of four staunch feminists in his family

His other great problem with his family's activism, Shaswati confided, was that he could not take the disorder in the house, which is an inevitable result of his brood's preoccupation with lost causes Shankar Mazumdar is forever directing his daughters to give more time and attention to the household and handing them shopping lists to keep the house running smoothly

Cooking, surprisingly is not a major worry in this house as everybody is a willing contributor But the family is specially fond of some special recipes, which were improvised and perfected by Shankar Mazumdar when Veena had taken off for London for two years along with their two daughters (the other two had not arrived then) for higher studies!

One of them is the 'Mazumdar Khichri' and, according to Shaswati, it has proportions of dal and rice reversed because those were the quantities available in the house when he set out to make it in the absence of his family!

With all these oddities, the Mazumdars are obviously one big happy family

Being son to Asghar Ali Engineer, the reformist Bohra leader, has not been easy for Irfan It was not easy when he was a child and it is not easy now that he is 33 But if Divinity asks him to choose his father in his next life he would still plum for Engineer Senior

"I used to feel resentful of the ostracism that came our [his sister, Seema, and himself] way because father was openly critical of the system in the Bohra community We knew we were ostracised because our relatives, who loved us, used to be embarrassed when we visited them. But strangely, my resentfulness was never directed at my father," recalls Irfan.

He remembers how his relatives were willing to 'forgive' the children for the 'folly' of the father. When Irfan visited them he would be treated with a deep fondness that metamorphosed into nervous embarrassment if other, more critical members from the community arrived Tiny Irfan would be bundled away from sight, either cowering under the bed or into the tiled bathroom till these orthodox visitors left Irfan and his sister had to lie under the bed and count the cobwebs even if it meant an hour or more and were let out only after the 'all-clear' was signalled

If he rewinds on such memories from childhood, his youth was no different In the Eighties, when Engineer had organised a dogma-challenging reformist meeting, Irfan remembers that the Bohra leader, Syedna's men, standing outside the venue pouring vitriol at his father. "There was police bandobust because father was receiving so many threat calls. My friend and I slipped out for a cup of tea when we were attacked by the Syedna's men I had to be taken to the hospital for treatment "

Though Irfan refused to identify his attackers because he feared he may point out the wrong men, the police insisted on filing a case But the assaulters pleaded with Irfan who interceded on their behalf In this generous gesture, as in his later activism, Irfan sees not himself but the rebirth of his father's ideals "Father was always busy Apart from his reformist activism, he was also leader of the engineers' union at the Bombay Municipal Corporation He was forever organising meetings and agitations Many of his activist friends visited our home and I was allowed to hover around In a way, father always had treated me like an adult and was willing to answer my questions on these issues which were close to his heart Due to this I never felt that he did not spend enough time with us Though my mother was justifiably resentful of all this, I was very proud of my father," says Irfan

There were no vacation time together, no birthday parties and no family outings The only vacation that the Engineer family indulged in was a trip to Kashmir "But even that was hardly a holiday Dad was busy meeting leaders and trying to find out about the problems in the valley," says Irfan, who naturally trudged through snow and slush, following in his father's footsteps, learning alongside

Maybe there were no outings and get-togethers But there was a lot of cerebral interaction that used to give the little Irfan a high. After all. when Emergency struck India he was among the few kids who knew what it was all about He recalls strutting around in school, slightly cocky, explaining to his ignoramus classmates what Emergeny meant When other kids were burrowing into childish books like Enid Blyton, he knew what Marxism was all about

"But," laughs Irfan, "I used to hate reading Lenin " Whenever father had free time he would take out the tomes on Leninism, eager to read out portions to the child who hated it "At that time I used to wonder why he could not just sit and chat with me, instead of reading about somebody I did not want 'o know about "

But also along the way, he was proud to be made involved with his father's interests On such things he knew not only more than his classmates, but often more than his teachers Did he not smirk when his class 7 teacher taught him that communism was 'evil' and did he not find it trite when she said that communism meant 'wearing uniform throughout life'?

"Though father never felt frightened for himself, he became fearful for me when I became an activist," says Irfan who plunged into activism like a duck to water Though Engineer had himself introduced Irfan to student activists, he was critical of his son getting involved in the movement for alternative polity (for empowerment of the rural masses) at the expense of his studies And later, when Irfan was arrested under the National Securities Act in Gujarat for protesting against police shoot-out of a Dang tribal woman, Engineer was even more disturbed

Though Engineer never spoke about it, Irfan was to find out that he was actually proud of his son "His friends used to tell me that he was constantly talking about me while I was in prison We share a deep affection and rapport as all my letters from jail will show Now that my activism is keeping me busy I can sense that he is missing me He feels that I should spend more time at home," smiles Irfan. The roles are reversed now Though both will continue to miss each other, busy as they are in their different paths in life, they would not have it any other way

The same is true of the Patwardhan family. Anand Patwardhan, the fiery filmmaker who has notched a special place for himself in the creative world for the activist statements of his films, is again too immersed in his activism to even think of marriage, much to the regret of his mother, the well-known potter, Nirmala Patwardhan

"Both of us are very busy with our individual lives But both are proud of each other. The only regret that I feel sometimes is that I have no grandchildren, while all my friends are either grandmothers or great-grandmothers," sighs the mother

But freedom of choice was the luxury that she had allowed Patwardhan even when he was a child And she was not going to change it now While she lives in Pune with her husband, Patwardhan lives in Bombay, where his Ekta Samiti (an organisation for societal peace) and surakksha samitis try to heal the deep, riot-induced lacerations on the psyche of the people

When she returns to Pune, after her short Bombay sojourn, Nirmala Patwardhan will engross herself in her favourite pastime — pottering around As she grows older, she only finds out that there is more work to be done in the field of her choice She has now been given a senior fellowship to transform the Chinese clay to Indian And then she has her students, young kids eager to imbibe her artistry

Perhaps, her son had picked up the notion of fierce independence and freedom of choice from her? No, she observes, Anand had always been an independent child and was never influenced by anyone, though his family has many examples that he could have chosen from His uncles are the freedom-fighters, Achyut and Raosaheb Patwardhan "I remember that even as a young boy Anand would argue with his uncle about national issues For instance, when Achyut Patwardhan had urged him to join the march to ban the N-bomb, he had argued vehemently against it Yes, Anand always had a mind of his own"

Which is why the family never got to know that Anand had planned to study abroad till his ASAT exams results were declared — and the family learnt that their Anand, who normally managed just to scrape through college exams, had stood second in entire Asia

"I myself was no academic and it had never bothered me that Anand was not academically inclined After his superb results in the exams he applied for and got half scholarships

Deshakalyan Chowdhury

Anand Patwardhan: Fighting it out, alone to American universities, where within six months he earned full scholarship It was his American trip that changed him Yes, he had become more Indian than before and was also determined to fight the battles for the downtrodden," she says

That choice meant no marriage It also meant facing threat calls and abuse But while she is fearful for him, she takes great pains to hide her fears from him She says, "After all, accidents happen in ordinary lives, too One cannot allow such fears to cloud one's choice And while I am worried for him I will never stop him doing from what he wants to do"

Patwardhan is equally protective about his mother Worried that some questions may kindle her fears for him, he requests that these are knocked off the interview

It is touching to see how both son and mother believe that each has succeeded in shielding the other From fears that each senses for the other

The path of an activist may be lonely But such familial ties is what makes their choice relevant A deep caring that extends from a few within a family to many outside it

Unfortunately, the same cannot be said for Inder Mohun, the well-known human rights activist who got confined to a flat by a paralytic stroke more than a year ago Inder Mohun had an extremely unhappy childhood in which he was separated from his mother In hindsight, he believes that it was a search for emotional comfort that led him to activism

While that in itself was not a bad choice, the consequent choice of his partner became his life's biggest mistake In 1944, he married Sumitra, with whom he shared the common bond of activism Sumitra was involved in rural welfare and women's movement in Kashmir, but as soon as they started living together, personal differences came to the forefront and they had to part very soon

By then, however, they had had Meenakshi, their only child, who suffered the trauma of witnessing her parents' separation and also bore the brunt of it Having lived and worked with psychoanalysts in France, she is now able to look at her own and her father's situation extremely well and candidly confesses that her initial years were lonely and tearful and she was almost treated like a ping-pong ball by her parents

Her mother initially took her to London, but realising that she would be best in her own cultural environment, packed her off to her father who had a hard time coping with the responsibilities of looking after her while being passionately involved with activism!

Her difficult childhood has left its stamp on her life and Meenakshi feels she has never been able to realise her best potential due to her 'inner problems But her mature vision has allowed her to take the blame away from her individual parents, so that today there are no unhappy moments in her relationship with her father

Rather, Meenakshi is a daughter who dotes on her father and is forever telling her father that he did the best he could for her in the circumstances So things have turned out well for Inder Mohun in his later years Yet, if there is a lesson that he wishes to be learnt from his life, it is that activists must strive for a balance between Home and The Cause

"Activism," he says, "has its own glamour, but family responsibility is extremely important I have realised very late that I could have had a balance in my life" ■

One Above the Rest

Biologists are always looking at animals to define and explain them But what if animals were to turn round and ask what makes a biologist? They could do worse than look at Ed Wilson, professor at Harvard University, who has just written his autobiography entitled simply Naturalist Wilson has two Pulitzer prizes The first was for what he calls his magnum opus The Ants, his definition of a magnum opus being book heavy enough to kill a man if dropped from a three-storey building. The second was for a thought ful discussion on On Human Nature But these books form only a fraction of his works

What brought him to biology as a skinny child with a slightly receding chin was circumstance His parents' divorce in 1937 when he was seven left him with a gypsy existence mainly spent with his father The Old South, in and around Alabama where he lived was full of natural beauty and his outdoor world was solid and constant compared to the instability of his home

He became fascinated by nature and was exploring a beach when he caught the pinfish which he yanked out so recklessly that one of its spines pierced his eye Left with limited sight, his gaze naturally turned towards things which crawled on the ground and to the study of insects.

His bad eyesight also assured he could never join the Army But the army and the scouts did give him the values which he relied on throughout his academic career

He loved the hard work, sacrifice and devotion to duty he saw in the military and the practical ethics of the scouts He writes, "The people I find it easiest to admire are those who concentrate all the courage and self-discipline they possess toward a single worthy goal explorers, mountain climbers and a very few scientists Science is modern civilisation's highest achievement, but it has few heroes " For some of these minds at play he shows contempt, despising "the arrogance and doting self-regard" he frequently finds among the great

From his own story it seems that from childhood he chose what he considered the heroes path, and by the age of 16 had already chosen his area of specialisation– ants They took him to the University of Alabama and thence to Harvard

There are probably between one and 10 million billion ants in the world, all of them together weighing about the same as the totality of human beings They have been dominant insects for 50 million years, and if they died out, tens of thousands of other plant and animal species associated with them would perish

So Wilson the explorer-naturalist had plenty to discover One of his breakthroughs was in the field of sociobiology how the working of animal societies is dependent on the biology of those animals He proved that ants, which can neither smell nor taste, lay chemical trails to food, which are followed by other ants, and remove corpses from their nests not because they don't move any more but because after a few days they give off oleic acid

There are probably between one and 10 million billion ants in the world, all of them together weighing about the same as the totality of human beings. They have been dominant insects for 50 million years

Sociobiology fascinated Wilson and made him resolve to write a book not just about insects, but also about other social animals including ourselves

Putting humans among the animals as conditioned by genes enraged Marxist academics at Harvard, some of whom accused him of supporting ideas which led to the establishment of gas chambers in Nazi Germany.

Wilson was appalled, but perhaps this gives another clue to the secret of a successful biologist– he was, from the first, given an ivory tower from which to pursue his interests His started in the segregated, white world of the South and went on to the then male-dominated academic world where the biggest threat to his existence was the discovery of DNA, which for some years eclipsed the role of biologists who worked with units larger than the molecule The political and social issues of his day, completely passed him by, and it was only the sociobiology debate during which demonstrators dowsed him with iced water that led him to read Marx

However, he still stuck to his views, and later works on our selfish genes seem to have proved him right His tunnel-visioned devotion to his science is also clear in the way he came to environmentalism as he says, unforgivably late, in 1980

Wilson gives a final clue to what makes a successful biologist with his advice to young scientists. To stand out from the rest, he says, choose disciplines which are not widely explored In a world with no real wildernesses left, he himself would now chose microbial ecology, as there are pristine environments still to be found lying within a handful of soil

SELF HYPNOSIS

FOR SELF IMPROVEMENT THROUGH AUDIO CASSETTES BY PRADEEP AGARWAL

Pradeep Agarwal, member of the Hypnosis Hall of Fame Guild, U.S.A. and head of the Institute of Mind Control & Development, has been conducting lectures and workshops for the past 20 years in India and abroad with remarkable success. More than seven thousand people have attended his workshops and claim marvelous changes in their lives.

Pradeep Agarwal presents 12 audio cassettes, each endowed with such techniques to help you to change your life. Each cassette is prepared to solve a specific, focussed purpose and is scientifically created by blending alpha-mind music and carefully developed suggestions.

Everyone lives in the world of their thoughts and these thoughts have energy. Positive thoughts attract positive results. Negative thoughts attract negative results. Through methods of relaxation, visualization, affirmations and subliminal persuasion, you can discover how to tap into the vast storehouse of creative energy that is buried within your subconscious mind and put that energy to work for you!

Side B of all cassettes, which consists of subliminal suggestions inter-woven with music can however be listened to by you at anytime and at any place. You could be involved in any activity without focussing your concentration on the music for the suggestions to work. This is because we have used a sophisticated audio-technology so that while you only hear the music, your subconscious mind, without your knowledge listens to the subliminal suggestions being suitably affected by them in the intended positive ways.

All you have to do is select a calm & quiet place where you won't be disturbed for half an hour, sit down comfortably and play the cassette of your choice on a good music system, preferably using headphones.

01 HOW TO MASTER SELF-HYPNOSIS

This cassette comprises of the fundamental initiation to self-hypnosis. The music and the voice of Pradeep Agarwal guide you to a very deep state of relaxation and programme your sub-conscious mind to enable you to enter this wonderful state of self-hypnosis. The technique used is called 'Progressive Relaxation'. The cassette also programmes you to enter this state instantly at any time you want.

Side B of this cassette consists of 'Visualization Induction', a technique that is very helpful to enter self-hypnosis.

By the time you finish listening to this cassette you would have become a master in self-hypnosis!

02 RELIEVE STRESS AND ANXIETY

This cassette guides you to the state of deep hypnotic relaxation and suggestions are given to programme you for remaining calm, composed and wise in the midst of any tense & stressful situation.

03 ATTAIN SUCCESS AND CONFIDENCE

Success, be it in any field, needs confidence as its necessary backbone. This cassette develops your confidence to a supercharged state so that success becomes your second nature. So get set on your way to super-confidence!

04 GENERAL HEALING

A cassette of extra-ordinary power. Listeners have reported amazing cures of mental and physical ailments through this cassette. It enables you to heal yourself of all ailments.

05 PEACEFUL IMAGERY

A wonderful cassette of guided meditation which guides you to various peaceful mental imageries in the form of beautiful landscapes to help you relax and remain calm in any stressful situation.

06 ASTRAL PROJECTION

This cassette enables you to experience what is commonly called an "out-of-body experience". You are guided to project yourself out of your body, visit places and observe what's going on at the different locations. Later you return to your physical body safely. A very powerful exercise for your mind.

07 STOP SMOKING FOREVER

There is hardly any need to elaborate on the importance of this cassette. Surveys suggest that more than 80% of smokers want to quit but can't. This cassette enables you to uproot the nicotine habit forever and become a non-smoker.

08 PAST LIFE REGRESSION

Have you lived before? If so, where? And when? Who were you? Man or a woman? Pradeep Agarwal has guided thousands into vivid memories of their past lives and thereby gain an understanding of their present lives. The cassette contains the same technique he uses in his workshop.

09 DEVELOP PSYCHIC POWERS

Everyone has E.S.P. The knowledge and use of them can benefit you immensely – far beyond your present abilities. This cassette enables you to tap the powers hidden deep inside your sub-conscious mind. Each successive listening will develop your psychic powers a step further.

10 IMPROVE MEMORY

This cassette, specially developed for students, enables you to improve your memory and concentration. It also contains a special session to erase examination phobia so that you can remain calm, confident and remember everything at the examination hall and score with flying colours!

11 LOSE WEIGHT

Sick of hearing nicknames like "fatso", "fatty" or "hippo"? Tired of carrying those obnoxious tyres around your torso? Get your sub-conscious mind programmed to burn off the fat for good – for ever.

12 ATTAIN WEALTH AND PROSPERITY

An amazing cassette that has helped thousands to shed their blocks of inferiority complex and develop a powerful and magnetic personality to attract fame and wealth.

EXTRACT

The Angry, Young REINDEER

BY JAMES FINN GARNER

Extracted from Politically Correct Holiday Stories by James Finn Garner; Simon & Schuster; India Book Distributors, £6.99

The story of Rudolph is a familiar one to most of the pre-adults in America and other parts of the Western world (not that this fact is an endorsement of Western culture, just an acknowledgement that the publicity and merchandising machines run more efficiently in those areas) While the image of an eager young reindeer cheerfully giving his all for Santa Claus might be useful to department stores and jingle writers, the truth of his story is more complicated

It's true that from birth Rudolph was a unique individual, that his luminescent olfactory organ made him different from (but not inferior to) the other reindeer in his age category, and that they often maliciously taunted him about his supra-nasal capabilities Some reindeer caregivers, concerned that his nose had resulted from radioactive fallout or was somehow contagious, warned their fawns not to play with him

What is not true is that Rudolph was disappointed to be so ostracised While his parents successfully fought to have him schooled alongside the other young bucks and does, Rudolph always fancied himself an outsider In fact, he worked to cultivate his image as an "angry young reindeer" He had no interest in the other reindeer and their inane games He took himself and his fluorescent gift seriously and convinced he had a higher calling in this life. to improve the fortunes of the working reindeer and overthrow the oppressive tyranny of Santa Claus

For untold years, the success of Santa's toy-making monopoly depended on the co-option and exploitation of both the reindeer and elf populations. To this end, his most important criteria for the reindeer in his team were strong legs, a ten-point rack, and minimal gray matter (The fact that he only recruited bucks for his team and excluded the does is cause for more outrage — Santa insisted it was to protect the morale of the enlisted bucks — but unfortunately, in Rudolph's time, the does were still awaiting their liberatrix)

To Santa, Rudolph was one of the Northland's most dangerous creatures a reindeer with a brain He had seen a few during his years at the Pole, but there was something about Rudolph that made him specially nervous It might have been the deer's standoffish attitude, or the rumours that he was organising meetings with the other reindeer late at night Santa also sensed a charisma in Rudolph that, if not kept in proper check, might disrupt his tidy little enterprise

And so it was that, on that fabled foggy evening, Santa found himself in a bind. Harsh weather conditions left him unable to exploit the aerodynamic talents of his team. He had of course flown them through all sorts of dangerous weather before, with no thought to the deer's physical strain or mental trauma. But on this night the weather was so tempestuous that the bearded slave driver was fearful for his own safety and for the insurance headaches that a crash at his own toy works would certainly create

Although Santa had known for years about Rudolph's gift for incandescent dissemination, he had not called special attention to it. In due time, Santa selfishly calculated, a use for it would arise, and until then there was no need to tip off how valuable Rudolph's skill might prove to be. That moment had finally arrived. On that foggy night, he sought out Rudolph among the herd and, wearing his humblest and most pleading face, asked him, "Rudolph, with your nose so bright, won't you guide my sleigh tonight?"

The young reindeer looked him over carefully After a few moments of silence, he said, "No."

Santa blinked a few times and repeated, "No?" The herd could scarcely believe its ears as well

"No. Not without concessions," replied the creature who happened to be antlered "The days when we jump every time you whistle are over "

"What are you talking about, concessions?" blustered Santa, who hadn't planned on this twist "This is your big break, your chance to join the team This is the life's dream of every young reindeer "

Rudolph laughed "This is starting to sound like A Star is Born Next you're going to tell me, 'Kid, you're going out there a nervous young buck, but you're coming back a star '"

The herd all chuckled at this remark Perhaps such a gung-ho speech was all too familiar to them Santa reddened, realising he'd made a tactical error in approaching this young firebrand in public He said, "It's cold out here Why don't we talk this over inside my chalet I have some very good moss and lichens, just picked "

"I'll eat what everyone else eats," countered Rudolph, "and whatever you have to say to me, you can say out here " The other reindeer were watching this face-off with great interest For years, they had treated Rudolph with suspicion for all his bold ideas, but now he was bravely sticking up for them at the expense of his own career Some shouted encouragement, while the more reactionary deer grumbled about not rocking the kayak

Santa began to feel some pressure as the minutes ticked away and the fog grew thicker Finally he asked Rudolph what his demands were

"You work the reindeer too hard, with no consideration for our families," Rudolph said "We want a guarantee of no work on holidays "

For the next 30 minutes, Santa tried to explain the disadvantages of this idea, the main one being, of course, that the reindeer only worked one night a year anyway, and since that night always fell on a holiday, such a change would make their jobs (and his) rather difficult to fulfill Rudolph eventually agreed to table the issue for the time being

Checking his watch, Santa was starting to sweat, even in the Arctic cold "Could we speed this up?" he asked "Or maybe forge a temporary working agreement that we can make permanent after Christmas?"

Rudolph snorted in his face "We weren't born yesterday, Claus No contract, no flight If Christmas doesn't come this year, who do you think the children will blame? The reindeer? The weather? The Interstate Commerce Commission? No, they'll blame the overfed guy in the red suit "

Santa imagined the public relations headaches this would cause him, and his frame began to sag Rudolph grilled him on such issues as health care, paternity leave, profit sharing, and joint decision-making councils. As the fog refused to lift and the minutes ticked away, Santa granted more and more of the deer's demand

In the end, Rudolph and the reindeer rank-and-file could claim a number of victories The deer would be required to fly only one night a year, and after four hours on the job, they would receive a 90-minute dinner break and three 15-minute breaks Santa was required to keep four alternate reindeer on standby for the duration of Christmas Eve at full pay and benefits In addition, the mandatory retirement age was lowered to eight years, after which the reindeer were to receive a full pension and lifetime health care.

After the terms were finalised, an exhausted but relieved Santa Claus hitched Rudolph up with the rest of the team. The other deer gave Rudolph three cheers for standing up for their rights against "the man", which the nasally empowered reindeer, feeling fulfilled for the first time, gratefully accepted. Using his unique luminescent gift, he led the sleigh through the inhospitable weather and Christmas that year was saved.

Epilogue

Like the fabled prophet in his own land, however, Rudolph found his real influence evaporating soon after that For weeks he was praised by all the other reindeer, who told him, "You'll go down in history/her story!" All the attention and admiration, however, began to feel superficial and distracting Rudolph felt that any lionisation of him would take energy away from the continuing fight for the wellbeing of the working reindeer. In a facile attempt to emulate their new hero, the other young reindeer began to wear bright red coverings on their noses. When Rudolph expressed his displeasure with this, some muttered that he was becoming too humorless and doctrinaire

To Rudolph, this first agreement with Santa was to be just the beginning. He envisioned the eventual creation of a working reindeer's paradise, a toy-making and distribution collective where the means of production were shared by everyone Unfortunately, many of the other reindeer began to take their newly won benefits as their inviolable right, bestowed by nature. They grew fat on too much moss and complained that their improved work schedules were still too taxing. Factions began to form among them about the best ways to invest their new pension fund. Rudolph tried to convince the dissident deer that they needed to stand united, but they began to resent his holier-than-thou attitude Some spread the rumour that he was an agent provocateur, sent by other aeronautically gifted animals seeking to gain Santa's favour and put the deer out of their jobs While such theories were patently absurd, they served to discredit Rudolph and embolden his dectractors. Eventually, he was voted out of the union he had helped establish After this indignity, Rudolph decided to strike off for Lapland, where he felt the undomesticated reindeer were more in control of their own future.

And so, like other revolutionaries before him, Rudolph the angry young reindeer lived out the rest of his days in exile, bitterly wondering how a movement with such promise could prove to be so fragile in the end ■

The Broken Angel

I can still picture the little Dilaram bazaar as I first saw it 20 years ago Hanging on the hem of Aunt Mariam's sari, I had followed her along the sunlit length of the dusty road and up the wooden staircase to her rooms above the barber's shop

There were number of children playing in the road, and they all stared at me They must have wondered what my dark, black haired aunt was doing with a strange child who was fairer than most She did not bother to explain my presence, and it was several weeks before the bazaar people learned something of my origins

Aunt Mariam, my mother's younger sister, was at that time about 30 She came from a family of Christian converts, originally Muslims of Rampur My mother had married an Englishman, who died while I was still a baby, she herself was not a strong woman, and fought a losing battle with tuberculosis while bringing me up

My sixth birthday was approaching when she died, in the middle of the night, without my being aware of it, and I woke up to experience, for a day, all the terrors of abandonment

But that same evening Aunt Mariam arrived Her warmth, worldliness and carefree chatter gave me the reassurance I needed so badly She slept beside me that night and next morning, after the funeral, took me with her to her rooms in the bazaar This small flat was to be my home for the next year-and-a-half

Before my mother's death I had seen very little of my aunt From the remarks I occasionally overheard, it appeared that Aunt Mariam had, in some indefinable way, disgraced the family. My mother was cold towards her, and I could not help wondering why because a more friendly and cheerful extrovert than Aunt Mariam could hardly be encountered

There were other relatives, but they did not come to my rescue with the same readiness. It was only later, when the financial issues became clearer, that innumerable uncle and aunts appeared on the scene

The age of six is the beginning of an interesting period in the life of a boy, and the months I spent with Aunt Mariam are not difficult to recall She was a joyous, bubbling creature — a force of nature rather than a woman — and every time I think of her I am tempted to put down on paper some aspect of her conversation, or her gestures, or her magnificent physique

She was a strong woman, taller than most men in the bazaar, but this did not detract her from her charms Her voice was warm and deep, her face was a happy one, broad and unlined, and her teeth gleamed white in the dark brilliance of her complexion

She had large, soft breasts, long arms and broad thighs She was majestic, and at the same time she was graceful Above all, she was warm and full of understanding

She called me Ladla, her darling, and told me she had always wanted to look after me She had never married I did not, at that age, ponder the reasons for her single state At six I took all things for granted and accepted Mariam for what she was — my benefactress and guardian angel

Her rooms were untidy compared with the neatness of my mother's house. Mariam revelled in untidiness I soon grew accustomed to the topsy-turviness of her rooms and found them comfortable Beds (hers a very large and soft one) were usually left unmade.

A large watercolour hung on a wall, but Mariam's bodice and knickers were usually suspended from it, and I cannot recall the subject of the painting The dressing table was a fascinating place, crowded with all kinds of lotions, mascaras, paints, oil and ointments

Mariam would spend much time sitting in front of the mirror running a comb through her long black hair, or preferably having young Mulia, a servant girl, comb it for her Though a Christian, my aunt retained several Muslim superstitions, and never went into the open with her hair falling loose

Once Mulia came into the rooms with her own hair open "You ought not to leave your hair open Better knot it," said Aunt Mariam

"But I have not yet oiled it, Aunty," replied Mulia "How can I put it up?"

"You are too young to understand There are jinns — aerial spirits — who are easily attracted by long hair and pretty black eyes like yours "

"Do jinns visit human beings, Aunty?"

"Learned people say so Though I have never seen a jinn myself, I have seen the effect they can have on one "

"Oh, do tell about them," said Mulia

"Well, there was once a lovely girl like you, who had a wealth of black hair," said Mariam "Quite unaccountably she fell ill, and in spite of every attention and the best medicines, she kept getting worse. She grew as thin as a whipping post, her beauty decayed, and all that remained of it till her dying day was her wonderful head of hair "

Some nights she had me sleep with her, other nights (I often wondered why) she gave me a bed in an adjoining room, although I much preferred remaining with her — specially since, on cold January nights, she provided me with considerable warmth.

At first I resented the nocturnal visitors that Aunt Mariam frequently received, their arrival meant that I had to sleep in the spare room with Leila. But when I found that these people were impermanent creatures, mere ships that passed in the night, I learned to put up with them

I seldom saw those men, though occasionally I caught a glimpse of a beard or an expensive waistcoat or white pyjamas. They did not interest me very much, though I did have a vague idea that they provided Aunt Mariam with some sort of income, thus enabling her to look after me

Once, when one particular visitor was very drunk, Mariam had to force him out of the flat

She thrust him out onto the landing, and then he lost his footing and went tumbling downstairs No damage was done, and the man called on Mariam again a few days later, very sober and contrite, and was readmitted to my aunt's favours

Aunt Mariam must have begun to worry about the effect these comings and goings might have on me, because after a few months she began to make arrangements for sending me to a boarding school.

I had not the slightest desire to go to school and raised many objections We had long arguments in which she tried vainly to impress upon me the desirability of receiving an education

"To make a living, my Ladla," she said.

"But you have no education," I said, "and you have no difficulty in making a living!"

Mariam threw up her arms in mock despair "Ten years from now I will not be able to make such a living. Then who will support and help me? An illiterate young fellow, or an educated gentleman?"

Finally I succumbed to her arguments and agreed to go to a boarding school.

My incarceration in a boarding school was made more unbearable by the absence of any letters from Aunt Mariam. She could write little more than her name

I was looking forward to my winter holidays and my return to Aunt Mariam and the Dilaram bazaar, but this was not to be During my absence there had been some litigation over my custody, and my father's relatives claimed that Aunt Mariam was not a fit person to be a child's guardian

And so when I left school, it was not to Aunt Mariam's place that I was sent, but to a strange family living in a railway colony near Moradabad I remained with these relatives until I finished school; but this is a different story

I did not see Aunt Mariam again The Dilaram bazaar and my beautiful aunt and the Siamese cat all became part of the receding world of my childhood

I would often think of Mariam, but as time passed she became more remote and inaccessable in my memory It was not until many years later, when I was a young man, that I visited the Dilaram bazaar again I knew from my foster parents that Aunt Mariam was dead

I was anxious to see the Dilaram bazaar and its residents again, but my visit was a disappointment The place had disappeared; or rather it had been swallowed up by a growing city

It was lost in the complex of a much larger market which had sprung up to serve a new government colony The older people had died, and the young ones had gone to colleges or factories or offices in different towns Aunt Mariam's rooms had been pulled down

I found her grave in the little cemetery on the town's outskirts One of her more devoted admirers had provided a handsome gravestone, surmounted by a sculptured angel One of the wings had broken off, and the face was chipped, which gave the angel a slightly crooked smile

But in spite of the broken wing and the smile, it was a very ordinary stone angel and could not hold a candle to my Aunt Mariam, the special guardian angel of my childhood.

IN SANTA LAND

Santa's Lapland home has a workshop, sleds, a post office and even the red-nosed reindeer, Rudolph, dancing attendance. Tim Metcalfe on this merging of fantasy and reality

As every child knows, Santa Claus lives in Finland — or Lapland, to be precise — and every Christmas, his home in the snowy depths of the northern forest becomes a hive of activity.

Santa receives at least half a million letters a year from children in 150 countries from Hong Kong, the Japanese islands, India and Tierra del Fuego to Hawaii, Poland, Ireland and the United States

Even letters marked simply 'To Santa Claus' without a mention of the street, city or country, find their way to the Santa Claus Post Office in Santa Claus Land, Arctic Circle, SF96930 Rovaniemi in Finland

QUITE A GIVEAWAY!

Leading psychologists have unpacked the secrets of Christmas giving and, when it comes to personality pointers, they have found it is all in the cards.

■The ultimate sexy card must have several burning candles on it — symbols of male virility. The Christmas pudding — which often features on such candle-laden cards — is the candle's feminine counterpart and symbolises the earth mother. People who send this card are sensual, joyous and outgoing.

■People who send one side of the sexy candle-pudding equation, either candles on their own or just the Christmas pud, are probably childless. They may think they want children one day but not yet.

■The red of ribbons and candles is the colour of vitality, health and sex. The sender of such a card is outgoing and optimistic with an often uncomplicated nature who likes to be needed.

■Father Christmas designs point to the sociable types. ! people are not only fun-loving, but seem slightly aggressive because they are so uninhibited. They are usually boisterous.

■Personal printed cards appeal to those members of society who think they're a bit better than the next door neighbours. They can seem standoffish and consider themselves just that little bit better than the rest of us.

■Images of carol singers or choir boys appeal to puritans. They're usually arrogant and dogmatic types, tending to live a very well ordered life.

■Some cards involving tasteful [illegible] of frontiments or] buildings usually come from people lacking who don't want to offend people.] tably, they fully believe in establishment values.

■The [illegible] seasonal values the card has a ge from the senders simply because they have no time to write a personal note inside.

■Robins or reindeer indicate the romantic. The senders of these cards are usually quiet and gentle folk who tend to be a little insecure. They like to be on their own with a close friend and don't care too much for ■People who pick Dickensian scenes in the snow are usually conservative and status conscious. Tending to reject modern values, they idealise a bygone era.

Their idea of love is romantic and affectionate without too much passion.

■The peace card — usually one [illegible] of peace or similar [illegible] indicates the sender has a [illegible] to the occult.

Such people are well [illegible] and [illegible]

Here, in a village which boasts its own airport, an army of Santa's workers answer letters all year round.

Each Christmas also brings thousands of tourists to visit Santa's workshop and Heritage Home.

Visitors can take a sled ride with Santa's reindeer (led by Rudolph the Red Nosed Reindeer, of course), mail Christmas cards from Santa's own post office and listen to Christmas bells and songs beneath the blue, winter light of Lapland

Amidst this magic, Santa Claus faithfully sits in his rocking chair, smiling and telling children stories about the wonders of Christmas

"I often receive letters from children asking me whether I really exist," says Santa "I am always a little startled first Then I pick up my pen and invite the children to Finnish Lapland, where I live an active life all year round "

Santa Claus Land is a special place There, reality and dreams walk hand in hand and it is sometimes difficult to tell where one ends and the other begins

British Airways once flew a group of children from London to the village by Concorde, which must have been the ultimate Christmas experience

Santa with a group of young visitors

In Santa's workshop they would have discovered a huge map of the world and the addresses of children written down in 16 thick books Next door is a gift shop, wrapping room, storehouse, reindeer stable and a shed full of sleds

Santa and his wife, Mrs Claus, live in the southern end of the house They have a spacious, cosy kitchen with bright rugs on the floor

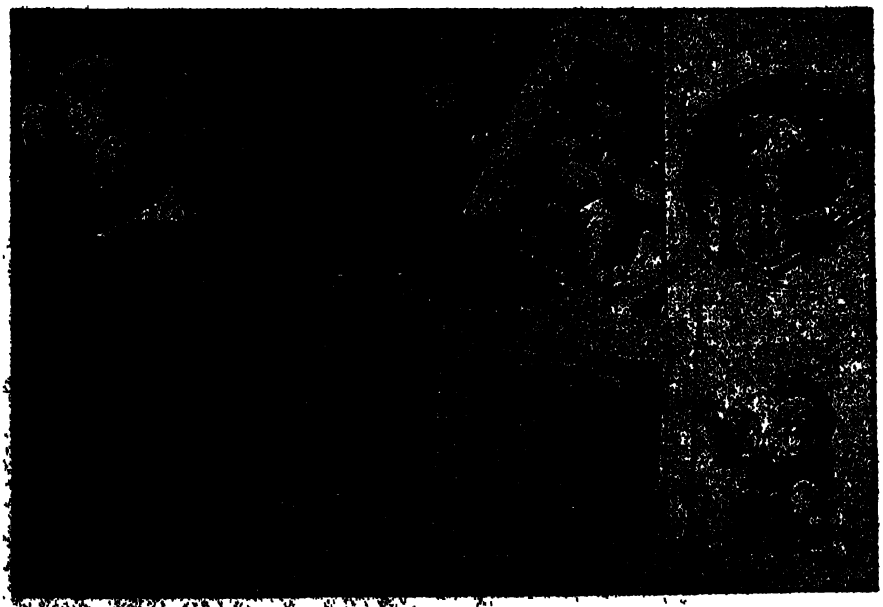
Sitting in his rocking chair in front of a log fire, Santa wears a checked flannel shirt, trousers with suspenders and woollen socks with red stripes as he reads letters from children

This is how the legend of Santa Claus continues in Lapland, although to Finns he is much more than a bringer of gifts

He is a myth, a fascinating and homely figure incorporating the medieval legend of St Nicholas, the protector of children and the poor, and the benevolent forest elves of ancient fairytales

While the Christmas gift-giving tradition began around two centuries after the Three Wise Men brought presents to Jesus Christ, the figure of Santa did not emerge until the 18th century in Europe, when he materialised on postcards

He was wearing a green or red mantle with a sack of presents on his back and a bunch of twigs in his hand, just in case he encountered naughty children



Interestingly, the original Finnish Santa wore grey, homespun clothes

His red jacket and trousers were introduced in the late 19th century as a result of German and American influences, but the artist Thomas Nast was probably more responsible than any other for Santa's modern image

Nast illustrated the poem, The Night Before Christmas, with a friendly, potbellied old man who dropped down chimneys with presents for children

The caricature has remained more or less the same ever since, and the story of Santa Claus is still the most enduring and beloved legend of our time

Feathered Beauty

She was weighed in kilos
To add to human kilos
She ws reluctant and howling
What noise! The buyer was growling
Every feather will be plucked
She will be sold without a dress
Still she is dressed!
Your lips smacking
And fingers licking –

For her, the clock had stopped ticking

Dreams of a Queen

Just a beggar maid with the dreams of a queen.
The whip lashes of reality
bruise my nakedness,
I'm seen
as an escapist

Pleading guidance, seeking assurance,
Demanding solace,
I travel into my world of dreams

I reign supreme there;
and a thousand faces in awe stare
at me, for all I'm worth
And in my dream
a faceless crowd applauds for a nameless cause
And it is all, all of it for me –
The Queen

Just then a pain rushes through my arm.
A raw wound,
The whip-lash of reality;
In desperation I scream.
I am still just another beggar
With a queen's dream.

Requiem

Distant yet clear
Now sounds the requiem,
To the buried years of my youth,

I sigh for the halcyon years,
Idle pockets emptied of dreams
But the phoenix cannot rise,

The spring runs dry,
It cannot matter now
If in the night a baby or a corpse is born

The blood still beats,
But slower now and thicker,

Uncertain, I rise
And grope for your hand

But your eyes have turned
To tunnels, dry and shadowless

Alone now I sit in my black
Mourning dress,
To smile, drink tea and wag
A thin finger at the world
Uncaring whether after tonight,
The dawn breaks into applause or silence

Movement

Just because days and nights come and go nights and days come and go do not, for God's sake, think that babies are not wailing and everything is 100 per cent just and right with everyone

There are not many who think so, the made-to-order set-up has them in its thrall, egging them on to think that any station is a station, that any life is worth living.

It does not occur to them that the Palace-on-Wheels whistles through lands barren to meet faces that are paid to manipulate their furrows to look like a smile,

but the elastic furrows contract back to sinister sadness

the moment the doors are shut to open at the next station

It does not occur to them that the motion that cabins and confines them in the niche is no motion in the first place, but a movement that takes them

nowhere, for the wheels are circles now, ensconced on earth with spokes starting skywards.

Then, how does it matter

if computers travel with computer in safe niches?

SANTA CLAUS will be with you at midnight. And don't let him go away, kids. Give him a big hug and hold on to the myth tightly.

What is your idea of perfect happiness?
A child's expression when he sees the stocking I leave behind for him.
What is your greatest fear?
That some kid will pull off my false beard by mistake.
Who or what has been the greatest influence in your life?

What is your most precious possession?

My huge sack, full of dreams

What brings tears to your eyes?

The thought that those twinkles [in the eyes of kids] will soon become cybertwinkles

Snow (and sweets).
What do you dislike most in others?
Their long faces.
What do you dislike most in yourself?
That I get to work only once in 365 days
What is your most precious possession?
My huge sack, full of dreams
What objects do you always carry?
Laughter. Ho-ho-ho! And that, too, Rudolph carries, I don't have to, ho-ho-ho!

What makes you most depressed?
A pin prick at the balloon tied on my stomach!
What do you dislike most on your appearance?
The clever look of education that sometimes comes upon my face.
What is your favourite word?
Don't you know? Ho-ho-ho!
What is your favourite journey?
Anywhere on my sleigh, pulled by my red-nosed reindeer friend.
What is your favourite dream?
That there are stars on the earth, too.
What is your nightmare?
Pushing myself down the chimney But that's okay
What or who is the greatest love of your life?
Kids, specially those dear little five-year-old girls with bouncy ponytails
What is your source of sustenance?
The smiles on their faces, the twinkle in their eyes, and their refusal to believe that Santa is a fantasy
On what occasions do you lie?
On the other 364 days

How would you like to die?

Surrounded only by children; but that's not death, that's life...

What is your greatest regret?
Growing up and losing my innocence
What has been your happiest moment?
Dennis the Menace singing, 'But I love you, Santa!'
What brings tears to your eyes?
The thought that those twinkles will soon become cybertwinkles.
How do you relax?
By counting the stars in the sky
What do you envy most in others?
Their ability to just dream.
How would you like to be remembered?
As the only truth in the world.
How would you like to die?
Surrounded only by children; but that's not death, that's life...

POST MORTEM

We Love You, Yeah-Yeah-Yeah...!

■ I belong to the post-Beatles generation and one of my greatest regrets is that I could not be a part of the wild exuberance of the early Cavern Club days, the psychedelia of Sgt Peppers or the grim finality of Let It Be ('Coming Together', November 5)

Moreover, it was infinitely depressing when, some years ago, asked to comment on a possible 'reunion', George Harrison had discounted the idea, saying, "Let sleeping dogs lie"

Yet, less than a year after the release of Live at the BBC, the prospect of the Beatles coming together no longer precedes a big question mark. We may not get those eight incredible years back. Maybe the absence of John will show and hurt like a gaping wound. But whichever way it is, the worldwide focus on pop music's greatest phenomenon is a crying need today — to give music a fresh lease of life, and most important, to bring music back to where it belonged in the hearts of the people.

John Lennon: Beat of the Sixties

■ Rumours of a possible Beatles reunion were rife in rock circuit for quite some time, but those who remember the bitterness of the split had grave doubts.

Ever since he hit middle age Paul McCartney had distanced himself from the world of pop and had concentrated on gaining acceptance as a classical composer.

But two things appear to irritate him now. Michael Jackson owning the publishing rights of the Lennon-McCartney catalogue and Lennon being dubbed the driving musical genius of the group.

But whatever be the bitterness the coming together of Paul, George and Ringo will bring back the beat of the Sixties.

Manoj Kumar Jain,
Shyamnagar (W.B.)

■ At the end of the long and winding road, finally here comes the sun! The fab three will come together.

We were crying, waiting, hoping, screaming 'Get back'. Some said, "I'm a loser, let it be". I just don't understand how they slow down.

Some other guy was riding. You've got to hide your love away, they said.

After a hard day's night yesterday, the Magazine pressed, "Do you want to know a secret?" The cover was of a band on the run.

Help! Lonesome tears in my eyes choked me. Tell me what you see, it beckoned. My rubber soul had a ticket to ride. It was like a taste of honey. I was glad all over.

"I'll be on my way," I said, "to get a shot of rhythm and blues". This is not just a day in the life. I imagine it's a lifetime!

Roll over Beethoven. I want to twist and shout here, there and everywhere!

Dyutiman Bhattacharya,
Howrah

■ For all Beatles fans like me what could have been better news than the one announcing their reunion after 25 long years?

But will it be the same Beatles that stole our hearts two decades ago?

DISCOVERY OF INDIANS

Eureka! says Anurag Mathur, of the New Breed

Illustrations: Sekhar Roy

Bureaucrat

Mid-way through the Nineties and we have been faced with some New Indians who have emerged from the hitherto unknown crevices Here is a sample six

In what is called, presumably sincerely, the good old days, it wasn't difficult to spot a bureaucrat He wore a shirt, a pair of trousers and an overworked look All these usually featured lots of creases

The ones regarded as sartorially splendid boasted of safari suits, with forests of pens prominently tucked into the most unusual places Unexpectedly, hairy arms were a frequently exercised fashion statement, too

But these days, behold the frequent dazzler By daytime, he's the normal, harried, over-worked executive Let night fall though and both the person and the personality adopt quite unexpected traits Then he is spotted, quite the epitome of ethnic splendour, at some suitably elegant soiree

Western style suits are simply unacceptable and a dhoti may make mantriji suspect, if word was to get back to him, that his blue-eyed boy was nurturing secret sympathies for the BJP Besides, who has the legs for it and what if a strong wind was to blow? The result might equal one occasion when I sat behind a gaggle of college girls examining a group photograph of our most distinguished RSS leaders in their best shorts attending a shakha

.You will scarcely believe this, but not only were the flower of our youth completely uninterested in the meaningful contribution to the debate on swadeshi that the respected leaders had enunciated, but they were busily judging the legs of the leaders sticking out of their admittedly woefully ill-fitting shorts And this they were doing with a scandalous lack of reverence

So today's stylistically relevant bureaucrat settles for the middle path of a kurta-pyjama and an air of weary grace, with the slight aura of the Kunwar Sahib, as though if a court painter was to capture him in a portrait, it would be with a rose held nonchalantly between two fingers

The Sexy Social Worker

Scholars of the species understand completely that the reference here is not to the rich housewife dabbling in some improved form of sanitised service It is to the full-time devotee, who wears the regulation uniform of khadi and a bindi of a size that makes you expect aliens to emerge from it

There is nothing overtly sexy about the way she dresses, though the saree could have been tied higher and the blouse perhaps not provide quite so much of what the Government of India, refering to other sectors, approvingly calls "transparency in all matters," but there is unquestionably something about her

One is her air of being a slightly humble Madonna The star, of course, not the deity This derives from the fact that she doesn't face much competition in the sphere of sex appeal while helping construct rural toilets, so she gains the aura that people who get gazed at with lengthy and ill-concealed ardour, often acquire

Still, a scholar, spoiled by the splendour of metropolitan nubility, may not recognise her directly, but spots her watching the reactions of her male colleagues One is that their sincerity intensifies The second is that they become laudably anxious to leave for lengthy stints in veritable hell holes, though naturally in her company

The Glamorous Journalist

We must differentiate here between the male and the female form of the species The male, I must announce sorrowfully, doesn't possess glamour intrinsically He acquires it from the job that he is holding If it is currently of the stratospheric variety, then all sorts of interesting people hover around him, listen intently to his views, ladies with dangling cigarettes who emit powerful perfumes give him sidelong glances and peal merrily at his jokes and he is asked several times every hour during the course of an average dinner party about the composition of the next Cabinet reshuffle, the exact date of the midterm election and his infallible prediction of the number of seats each party will win

Based on this, his interlocutor seems to suggest, he will wager his life's savings, his wife's jewellery and his children's future However, when he leaves his job, things, to understate the matter heroically, change

But the glamorous journalist (female) never goes out of style It is not strictly looks, several are unnervingly unconcerned, it's not youth, journalism is genuinely one profession where women get more sought after as they get older, it's a combination of fame, power and some sort of perceived passion that cocoons them in the aura of glamour It seems to outlast their jobs

They acquire satellites at every party who hover tentatively and ingratiatingly around them, invariably male Women who know of them keep a wary eye on them and a much more severe one on their own husbands Politicians keep a safe distance or exclaim with pleasure when they see them They are not generally so cordial with male journalists with whom they may have disagreed It is too early to speculate on what form the considerably aged version will take, since the glamorous variety is a fairly recent phenomenon, but it's added a generally welcome dimension to journalism

The Well-off TV Star

I wonder if you know this, but Eskimos apparently have something like 14 names for snow The reason being that if somebody in an igloo in the North Pole asks someone what the weather is like outside and he says, ' It is snowing," it is not very helpful since it is always snowing You have to specify the kind of snow

Similarly, we will have to invent gradations of glitter to differentiate between stars, all of whom now appear on TV There's the Bachchan super nova on one extreme, and the heroic ladies who read the 'News For the Hearing Impaired' on the other Both appear on the same medium, both in theory are equal stars

At one point the difference between a movie and a TV star was very simple A movie star made a lot of money and the TV star chased after buses since he could not even afford a scooter Today the erstwhile impecunious TV person is invariably also a producer and negotiates skilfully with movie stars for a role in his forthcoming mega serial which Mandi House bosses have approved in record time

Running together after fleeing buses works wonderfully in creating a sense of brotherhood that survives the arrival of progressively larger Marutis in the home of at least the TV star. And in evaluating starriness, you cannot forget that more people watch a person reading the news on DD during one evening, than have watched Sholay over the last decade-and-a-half put together

The Consultant

Earlier, you never heard of them Now you wonder how people managed without them And they are not people who could not get jobs, in fact, quite the reverse The real boom seems to have been in what are called manpower consultants

Though earlier the name referred to the sort of gentleman who crammed people into an airless container while despatching them to a decade of slavery somewhere, these days they are much less obvious Several perform a valuable role, though there are some innovative ploys like sending letters to everyone from a filched data base for advertised jobs and if someone on the list gets one, then demanding their rupee of flesh

But the day of the consultant seems to have barely begun As competition intensifies, more and more specialists will be necessary, one day perhaps approaching the heights of a gentleman I met at a youth hostel in a Scandinavian country

"I am assisting Dr So-And-So," he introduced himself proferring his card "The doctor is a maker of artistic films Please to follow "

I trotted along, eager to be discovered and was impressed by the grave demeanour of the doctor I was then led to the female lead who was awaiting her co-star under the lights, before the cameras, with palpable boredom and without a stitch of clothing I regretfully declined this golden opportunity, even though the above mentioned consultant desperately assured me that the film would never be shown in Europe

Former Models

Models have been around for long enough now for an entire caste to have emerged of former models They are characterised by a signal inability to adjust to a life where people do not gaze at them longingly any more And they never were famous enough to be instantly recognisable, so most people who see them in parties and at markets, imagine they are some half-forgotten friend's wife

They never made enough money to enable them to sit at home, insulated from the amnesia of the world, so they flit about in increasingly desperate garbs, seeking business from gentlemen who want a name to drop, or revenge on them for their near tame and their own obscurity Being formerly famous can be a terrible cross to carry

Some disappear so completely that it is as though they go away to a remote and hidden elephant's graveyard of models A few do smashingly well, particularly the somewhat younger lot who anticipate and plan for a career beyond their modelling years The startling thing is how soon they soar, peak and plunge It is as though they become former models even before they have quite completed the process of establishing themselves as successful models. ■

JOY RIDE

Atma Prakash Goel has been travelling ticketless for the last 20 years to teach the Delhi Transport Corporation a lesson

For many, ticketless travel is an art and evading the assistant ticket inspector, a skill But for one man it is a Cause

Atma Prakash Goel may have set, and perhaps broken, all records in ticketless travel—but only to prove a point He looks harmless enough Anywhere in his late 40s and early 50s, this squat man has DTC officials squirming in their shoes

Battle lines between Goel and the Delhi Transport Corporation were drawn in 1975 That is when Goel had taken an oath not to buy himself a ticket until he set the house of the monopolistic bus service in order Besides "terrorising" the DTC with his corrective stance, Goel has compelled the commercially sunk corporation to cough up a tidy sum of money against damages, the latest being Rs 500

A qualified and practising chartered accountant he culls out time to give the DTC a run for its money—or is it bus routes?

Disgusted with the attitude of the officials, likeminded individuals like Goel formed what they christened the Akhil Bhartiya Yatri Sangh in 1979 with Goel as president His grouse is only against DTC "Even the much dreaded Red Line buses function more professionally than DTC"

Goel strongly feels that someone has to drive home the fact that the commuter is 'not to be taken for the proverbial ride He goes by the book and states that the DTC has been ensnared by its own convoluted set of rules and regulations "It is not a free ride that I seek I make it a point 'not' to buy a ticket when DTC conductors fail to deliver one to me at my seat It is to bring to book some such lazy government officials"

He explains, "The DTC rule book clearly spells out 'that every passenger travelling in a vehicle of the DTC on being requested by a conductor on duty in that vehicle shall declare to the conductor the destination of the journey he intends to perform or has performed in the vehicle and shall pay, on demand, to the conductor the fare for the journey' If the conductor fails to approach me for a ticket I refuse to go to him to procure one," says Goel with determination

Rajesh Kumar

Atma Prakash Goel: Stickler for rules

And it does not end at that Alighting from a bus and accosted by the ATI normally spells bad news, harassment that eventually ends in the greasing of greedy palms But it is not so with Goel Well versed in DTC stipulations he refuses to be held answerable to the ATI

"I have the law on my side The DTC manual says that if at a time a passenger alights from the vehicle and does not possess a ticket for the journey performed, or fails to produce the ticket required to do so by the conductor it shall be presumed that he has travelled without a ticket The ATI who is not the conductor, therefore, has no authority vested in him to take a passenger into custody or to detain him. And the conductor, in any case, has defaulted from his duty."

A point that proved to be the crux of the matter in a case that dragged on from 1982-95 It was on October 7 this year that the DTC mobile court declared that the ATI or TI is not competent or authorised to arrest or detain any person under rule 3 of DRTA (Contravention of Regulations) Penalty Rules, 1954, which is only a non-cognizable one Goel considers this a landmark judgment as the magistrate, Inderjit Singh declared that the complaint filed by the AI before the mobile court was in violation of the mandatory statutory provisions of law

And this is just among the 15 other cases that Goel has fought and won However, this is the most long drawn one as Goel had to make nearly hundred appearances at the mobile courts Goel views this as a victory not for himself but for the travelling public at large

Concurrently, there are 10 cases pending against the DTC that have been filed by Goel and he likes it to be known that to date he has not lost a single case

The baton may just pass on While his children had earlier protested vehemently against his preoccupations with litigations, they too have realised the validity of their father's crusade today Travelling by DTC buses themselves, they have woken up to the travails of a DTC ride Bharati, his 26-year-old daughter, has filed a case against an ATI which she hopes will teach the overbearing ATIs not to pinch Rs 10 from a school girl's lunch box!

hushwant Singh's detractions of the dead are malicious and petty Thankfully, the subject never gets to know about them Surviving relatives and friends are naturally shocked and often ignorant about the private moment when Singh claims he discovered the truth about the departed person There is no occasion for debate The public's opinion only comes into play when, for instance, Singh describes a person like the deceased but large-in-life movie gossip queen Devyani Chaubal as 'eminently bedworthy' The point at issue is likely to be Singh's taste both as regards women and in general

Singh as a gadfly biting living things, however, deserves to be taken more seriously Literature and art give meaning to the life of a people and need appreciation as much as a critical environment to grow When Singh made, on a visit to Shillong in the summer of 1995, what he later characterised as 'a casual remark' about the quality of Tagore's poems, novels and short stories, there was a suggestion that it was all done for a laugh, if only the Bengalis had "the gift of laughter" One expected that he had it in him to carry on the debate with some measure of earnestness Disappointingly, he kept on changing its terms and shifting his own position

Tagore, however, soon faded into the background Instead, Bengalis became the focus of attention — their hero worship of Netaji Subhas Bose, special regard for Satyajit Ray, their purported skills in soccer, their endogenous food habits of eating at home and not in restaurants, and so on Singh was a veritable flibbertigibbet, hopping (mad) from point to point without stopping to think it all out It is not a mere coincidence that Singh swears by the aphorism that the great thing about living in a democracy is that you can say what you think without thinking

"Yes, I don't think Tagore was a good novelist or short story writer," Singh initially insisted in his column while referring to the furore he had set off "We have many who handle these genres better than he did," he added Later, seeking to contain the trouble he had made for himself, he wrote that he did not regard Tagore as a great novelist or short story writer The difference between good and great was one escape hatch, the other was a garrulous Indian's defence mechanism when caught in his own web of words "I had been grossly misquoted Words had been taken out of context," he pleaded in a public statement

At the same time Singh wrote in his column, "I am sure that in ten years from now, people will concede that I had the right to say what I said" Significantly, he stressed his right to say anything, not that he might yet be proved right in what he had said after the heat of the moment passed The libertarian in Singh cherishes the right to be heard rather than the right to be taken seriously He even went so far as to assert that the state has no right to interfere with public morality If models Madhu Sapre and Milind Soman wished to do what they chose with their bodies and display them in the raw, that was indeed their business, who were we to complain, Singh postulated

Yet, Singh has not always been an advocate of the writer's unrestricted freedom of thought and expression As Penguin India's consulting editor, he was responsible, more than any governmental authority, for killing at birth the Indian edition of Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses On that occasion, he was right to have anticipated the likely consequences of publishing the book in a volatile society where pure literary merit and commercial interests need to be weighed against

social and religious factors In Calcutta, however, it was the turn of the local Sikh-Punjabi community to advise Singh to apply the same sort of prudence in his comments on Tagore and the Bengalis

Not that there was any danger to the Sikhs, who had fared better in West Bengal than in any other part of the country during the 1984 spiral violence following Indira Gandhi's assassination, or even to Khushwant Singh personally A month before the Shillong uproar, he had praised the Bengalis in his column stating that "they did not have an iota of prejudice or resentment against non-Bengalis who have settled in their state", which was markedly different from what was happening in some other cities and regions He called them "a wise people who are remarkably free of envy" They, of course, needed the necessities of life, which including having the means to "buy a book or two every month" They did not indulge in the "childish gimmickry' of changing place names Singh had Bombay-turned-Mumbai in mind but he probably saw a similar change coming to New Delhi, too, at the instigation of his friend, Mani Shankar Aiyar

It would be a folly then to call Singh anti-Bengali More likely, he titillates himself by saying things that hurt the self-esteem of the Bengalis but are in well calculated probability not going to take any skin off his nose It would do him no harm, he reckons, and get him much hype in the bargain The fear of his head being chopped off in Calcutta is the kind of set reaction whenever he sees intolerance of dissent in any form and in any part of the country His comment at the time of violent protests against former President R Venkataraman's critical remarks on Rajiv Gandhi ran true to form "Are these any different from bigots baying for the blood of Rushdie or frenzied mobs rampaging through the streets of Dhaka and Chittagong demanding that Taslima Nasreen be hanged? He dittoed the same imagery when he thought mobs in Calcutta would now gun for him, rhetorically asking How are we different from Bangladeshis thirsting for Nasreen's blood across the border?

Gore and violence are obsessional neurosis for Singh in both his fiction and journalistic writing "If you say anything derogatory of Satyajit Ray in Calcutta, there is a good chance of a chappal beating " The fact is that Ray lived with critics and calumnists of various stripes — literary purists who said he had not been faithful enough to the classics he adapted to the requirements of cinema, Hindu fundamentalists who disliked Ray's treatment of blind superstitions and certain garbs of religion, rationalists who felt Ray had made glamorous the theory of reincarnation in his own story turned into a full-colour film, Naxalites who were angered that Ray had not raised the banner of revolution against social injustices, and many more assorted malcontents But Ray walked the streets of Calcutta without any fear and died in dignity

Singh on his part never felt any enthusiasm about Ray's epochal Pather Panchali It had put him to sleep in a Paris cinema The dark hall seemed to have a soporific effect on him, whatever the place or the show In New York's Times Square, a Danish skin-flick telling the story of a nymphet and her seduction by her aunt's two lovers left him snoring and the rest of the audience laughing It Singh's 'favourite voyeur sport' could not keep him awake, few films were likely to absorb his interest

However, Ray holds a special place in West Bengal as a most admired master, whose works reaped the highest international honours He is the only Indian to have won a full Oscar for his all-round achievement (Bhanu Athaiya shared it for costume designing of the film Gandhi) Ray is thus a symbol of Bengal's pre-eminence in filmmaking In the four decades of National Film Awards, Bengali films have won the top prize as the best motion picture 17 times, outperforming those in the next two languages, Hindi (10) and Malayalam (5) combined, with others trailing farther behind

The comfort and inspiration that symbols such as Tagore (who was the first writer from the East to win the Nobel Prize back in 1913) and Ray bring to the life of a people seem alien to Singh, which is somewhat strange. A self-confessed agnostic, he holds dear the religious symbols of Sikhism and clings to them in personal life as a bond with his community but scorns and jokes about them when they are secular

It is curious that Singh should repeatedly use the expression "Holy Cow" to describe some of the passions and delights of Bengal. The phrase is of White Anglo-Saxon Protestant (WASP) coinage, mocking Hindus who hold the animal sacred Catholics are likewise the butt of phrases such as "Holy Mackerel" and "Holy Cod", in reference to their practice of eating fish on Fridays Surely, good writers in India, as elsewhere, should avoid cliches, more so those with religious snobbery

In putting Mohun Bagan on the list of the ruling passions of Bengalis, Singh does much in, istice to the even larger number among them who swear by East Bengal Equally fervent faith is placed in Mohammedan Sporting by a small but important minority in the state Supporters root for their favourites exclusively on a club basis, and not wholesale to cover all teams of an entire region In Delhi, we noted some years back, as Sikh Regimental Centre of Ambala, Leaders Club of Jullunder, Punjab Police and the rest of them got knocked out of the Durand and the DCM cups, local cheer-leaders switched loyalties from one to the other as long as the teams were ethnically their own Such a thing does not happen on Calcutta's soccer fields

If Singh's teacher at school used to get "misty-eyed" while recalling Mohun Bagan's legendary exploits, the club's 1911 triumph in the IFA Shield final indeed made history Eleven barefoot Bengalis won a thrilling victory over the all-booted, British regimental side, a feat not to be equalled by any Indian team until a quarter century later. That was truly an achievement well ahead of its time and it tremendously boosted the nationalist spirit in Bengal

In recent years, Mohammedan Sporting's successes have been fewer and registered with a virtually all-Hindu side, many of them Bengali Brahmins. Yet, the club's core following remains the same, a hark-back to an earlier generation when it ruled the Indian soccer scene in the late Thirties and Forties. Those were also the years of the Muslim League's rise to power, and indeed the club's symbiotic contribution to the emergence of Pakistan was recorded in the memoirs of M A. Ispahani, who later became its minister and ambassador

Singh ignores the emotional content of sport in the life of a people but serves dubious statistics about the victories of Border Security Force over Mohun Bagan Let him put an assistant on the job He will find that Mohun Bagan has won the blue riband of Indian soccer, the Federation Cup, a record number of times and has defeated all the Punjab teams on "any number" of occasions, not the other way round

Khushwant Singh's magnum effort at chronicling A History of the Sikhs suffers from the same lapses that persist till today in his popular writings not enough rigour of logic and analysis Lack of objectivity, if any, among reviewers in India, surely did not extend to their counterparts in the United States, which was both the source of funds for his research and place of its publication Joan Bondurant, scholar of Indian studies at the University of California, Berkeley, considered the book too inexact to satisfy the scholar, inadequate in its all too brief analysis of the Hindu-Muslim background of Sikhism, and somewhat biased. She felt the author had given "fresh currency to 19th century misconceptions "

Another critic, Mark Naidis, writing in the prestigious American Historical Review noted of Singh's book "Unfortunately, this work lacks solid philosophical underpinning The author does not pause often enough to raise questions, let alone answer them The evidence allows another version of the facts than the one he has selected, but he denies us the reason for his choice Social and economic problems receive less attention than they deserve " Naidis, however, also noted that Singh was a distinguished novelist, which was evident in the clear and graceful style of his writing "The introductory description of the Punjab is almost lyrical in quality "

Singh's proclivity to ask a question without analytically seeking its answer was seen, for instance, in his observation that there are no public places where Bengali food is available

Rabindranath Tagore: A symbol of inspiration

It was a valid comment made in the wake of the Tagore controversy though it had nothing to do with Tagore While there is Suruchi in Calcutta, there are very few standard restaurants in that and other metro cities where the authentic fare is served But it is not for Singh to reason or understand why

The Bengalis like their food prepared at home, but when they eat out they wish to be adventurous This explains the popularity of Chinese restaurants in Calcutta, which not long back were the best in the country, and of fabled establishments such as Firpo's and Skyroom whose continental food had been savoured by several generations It was not a stray comment that Chitrita Banerji, who was married to a Bangladeshi, made in her book, Life and Food in Bengal "The Bengali people are perhaps the greatest food lovers in the subcontinent "

There are several reasons for the absence of Bengali restaurants as contrasted with the ubiquity of Udupi and Punjabi fare People from the South follow dietary restrictions, which do not concern the Bengali overmuch He is more universal in his food habits notably enough, Muslim joints are favourites of the local middle class as in no other city in India On the other hand, the Punjabi takes his food habits with him when he eats out or where ver he goes The preparations are relatively limited and simplified for public eating places to manage with packaged spices The repertoire of Bengali cuisine is very wide and its preparation rather complicated and time-consuming The varieties of cooking and the subtleties of flavour that Bengalis expect in their food are not easily served in restaurants

Coming back to Tagore, with whom it all started, Singh's one-point criticism was about the quality of translation of his poetry It is an ancient controversy Dr J C Ghosh, who used to teach Bengali literature at Oxford, recognised for one that Tagore's "faults are more apparent in his English translations than in the original Bengali" In fact, Gitanjali which crowned him as the Nobel laureate was really a re-creation, giving the poems and their meaning a new form

On the other hand, Buddhadeva Bose, a scholar of both Bengali and English literature, who was later a visiting professor of comparative literature in the US, regarded Gitanjali as more than a great work in English, it is the work of a great English poet "There are moments when the translation surpasses the original," he felt

For one who made his foray into writing in English at the age of 50, Tagore's was a masterly performance on any count He simply felt an urge to recapture through the medium of another language "the feelings and sentiments which created joy within me in the days gone by" The poetic diction of Tagore's poems written in the early 20th century is naturally different from their translations rendered in the closing years of the century. Singh was expressing his own preference, which is based subjectively on the literary tastes of a culture or society in a given period

Singh's method of literary criticism, however, does not call for anything more demanding than a simple entry in the like/don't like column He did not think much of Tagore's short stories and novels but his only points of reference were contemporary Indo-Anglian writers like Salman Rushdie and Amitav Ghosh, whom he placed higher. He was out of his depth in the indegenous literary, historical and cultural contexts of Tagore's fiction Buddhadeva Bose considered that Tagore "brought us the short story when it was hardly known in England and introduced the psychological novel". Tagore's best short stories were written at the turn of the century, well ahead of the genre's finding roots in other Indian languages For J C Ghosh, Gora and Ghare Baire were perhaps the best novels written by an Indian

The Ghoshes and the Boses apart, Viswanath S Naravane, another critic, regarded the modern short story as "Tagore's gift to Indian literature" In Naravane's view, Tagore paved the way for modern internationally known writers like Premchand, Raja Rao and R K Narayan Mulk Raj Anand, a genuine literary critic who also earned fame abroad with his fiction long before the latter-day Indo-Anglians, observed that the Indian novel turned mature with Tagore, "breaking from folk or medieval bases of story-telling and achieving the particular density of psychological apprehension which constitutes the novel proper"

The right to criticise another writer is inherent in a writer, Singh seemed to suggest Yet, he just could not stomach Sahitya Akademi chairman U.R Ananthamoorthy's ruling that if Singh could criticise Tagore, others also had the right to criticise Singh "The ultimate judge of what I write is myself," he had pontificated on an earlier occasion Singh would have more credibly claimed an equal footing with Tagore if he had pointed out that they had both been honoured by the rulers of the day but returned their awards in protest against happenings in Punjab — the Jallianwala Bagh massacre and, for Singh closer to home, the assault on the Golden Temple ■

The Garden Of Delight

There is certainly no better season than winter for enjoying a garden, and botanical gardens are something special, in particular Calcutta's Botanical Gardens But when they were founded in 1786 they didn't look much of a proposition The land was overgrown with weeds and scrub, frequently flooded and had only one great advantage It was conveniently situated for the first superintendent, Robert Kyd He lived next door

The original purpose of the gardens was, on the face of it, charitable Kyd had applied for land to plant sago and date palms as food for the poor in time of famine When that suggestion was approved, he offered a more ambitious and mercenary scheme: the collection and propagation of plants for profit, for "the extension of the national commerce and riches"

He was a man, it seems, who would have been at home in Thatcher's Britain, although in Thatcher's Britain, he would have been an abject failure Because though he planted an enormous number of seeds and saplings, an enormous number died including practically all the European fruit trees and tea bushes from China

The Orientalist William Jones, an amateur botanist, was another great supporter of the gardens, his interest being scientific as well as commercial On the one hand, he encouraged British botanists to learn Sanskrit to acquaint themselves with the qualities of Indian herbs On the other, he also followed Linnaeus, who devised what is now considered the conventional classification of plants by Latin names However, Jones found Linnaeus' descriptions outrageous to female modesty; for instance, his description of the class Polyandra (a plant with many stamens) as "twenty males or more in the same bed with a female"

After Jones' death, the gardens continued to grow steadily in importance, becoming a vegetable entrepot between East and West, and a major research ground for useful plants

Which is where cannabis, or hemp, comes in In Britain now the cultivation of cannabis is banned by law It's a law which many see fit to break, including the son of Sir David Steele, formerly leader of the Liberal Party and now champion of countrymen's rights But in the late 18th century hemp was crucial, and as an experiment, the British put 200 acres under Indian cannabis

The root of their problem was Russia It produced practically all the hemp in the market This hemp was used for rope and rope was used for rigging, which meant that the British fleet was entirely dependent on a foreign power This was not a good thing, besides which the Russians were forcing up the price Therefore, the frantic search for an alternative began

In those days 40-50 fibrous plants were in regular use in India, including Sanseviera Zeylanica which had been used for bowstrings in ancient times Cannabis was not a plant valued for its fibre but for its kick William Roxborough, then in charge of the Botanical Gardens, tried growing it but not, as far as we know, imbibing it However, it was not his candidate for a replacement for Russian hemp That was another Indian plant called Sunn Hemp (Crotalaria Juncea) He convinced the East India Company, which did its best to sell Sunn hemp to ropemakers in England, only to have them reject it as unfit for seafaring

Further experiments were made with hemp from places like Sumatra and Manila, and these at last paid off By the middle of the 19th century, India was supplying half of Britain's hemp

At the same time, the British became familiar with a fibre "the natives call jute" Roxborough recommended it as a replacement for flax and in 1820, a factory at Abingdon in Oxfordshire began using it in carpets and cloth But many linen manufacturers regarded it with the greatest suspicion and made a point of declaring their products "warranted free from Indian jute" Jute only really prospered when the Dutch started using it to transport coffee, and the Crimean War cut off the supply of Russian flax

The original purpose of the gardens was, on the face of it, charitable. Kyd had applied for land to plant sago and date palms as food for the poor in time of famine. When that suggestion was approved he offered a more ambitious and mercenary scheme: the collection and propagation of plants for profit

Along with jute, hemp, spices and medicinal plants, Calcutta's Botanical Gardens also raised the dye-producing plant which the ancient Egyptians used to colour the embalming clothes of mummies—indigo The exploitation associated with indigo here is, of course, infamous and was highlighted as early as 1860 in Dina Bandhu Mitra's play Nil Darpan

Indigo came to inspire fear not just because of the nature of the planters but also because it was for many years the colour of police uniforms Not that it was a perfect product As Shahid Amin noted in his subaltern account of Chauri Chaura, the dye emitted unwholesome vapours which filled constable lines during the rains But the Botanical Gardens did not have to find an alternative for indigo the chemists with their khaki chemical dyes did that

Made for each other!

Reliving the spirit of togetherness!

Winners get to have their cake and eat it too!

The poolside 'stadium' at the Taj Bengal was all spruced up - lush outfield, grassy pitch and all - for the launch of the Official Yearbook and Pocketbook for the Wills World Cup 1996. It was however a launch with a difference.

What really mattered was just how many turbans Balwinder changed per week, whether Mohinder actually blows his nose in his precious good luck hanky, is it Marshall or Thomson that Srikkanth actually curses in his sleep and does Kirti eat fish only on Fridays. And it mattered even more that certain people within the same team should know these and other strange facts about teammates, especially roommates. It mattered simply because these gentlemen were winners and it was this harmony within the team that saw them win the World Cup way back in 1983!

Sure there were plenty of tributes to those gentlemen who took Indian cricket to the very summit that particular summer's day at Lord's. But everyone was gathered there to learn the secret of their success and weren't we lucky that Wills was there to uncover the fact that the members of the squad were indeed made for each other! And here we were all praising Srikkanth's batting, Sandhu's bowling and Kapil's fielding when all the action was taking place off the field after the celebrations.

As the two publications were launched and microphones and TV cameras recorded every moment of the fun, I looked around me and it was time to look ahead to the great cricket ahead and that day ahead.

For now a spirit was being relived. A winning spirit that our hopes could be passed down to the current squad, the only question being who the lucky players to take forward the secret to winning is. formulated to mark that this spirit of togetherness lives on after all of the made for each other people who re-share the spirit of togetherness with the Wills World Cup 1996.

Match Makers#

I was born in Georgetown, Guyana (West Indies) on Valentine's Day in 1968. However, I do not represent the country of my birth in international cricket. One of my most memorable innings is a quickfire century I cracked in Madras in 1993. If I make it to the Wills World Cup, I will play a match or my birthday!

Match-Makers#3

Born on October 20, 1963, I am a teetotaller but ironically my nickname is an alcoholic beverage. I am one of only two surviving members of my national side since the Reliance Cup of 1987, in which I hit 5 fifties in six innings. Injury has kept me in and out of the big league

BOWLED OVER BY THE ZODIAC!

Fiery feisty and outspoken they'll set the field for some fireworks	Impatient Aries will make the stubborn Bull run for cover!	A common love for cause creativity and independence A steady innings	Fire and water If the elements are incompatible the relationship needs to be played out cautiously	The Ram will lock horns with the Lion a relationship as volatile as Sachin's batting!	Aries likes generalisation And Virgo loves detail A strange match!	The two will argue instinctively a third umpire will definitely be needed!
Opposites attract And in this case they even score a big hit!	Mars enthusiasm and Jupiter daring A highly successful if adventurous partnership	If both play down their pride this relationship could go a long way	The psychic Aquarian and the impulsive Ram A relationship as unpredictable as the One day game	Not conflict but compromise that's the name of the game	Stable determined these two will build a solid partnership	Moody Twins If not careful you could drive the stable Bull away
A strange pair they'll hit it off on the spot!	If the Lion's roar test the Bull's patience a few bouncers may come her way!	Loaded with integrity and dependability the two can outplay almost every ball	Sentimental romantics with a blend of practicality The perfect team	[illegible]	The pessimist and the optimist They'll forever stump each other	Perfectly tuned in they'll fall hook line and bouncer for each other!
Whoops! Full of near misses the match promises to be exciting	Beware! If the Bull pushes her obstinate opinion the Piscean may retire hurt!	The double wicket partnership of the decade Nine mind it believe spectators a little dizzy	When Crabs and Twins get together it's a ball game!	Some of the Twin bouncers biff the Lion The other one sends over the boundary	Good teamwork here Virgo steady plans lumps and compromising between Libra and July	With these two all rounders it could be centuries one day and half tickets the next!
[illegible]	Any Archer Fairy Tales The women's squad will keep the Archer panting at both ends!	[illegible]	With the twosome arguing about every no ball call the third umpire's a must!	[illegible]	Mr and Mrs Match Referee's [illegible]	[illegible]
The Crab and the virgin [illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

Match Makers #5

I was born on December 13, 1970. I made my first class cricket debut at the age of 14. I then went on to represent my country in Tests and One-dayers, but ended up retiring before I even turned 20! I have since made a comeback into the side. Most agree that I am almost a replica of an illustrious predecessor of mine.

TWO CLOSE FOR COMFORT

Cricket season is around the corner. It's going to invade your TV screen, your time, your thoughts and your partner. All you'll think of is cricket, cricket and more cricket. In fact you'll know that you and cricket have indeed become made for each other when...

You shift your wardrobe and kitchen to the TV room

You list your TV repairman's name under emergency

You start having long imaginary conversations with Sachin about improving his technique

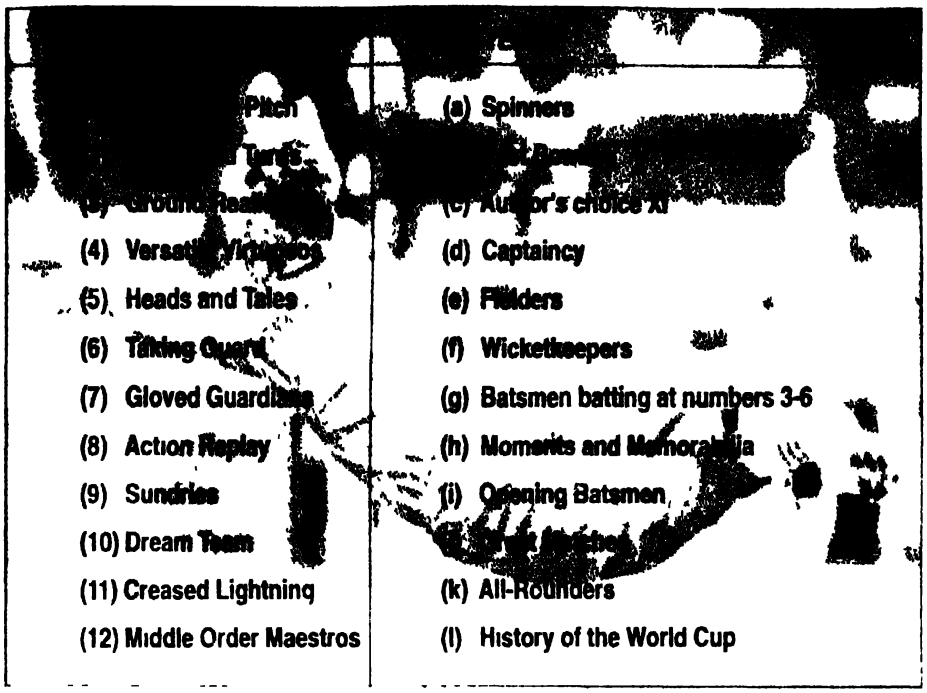
Your wife wants a Wills World Cup logo cake for her next birthday

You start referring to rain as 'that' enemy number one

88.65% of your colleagues ask for leave during the same period

You visit your eye doctor twice a week

Your eye doctor gets himself new glasses



Everytime you argue with your partner, you call upon a third umpire

The Cherry Tree Blossoms

One day when Rakesh was six he walked home from the Mussoorie bazaar eating cherries. They were a little sweet, a little sour, small, bright red cherries, which had come all the way from the Kashmir valley.

Here in the Himalayan foothills where Rakesh lived, there were not many fruit trees. The soil was stony, and the dry cold winds stunted the growth of most plants. But on the more sheltered slopes there were forests of oak and deodar.

Rakesh lived with his grandfather on the outskirts of Mussoorie, just where the forest began. His father and mother lived in a small village 50 miles away, where they grew maize and rice and barley in narrow terraced fields on the lower slopes of the mountain. But there were no schools in the village and Rakesh's parents were keen that he should go to school. As soon as he was of school-going age, they sent him to stay with his grandfather in Mussoorie.

Grandfather was a retired forest ranger. He had a little cottage outside the town.

Rakesh was on his way home from school when he bought the cherries. He paid 50 paise for the bunch. It took him about half-an-hour to walk home, and by the time he reached the cottage there were only three cherries left.

"Have a cherry, Grandfather," he said, as soon as he saw his grandfather in the garden.

Grandfather took one cherry and Rakesh promptly ate the other two. He kept the last seed in his mouth for sometime, rolling it round and round on his tongue until all the tang had gone. Then he placed the seed on the palm of his hand and studied it.

"Are cherry seeds lucky?" asked Rakesh.

"Of course."

"Then I'll keep it."

"Nothing is lucky if you put it away. If you want luck, you must put it to some use."

"What can I do with a seed?"

"Plant it."

So Rakesh found a small spade and began to dig up a flower bed.

"Hey, not there," said Grandfather. "I've sown mustard in that bed. Plant it in that shady corner, where it won't be disturbed."

Rakesh went to a corner of the garden where the earth was soft and yielding. He did not have to dig. He pressed the seed into the soil with his thumb and it went right in.

Then he had his lunch, and ran off to play cricket with his friends, and forgot all about the cherry seed.

When it was winter in the hills, a cold wind blew down from the snows and went whoo-whoo-whoo in the deodar trees, and the garden was dry and bare. In the evenings Grandfather and Rakesh sat over a charcoal fire, and Grandfather told Rakesh stories about people who turned into animals and ghosts who lived in trees and beans that jumped and stones wept, and in turn Rakesh would read to him from the newspaper, Grandfather's eyesight being rather weak. Rakesh found the newspaper very dull, specially after the stories, but Grandfather wanted all the news.

One morning in the garden he bent to pick up what he thought was a small twig and found to his surprise that it was well rooted. He stared at it for a moment, then ran to fetch Grandfather, calling, "Dada, come and look, the cherry tree has come up!"

"What cherry tree?" asked Grandfather, who had forgotten about it.

"The seed we planted last year, look, it's come up!"

Rakesh went down on his haunches while Grandfather bent almost double and peeped down at the tiny tree. It was about four inches high.

"Yes, it's a cherry tree," said Grandfather. "You should water it now and then."

Rakesh ran indoors and came back with a bucket of water

"Don't drown it!" said Grandfather

Rakesh gave it a sprinkling and circled it with pebbles

"What are the pebbles for?" asked Grandfather

"For privacy," said Rakesh

That year the monsoon rains came early and Rakesh plodded to and from school in raincoat and gum boots Ferns sprang from the trunks of trees, strange-looking lilies came up in the long grass, and even when it wasn't raining, the trees dripped and mist came curling up the valley The cherry tree grew quickly in this season

It was about two feet high when a goat entered the garden and ate all the leaves Only the main stem and two thin branches remained

"Never mind," said Grandfather, seeing that Rakesh was upset "It will grow again, cherry trees are tough"

Towards the end of the rainy season new leaves appeared on the tree Then a woman cutting grass scrambled down the hillside, her scythe swishing through the heavy monsoon foliage She did not try to avoid the tree, one sweep, and the cherry tree was cut in two

When Grandfather saw what had happened, he went after the woman and scolded her, but the damage could not be repaired

Maybe it will die now," said Rakesh

"Maybe," said Grandfather

But the cherry tree had no intention of dying

By the time summer came round again, it had sent out several new shoots with tender green leaves Rakesh had grown taller too He was eight now, a sturdy boy with curly black hair and deep black eyes "Blackberry eyes," Grandfather called

That monsoon Rakesh went home to his village, to help his father and mother with the planting and ploughing and sowing He was thinner but stronger when he came back to Grandfather's house at the end of the rains, to find that the cherry tree had grown another foot It was now up to his chest

Even when there was rain, Rakesh would some times water the tree He wanted it to know that he was there

One day, he found a bright green praying-mantis perched on a branch, peering at him with bulging eyes Rakesh let it remain there It was the cherry tree's first visitor

The next visitor was a hairy caterpillar, who started making a meal of the leaves Rakesh removed it quickly and dropped it on a heap of dry leaves

"Come back when you're a butterfly," he said

Winter came early The cherry tree bent low with the weight of snow Fieldmice sought shelter in the root of the cottage The road from the valley was blocked, and for several days there was no newspaper and this made Grandfather quite grumpy His stories began to have unhappy endings

In February it was Rakesh's birthday He was nine and the tree was four, but almost as tall as Rakesh

One morning, when the sun came out, Grandfather came into the garden to "let some warmth get into my bones," as he put it He stopped in front of the cherry tree, stared at it for a few moments, and then called out, "Rakesh! Come and look! Come quickly before it falls!"

Rakesh and Grandfather gazed at the tree as though it had performed a miracle There was a pale pink blossom at the end of the branch

The following year there were more blossoms And suddenly the tree was taller than Rakesh, even though it was less than half his age And then it was taller than Grandfather who was older than some of the oak trees

In the cherry tree, bees came to feed on the nectar in the blossoms, and tiny birds pecked at the blossoms and broke them off But the tree kept blossoming right through the spring, and there were always more blossoms than birds

That summer there were small cherries on the tree Rakesh tasted one and spat it out

"It's too sour," he said

"They'll be better next year," said Grandfather

But the birds liked them specially the bigger birds, such as the bulbuls and scarlet minivets and they flitted in and out of the foliage, feasting on the cherries

On a warm sunny afternoon, when even the bees looked sleepy, Rakesh was looking for Grandfather without finding him in any of his favourite places around the house Then he looked out of the bedroom window and saw Grandfather reclining on a cane chair under the cherry tree

"There's just the right amount of shade here,' said Grandfather "And I like looking at the leaves"

"They're pretty leaves, said Rakesh "And they are always ready to dance If there's breeze"

After Grandfather had come indoors, Rakesh went into the garden and lay down on the grass beneath the tree He gazed up through the leaves at the great blue sky, and turning on his side, he could see the mountain striding away into the clouds. He was still lying beneath the tree when the evening shadows crept across the garden Grandfather came back and sat down beside Rakesh, and they waited in silence until the stars came out and the night jar began to call In the forest below, the crickets and cicadas began tuning up, and suddenly the trees were full of the sound of insects

"There are many trees in the forest," said Rakesh "What's so special about this tree? Why do we like it so much?"

"We planted it ourselves," said Grandfather"That's why it's special'

"Just one small seed," said Rakesh, and he touched the smooth bark of the tree that had grown He ran his hand along the trunk of the tree and put his finger to the tip of a leaf "I wonder," he whispered "Is this what it feels to be God?"

Capricorn
December 21 — January 19

The work load could be staggering You will have to put your shoulder to the wheel to cope with it Problems related to parents, home, in-laws, elders and family members will have to be tackled ably You might be called upon to arbitrate between two warring groups and parties

Aquarius
January 20 — February 18

Work in complete secrecy if you want to be one up on your rivals Yes, you will succeed in fanning out to people Knowledge and information will be your main tools of the trade Many will overtax themselves So do take care of your health This is also the time when you will have to socialise on a massive scale

Pisces
February 19 — March 20

Ganesha says, friends, supporters, lovers, comrades will prove their loyalty to you and that should be cause enough for a celebration Visitors and foreigners do play a pivotal role in your life A trip and a tie is more than likely Expect good news But pay heed to the workload and to your health

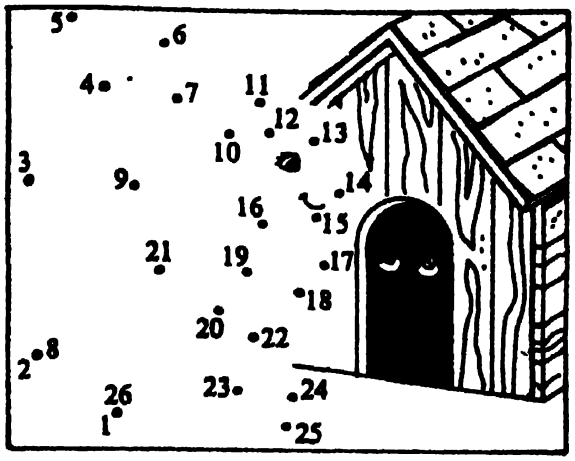
BIRTHDAYS

December 31: Moon trine sun means progress and joy will be yours. Those in medicine and management gain the most. You will be popular.

January 1: Moon sextile Saturn leads you to recover lost ground. If you are seeking stability and security, be sure you will get it.

January 2: Moon-Mercury trine leads to romance, children, an extremely optimistic attitude and respect for elders. Promotion or a better job await you.

January 3: Moon square Saturn does mean that with all your undoubted talent and remarkable ability you might not be knowing how to handle power.



January 4: Moon trine Mars gives you a lot of energy to get on with life. Your enthusiasm will help you to succeed. So give your best shot.

January 5: The moon will make you work hard, play hard. Do not give way to melancholy and remorse. By March, the worst should be over. 1996 is for power, position and plenty of love.

January 6: Things over which you have control will happen to you. A lot of shifting and shuttling is also foretold. Travelling should make you happy.

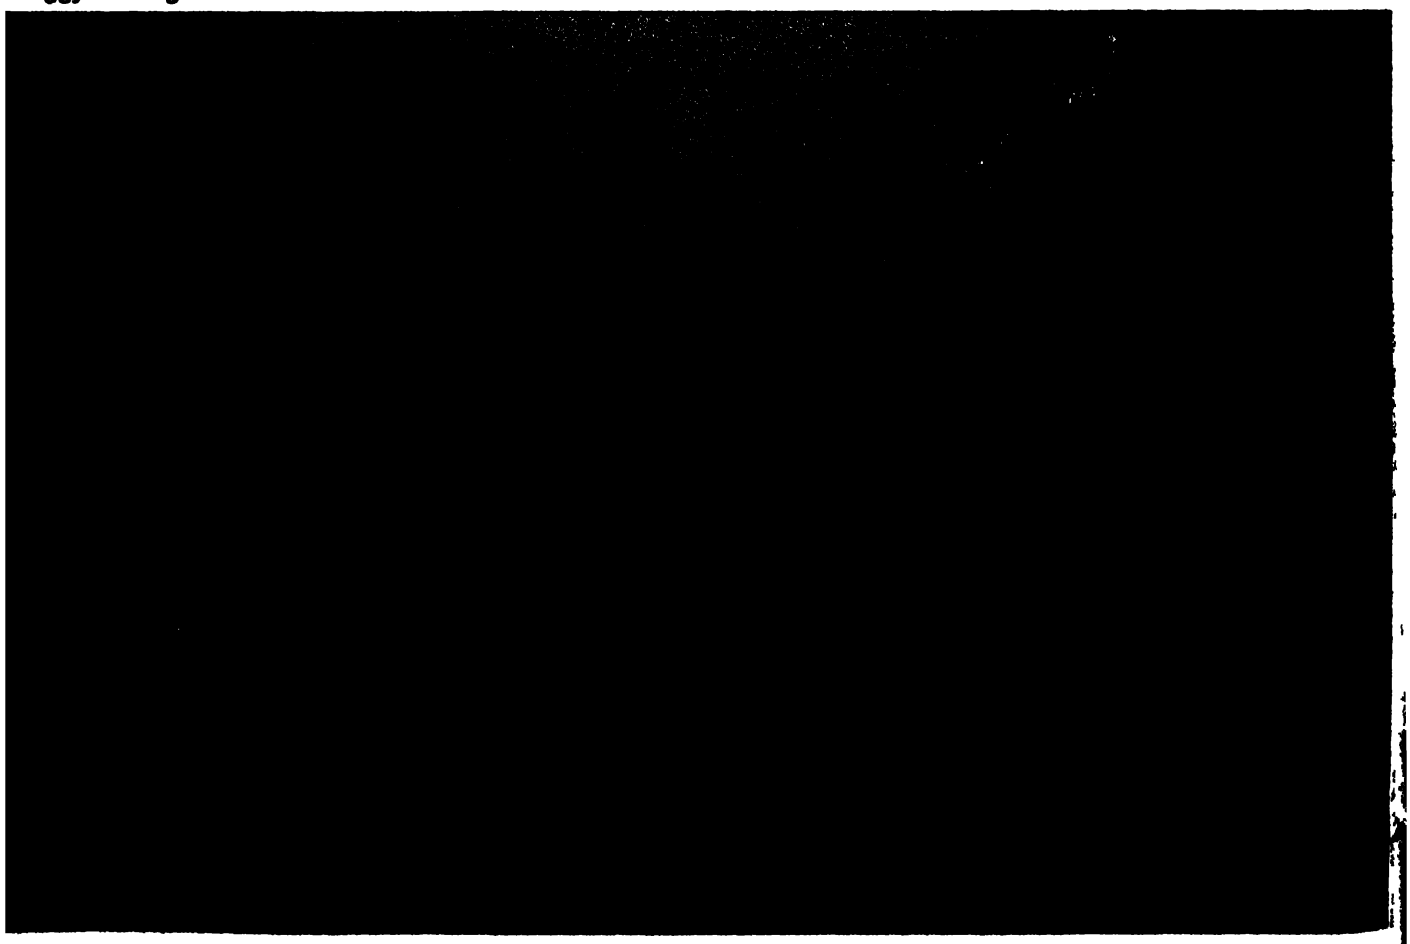
FOCUS

THE RAGE OF INNOCENCE

Dr Michael Tobias is, perhaps, best known for his docudramas in the US. A man completely taken up by innocence, as K. Sheikh found out, he is involved with a mega book-cum-film project called India 24 Hours

Five minutes of intense pain in childhood is, according to Dostoevsky, all it takes to mould the individual's primary conceptions through life And being told that a live sheep was to be his dinner was enough to put Michael Tobias on the path towards the awareness of pain inflicted by human beings on every other creature they encounter "Children have an instant psychic connection to pain, they internalise pain with their innocence " Innocence is important to him



At an age where most children are just about getting used to the concept that the world they live in does not necessarily centre round them, he had already written a book about space invaders who capture the planet and put every living creature under observation to conduct painful experiments. A comment, at age seven, on the barbarism of the chemical testing laboratories of the pharmaceutical companies and the cosmetic manufacturers

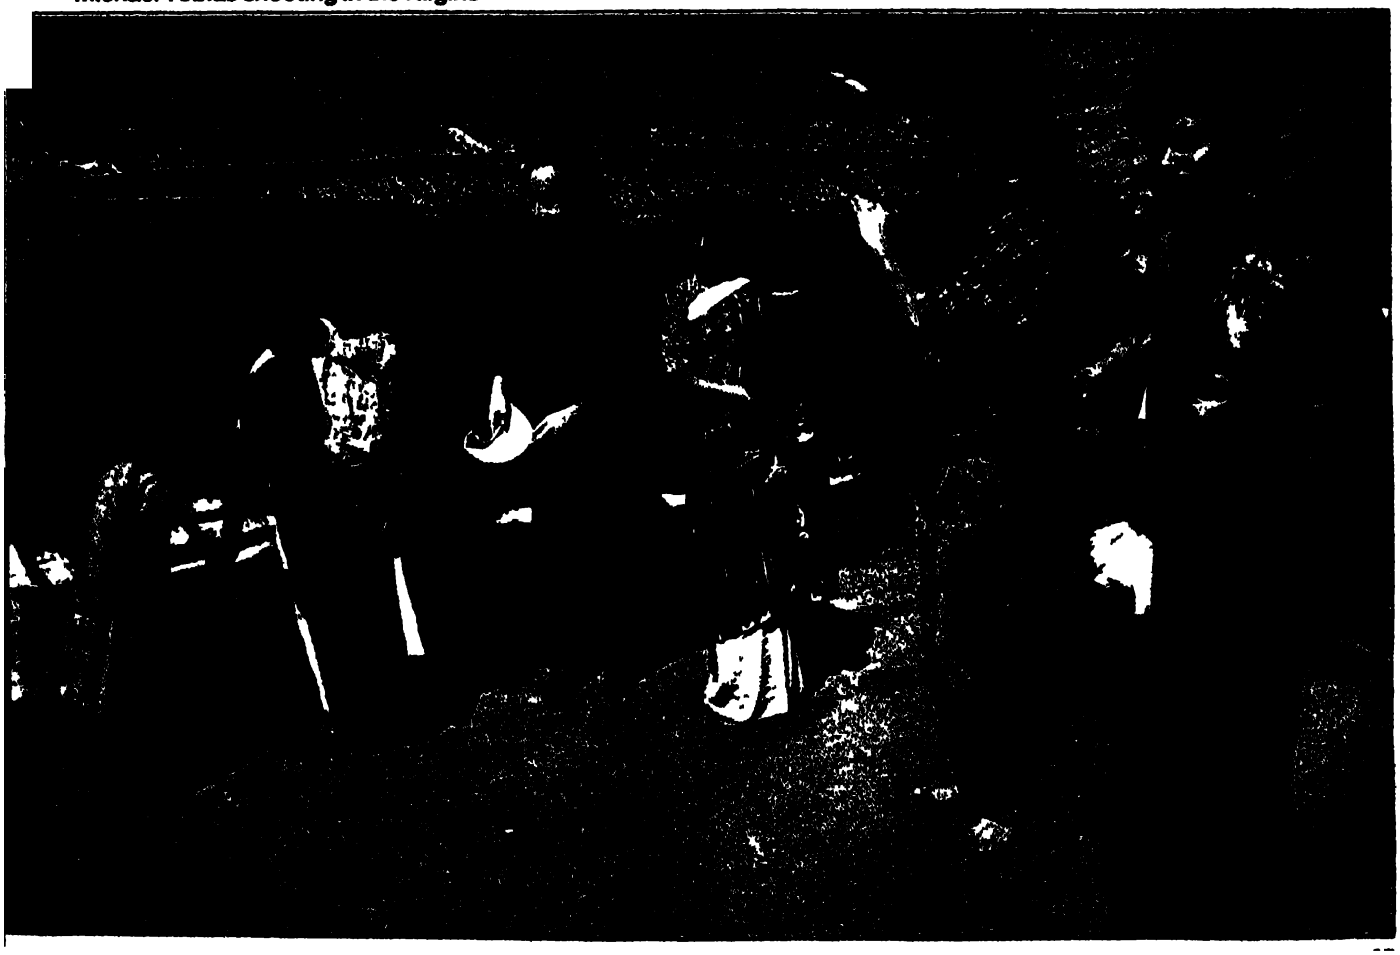
Dr Michael Tobias is, undoubtedly, a statement-maker of some repute today, but the urge to make statements did not translate into the pontificatory oratory which infuriates the listener He makes his point gently even leading the listener to see through his perceptions The chaos of modernday living

Gaunt, in black and not a little hassled with a tight schedule, he talks about how the original Talmudic precepts of vegetarianism were rejected in favour of a more humane way of killing the animals meant for human consumption How kosher came into existence, the extreme sharpness of the knives required to slit the throat of the animals, how Jews, despite the precepts of Judaism which dictate vegetarianism have come to be meat-eaters "I believe that Judaism like Jainism helps man regulate in his daily life the uncomfortable extremes while enabling him to approach certain resolutions "

Jainism, you ask An authority on

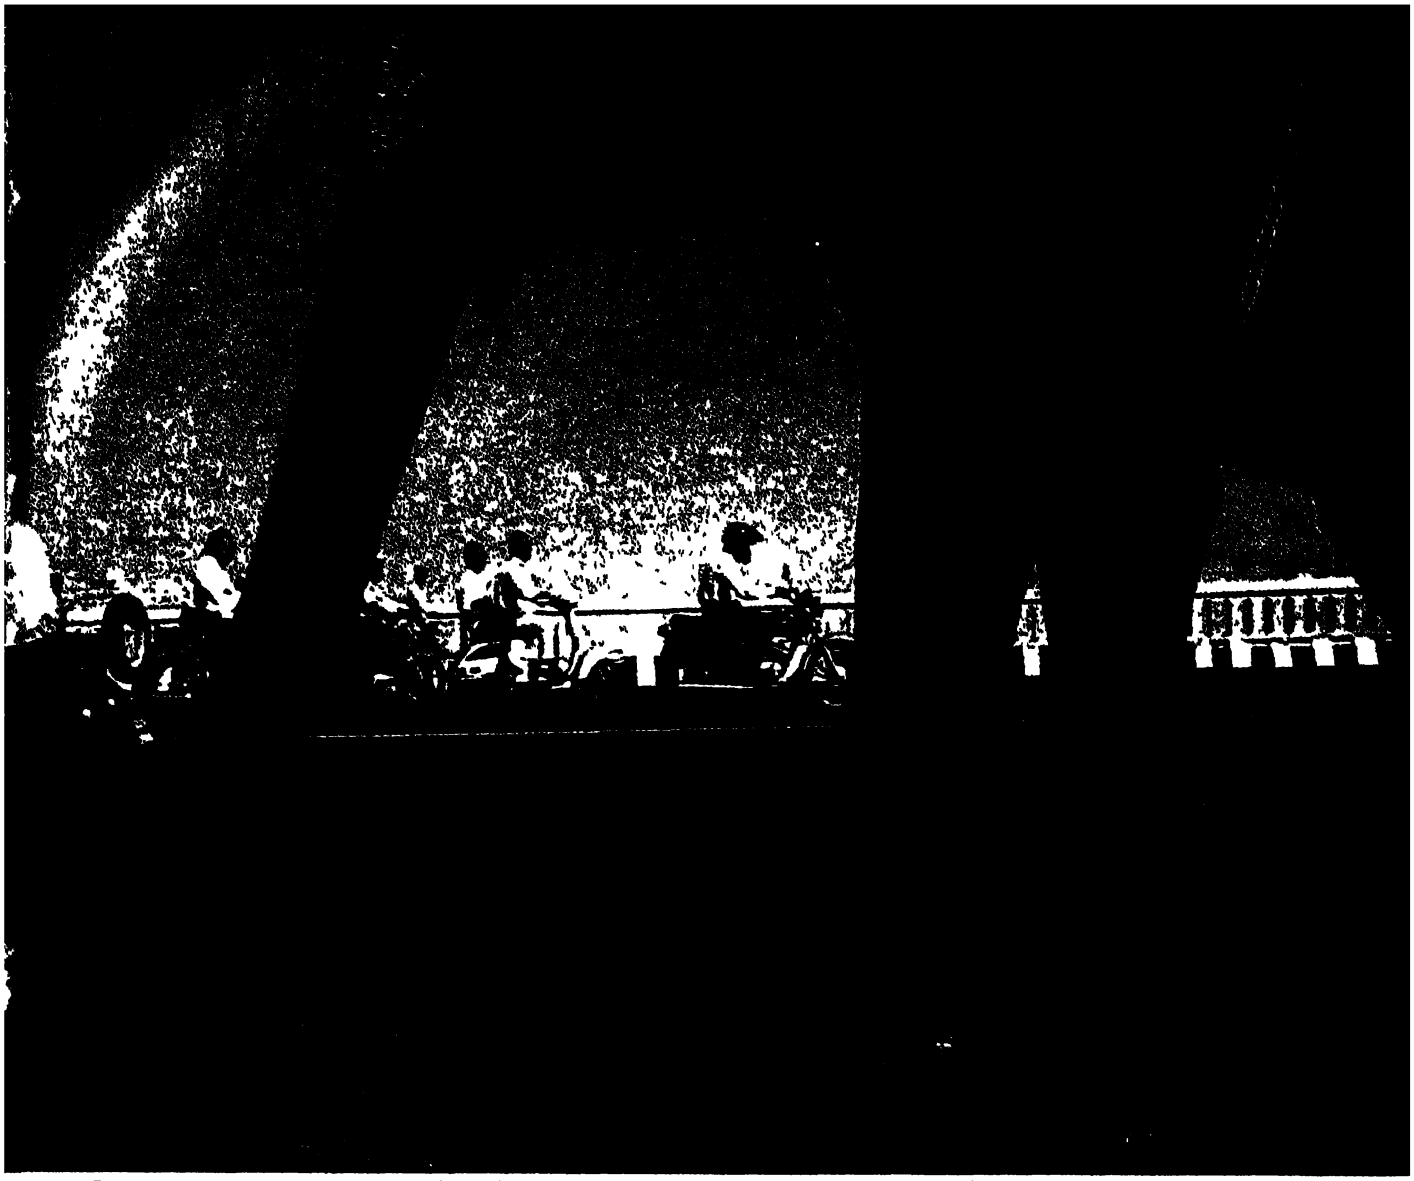
A foggy morning in Calcutta

Jainism of international acclaim, Dr Tobias has published several volumes on the religion and its teachings — Life Force — The World of Jainism, and his novel, which is to be made into a feature film. "Full-length — the sort you sit in a movie hall to watch," he clarifies. The distinction is important, for Dr Tobias is, perhaps, best known for his documentaries — a foremost documentarian in the US, he has made over 70 serious films, and television serials which include the epic 10-hour series, Voice of the Planet, with Faye Dunaway and William Shatner.



A series, incidentally, which is the primary instance of the evolution of his distinctive style, of his fusing the documentary with the drama — to create a docudrama of sorts. Films that have influenced him — The Battle of Algiers and Pixote.

A docudrama of another sort which brought him to India this time round ("India is my second home," he confesses, "perhaps, I should think of getting an apartment here!") is a two-hour epic journey into India. "An honest look, mind you," he says, "and given the complexity of the project and the sheer logistics involved, I did not have a single moment's apprehension about things not falling into place."



He [Michael Tobias] loves entertainment — 'I loved Rangeela, it had a basic innocence which was very touching and which did not descend into naivete. The fact that you can change 25 costumes in what is supposed to be a single dance sequence...it's fascinating.' As are... cinema hoardings, he plans to buy some and hang them in his home in the US

The project, which he directed in collaboration with CMM studios is a two-hour film on the lives of people across India unfolding, going about their day-to-day business, and yet through their ordinary every-day actions, making definitive statements about their everyday existence and social conditioning. India 24 Hours ("Well, that's not the original title of the project, but ," he shrugs.) The film and the hardcover coffee table book, aims at creating a visual document that "answers a few questions about India and, perhaps, asks a few more... to involve the people of India in a celebration of the country... to bring together people of talent and provide them with an opportunity to work together." (The result will be telecast on January 26 at 9:30 pm on Doordarshan's National network and the hardcover book, with an initial print run of 10,000 copies will be sold throughout India and the world.)

The director of photography for the book was Raghu Rai, who was joined by 17 of the country's most talented photographers. "It's interesting, because you have the photographers and the camera crew working together, side by side, in locations from Patna to Ladakh to Surat For instance you have Savita Kirloskar with the Todas in the Nilgiris being offered a cup of buffalo milk, and you see this hesitation — uh, do I drink this stuff? It's very, very interesting " Among the filmmakers and the photographers who worked on this project are names like Charu Kamal Hazarika, Ajit Jha, Himanshu Malhotra, Rajiv Mehrotra, Namas Bhojani, Noshir Desai, John Issac, Hoshi Jal, Savita Kirloskar, Ashwin Mehta, Arun Ganguly and Aditya Patankar, to name a few

Even today, animals and people share the same road as on this bridge in Ahmedabad

With this mammoth production and direction effort now concluded, Dr Tobias is already talking, thinking and dreaming of his next projects After all, CML and JMI productions (a Los Angeles-based production house, Dr Tobias heads) have 20 new projects lined up for 1996-97 A CMM feature film — on his novel — based on the life of Mahavira The film, to be shot in Nalanda where an entire village will be set, Bombay and Los Angeles, will be an intercutting between the past and the present, "something akin to Little Buddha, but not quite" The casting for this project, though, has yet to be done There is also a photo documentation of Jainism he is working on in collaboration with Raghu Rai and the 13-part series on India since Independence For this academician-turned-media person, the visual medium allows him a broader canvas with which to project his issues of concern "from the heart and the mind, both of which are the same for me", to a larger circle of friends

'It's interesting, because you have the photographers and the camera crew working together...in locations from Patna to Ladakh.... For instance, you have Savita Kirloskar with the Todas in the Nilgiris being offered a cup of buffalo milk'

"Switching to media came about at

Rajesh Vora

A young girl poses on a motorcycle before Ahmedabad's Law Garden, famous for its embroidery and mirror work

a time when I was debating within myself whether it was acceptable to me to lecture students I was younger than — given the fact that I had no experiential knowledge to share I was in my mid-twenties back then It took me three days to decide to change my vocation " From being an assistant professor of ecology (the connection with nature inherent since childhood) and humanities and adjunct professor of English at Dartmouth to visiting professor of humanities at California State University, he went to current affairs programming at KQED-PBS

"I am still a professor — I am a visiting lecturer at the University of New Mexico, they asked me if I could be there for a year and I said how about two weeks, so ," he laughs and , shrugs But filmmaking and writing is a primary occupation The slant is not on merely making documentaries, but on provoking and instigating questioning and debate through entertainment and factual entertainment at that

And he loves entertainment — "I loved Rangeela, it had a basic innocence which was very touching and which did not descend into naivete The fact that you can change 25 costumes in what is supposed to be a single dance sequence it's fascinating " As are hoardings, cinema hoardings to be precise, he plans to buy some and hang them in his home in the US "They are an art form in themselves and out here, people take them so for granted " The innocence of it all, he says, fascinates him

And innocence — whether in his childlike relation to the world and the pain inherent in these innocence — keeps his work as tautly disturbing and provocative as it is. ■

For this academician-turned media person, the visual medium allows him a broader canvas with which to project his issues of concern 'from the heart and the mind, both of which are the same for me', to a larger circle of friends

For some people nothing works according to plan whether going for a vacation or a movie, says Subhashini Narayan. (By the way, this story was unplanned and hence, it got to be written)

Planning is a totally alien concept to our family Countless are the occasions when we have returned home with long faces from the cinema hall seeing the 'House Full' board (my parents are dead against buying tickets in black) We still haven't learnt to book tickets in advance But, yes, now we opt for night shows when even Amitabh Bachchans or Aamir/Salman/Shah Rukh Khans fail to enthuse many an avid movie buff to stay awake

A peep into our house during the wedding season and you can see one of us rushing to the market at the last minute to buy a gift while the others are getting ready to leave! In fact, on one such occasion, we had as usual put off the present-buying chore till the last day And it poured the entire morning only to clear up in the evening! My sister at once rushed to the main road, only to see that the rows of shops usually abuzz with activity had closed down due to heavy rains

The bride had to be content with an uninteresting cheque

A significant but unplanned sector in our house is holidaying We usually begin a holiday with waitlisted railway tickets They usually get confirmed, but not without the accompanying tension and uncertainty. On two occasions we had to return from the station complete with baggage, food — and unconfirmed tickets Once we even travelled in an unreserved three-tier compartment with A/C two-tier waitlisted tickets

I always envied my cousins when they narrated their trips to the then-peaceful Kashmir valley, Goa or Darjeeling and Nepal after planning two months in advance "How come we could never plan a tour like that?" I used to ask myself "Next time, I will never travel without proper planning," I promised myself

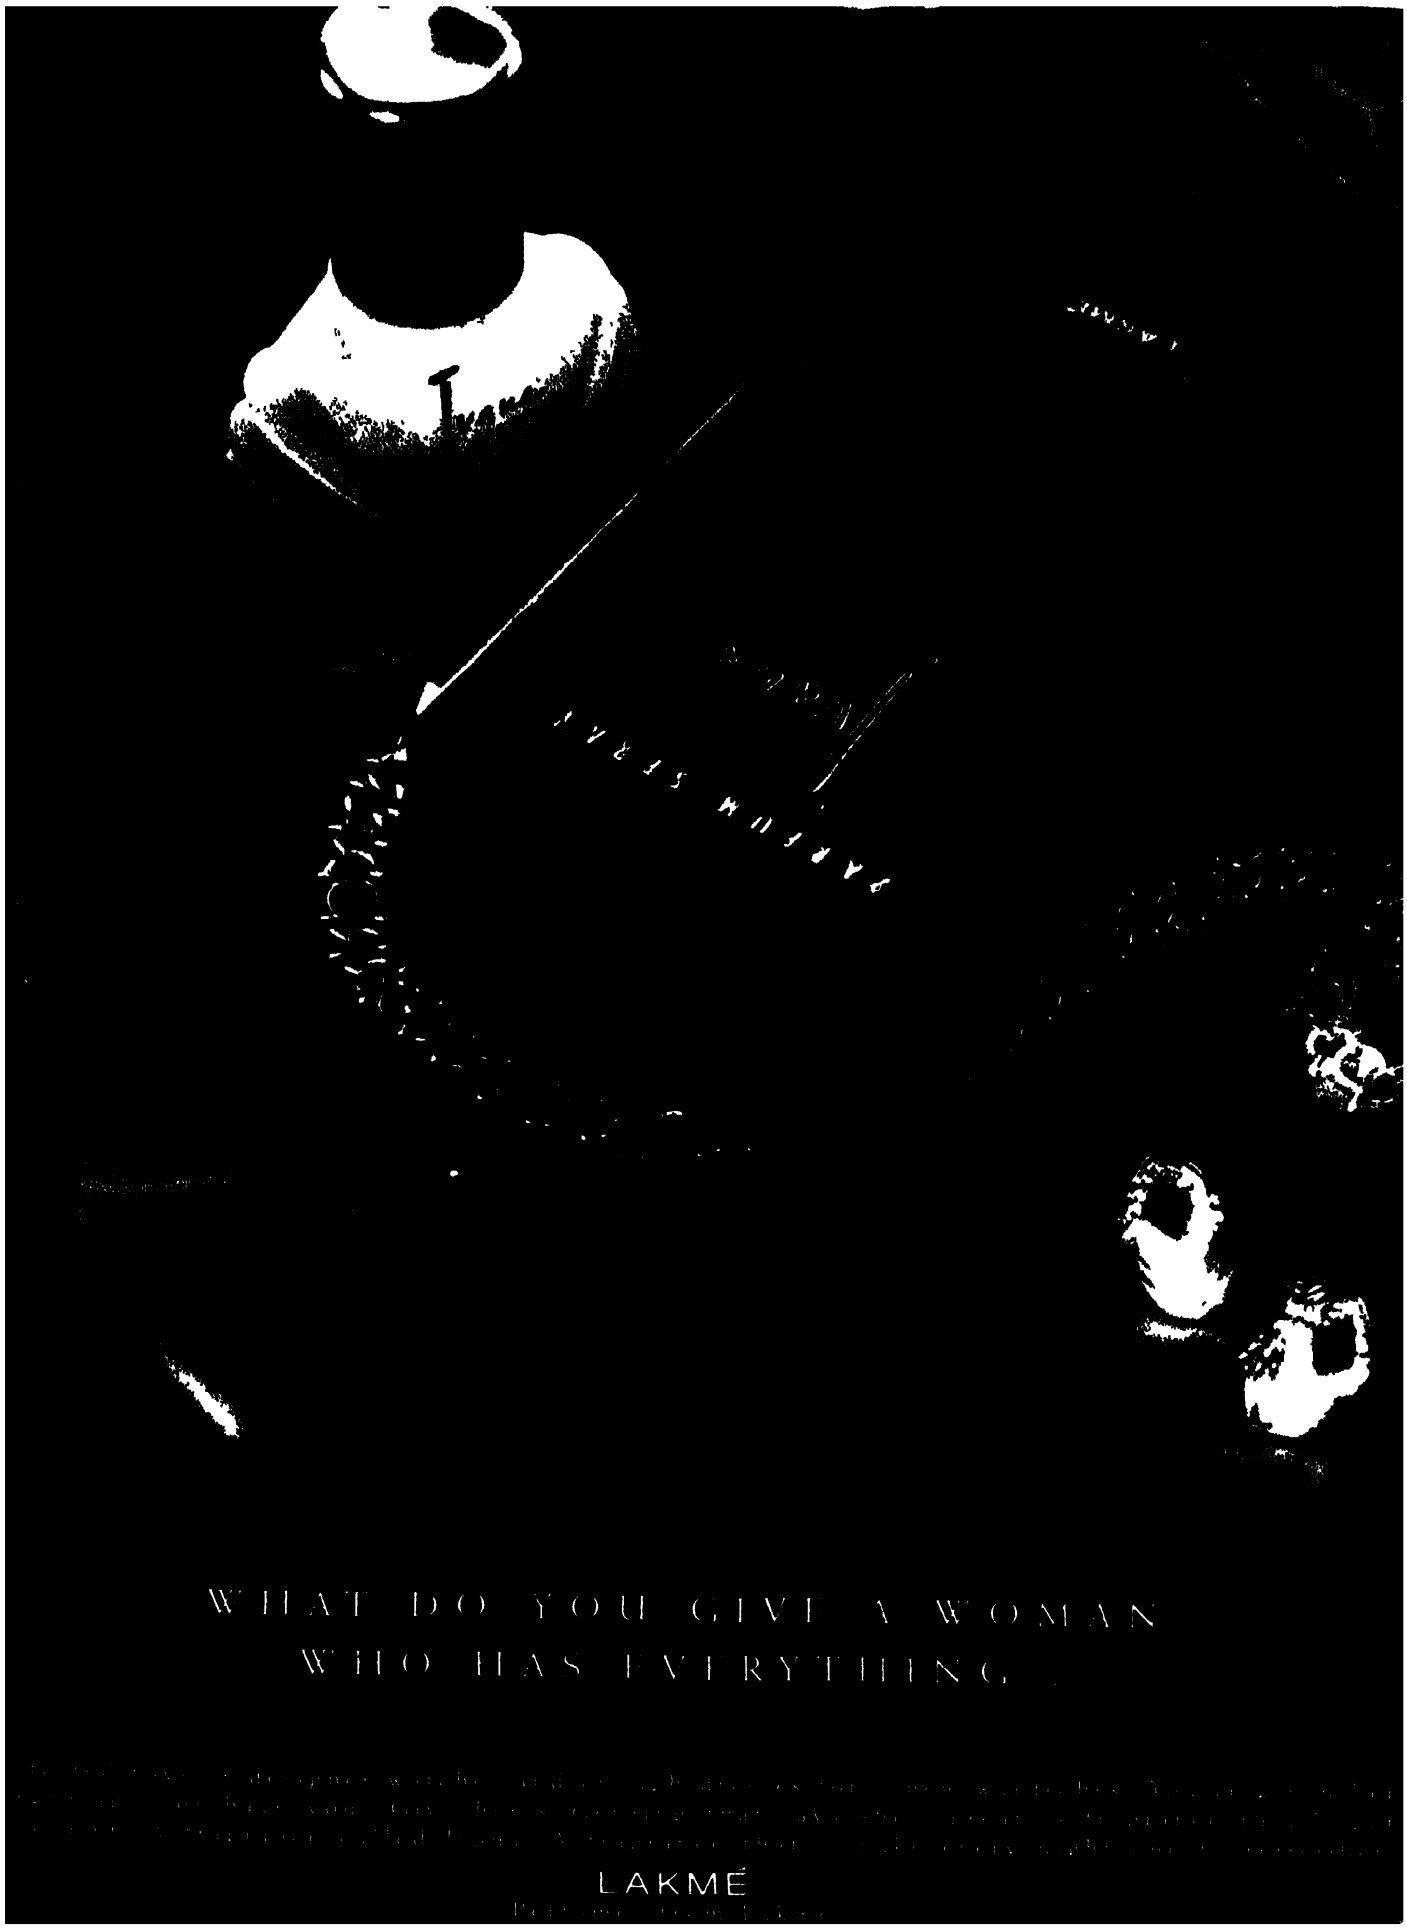
My cousin's wedding in Madras last August offered me an opportunity to try out that perfect recipe for a comfortable and successful holiday I got tickets, confirmed mind you, to Madras, Bangalore and back

My purse wore a confident look with proper railway tickets neatly arranged inside I began my journey with my sister — and with a promise of "less tension and more comfort ", After Madras, came the Bangalore sojourn Everything was going according to my plan Madras was kind to me during my return stay, too, though the city could do nothing about the harsh glare of the sun god



Finally the time had come for me to leave for the city of joy The bags were packed and all the new clothes we bought were also stuffed into the suitcase in advance to avoid confusion at the last minute My aunt neatly packed sumptuous idlis and roti-sabzi in aluminium foils for the journey

Everything was surprisingly ready when a phone call changed my belief in the myth called planning "The Howrah-Madras Mail has been cancelled because of a Bangla Bandh the previous day," she screamed in excitement from another end of Madras She was obviously happy because of my extended stay "How can this happen to me?" I asked my equally excited aunt I did not blame her, of course — an added day of stay was always welcome considering my infrequent visits to her city

I cursed the over-reactive politicians of West Bengal But, then, I have always cited the positive side of bandhs to my relatives outside Calcutta, where bandhs are usually the last resort, not the only resort "Bandhs are as regular in West Bengal as summer and monsoons," I would tell them as if they were God's blessing to mankind "In fact, even monsoons might, in some years, fail to provide succour to wilting crops there," I would say

And all this had to happen to me, who had, for the first time, ventured into chalking out a plan (I am allergic to that word by now)

That rules out any possibility of my joining the government (Five Year Plans, remember?) or being charitable to my country (unless they change the term from Family Planning to something else) ■
